"Now the weather was so fine that the boats, instead of being always kept in their davits, were sometimes (contrary to the usual custom at sea), for the sake of giving more room, thrust outside the bulwarks, hanging on the ropes which commonly see them, over the water from the davits. Into one of these, the smallest (I forget what it is called), our two young men, Binks and Bagman, in the habit of mounting, by the assistance of their cavaliers. There they would sit for hours, sometimes for the greater part of the day, entertaining to their friends on the deck. Occasionally, seized by a sudden impulse, the result of high spirits, they would begin to rock the boat backward and forward like a cradle, by swaying themselves from side to side, and singing some nursery rhyme or song. In these efforts they were, of course, aided and abetted by Messrs. Binks and Bagman.

"On more than one occasion they had received an official caution against doing this; but little heed was taken of any thing which was calculated to interfere with their amusements.

"On a certain evening, not quite as fine as usual, there being a strong breeze, the little group of four were seated in the boat, the main hatch the young ladies seated in the stern of the boat, the young men leaning over the bulwark, talking to them.

"The sun had just set, and the majority of the passengers were below at tea. Few people happened to be on deck at the time—none near this particular boat. We were running briskly before the wind, and peals of laughter rang again and again from the party. They evidently were becoming very excited, and the swinging diversion was carried on vigorously.

"'Suddenly, Binks, who was standing near the stern davit, said, 'Hallo! I have got a new idea.'

"'How now, Binks, my dove!' said Bagman; 'take care of it. What is it?'

"'Why, look here!' the other went on; 'we can give our little pets a new sensation, and swing them up and down, instead of across and across.

"With this he began to unfasten the rope which ran through the pulleys and blocks of the davit from over the davit, and by which the stern end of the boat could be lowered into the water.

"'But you must hold tight though, by Jove, old fellow,' his friend said. 'Oh, all right, don't you fear. Now then, ladies, sit fast; down you go, and up again, just a little way; lean on me, Bagman.' And the two gradually allowed the stern of the boat to drop some two feet out of the horizontal. An accompanying flutter and suppressed scream followed the movement as the boat was immediately brought back to its proper position. Again it was lowered, and again, and again, amidst the general merriment of the four; the girls enjoying the fun equally with the men.

"Emboldened by the success of their experiment, they lowered the boat each time more and more, until at length this very perilous proceeding became fraught with the most terrible danger. It was, indeed, a case of playing with edged tools.

"Here were two cockney landsmen meddling recklessly with gear which requires the most careful handling, the mismanagement of which, in cases of lowering boats at sea, has, perhaps, led to more loss of life than any other single incident in a time of shipwreck. On they went, however, with their game, the two men hauling the rope backward and forward with the greatest delight.

"Should it slip from their hands, or the weight of the boat, which, be it known, is much for their strength, nothing in the world could prevent the unfortunate girls from being precipitated into the sea, the boat itself only dangling perpendicularly by its bows to the second davit.

"'I say, Sea-serpent, Margery Daw, here we go up, up, up, and here we go down, down, down,' and other similar intellectual quotations, formed an accompaniment to the exercise of this Bathbrickly idiotic proceeding. A man coming slowly along the deck in the twilight suddenly increased his speed on seeing what was going on, and, with a deprecatory action, cried:

"'For God's sake, gentlemen, desist, desist! Do you know what you are doing?'

"'Rather,' replied Bagman; 'we flatter ourselves we generally do know what we are up to. Eh, Binks, we think?'

"But Binks's reply was interrupted by the renewed vehemence and protestations of the new-comer, who appeared almost inclined forcibly to prevent a continuance of the hazardous game.

"If that rope slips from your hands, the young ladies will be drowned,' he went on.

"'Yes! I know that, and don't mean to let it slip. Confound it, Sir, mind your own business, and don't interfere with us,' was the reply.

"'It is my business, and every body's business; and if you don't leave off this instant I'll fetch somebody who shall make you.'

"'Go to the devil, and tell you we know what we are about,' was the only response to this.

"The interposer turned on his heel, and was walking hastily away, when a fearful shriek rent the air, followed, as he looked back, by a splash in the water; the boat was hanging by a single block, and the stern of the men standing horror-stricken and helpless, gazing into space!

"It was now nearly dark, the ship running a good ten knots an hour; but without a moment's hesitation the stranger tore off his coat, and in one second had leaped over the side of the vessel, and struck out into the sea.

"The piercing cry of 'Man overboard!' ran like wild-fire through the ship, which was speedily brought to a standstill; but a long space of time and distance, of course, were lost before the way she had on her could be counteracted and she could be brought back to any thing like proximity to the spot where the unfortunate girls and their would-be preserver were probably struggling for life.

"A boat was lowered with marvelous dexterity and all the promptness and skill of the best seamanship; a blue-light was burned; the passengers and crew crowded every available space, and the most intense excitement reigned on board.

"The boat's proceedings. By the aid of the last glimmer of day and the strong blue-light there was little difficulty in finding what was sought. To the unspeakable joy of all, it was soon evident that those in the boat were pulling hastily toward something which they had discovered sooner than we.

"After a while, however, we, too, who were on board ship, came near it, and it became perfectly clear to every body that the brave man was supporting one of the girls as he struck out manfully toward the boat. There was not sufficient sea running greatly to impede his efforts, but ever and anon he would look back over his shoulder, as if looking for something else. Following the direction toward which his head turned, we at last discerned, as did he, at about twenty yards distance from him, another form, which, of course, we knew to be that of the unhappy sister.

"Instantly comprehending his intention of swimming to the boat, he deliberately put about and made straight away for the poor girl, who had risen probably for the last time. It was a moment of intense anxiety.

"Would he reach her ere she sank never to rise again?

"He struck out with superhuman efforts. One could almost picture the veins upon his forehead swelling with the tremendous energy he was displaying. He approached within three yards of her, when, to our intimate and horrible dismay, he was seen to turn round and swim away from her—when, as it were after the manner of dissolving views, her form seemed fading away!

"But no! thank Heaven! Another vigorous stroke with his right arm, the only one at liberty, and he held up the drooping head above water! Drummed as he now was with the two sisters, of course all efforts at motion had to be given up. To keep afloat with his burdens was the utmost he could do.

"His arms were unavailable, and it appeared to be a great question whether, the intensity of his exertions to be, he could sustain, by trending water, such an incumbrance, until the boat should reach him.

"It was a question of moments, and the anxiety which we had gone through in witnessing his efforts to reach the unnerved girl was repeated in a tenfold degree as we watched and calculated the chances that the boat might have of coming up with the swimmer.

"It did, however, and, amidst a deafening cheer from the ship, we saw the three safely dragged over the side of the boat. On regaining the ship it appeared very doubtful, after all, if the great bravery and endurance displayed by our hero might not prove unavailing.

"Perfectly senseless, both sisters were subjected to the usual restoratives, but, unhappily, with a favorable result only in the case of the elder. The younger sister never showed the slightest symptoms of returning animation. Two days after she was consigned to the grave from which so much human endurance and courage had failed to rescue her.

"The wretched fellows who were the cause of this melancholy calamity naturally retired into a very unenviable and miserable obscurity for the rest of the voyage. It had, of course some simply an accident; the rope had suddenly slipped through their hands, and, the boat having swung breached to a wave on the turn, it was impossible again to check it. It is needless to say the remainder of our voyage was a dreary one indeed.

"All distinctive coteries were leveled indeed now; but on arriving at Cape Town we lost the hero and heroine of this sad tragedy. It was the destination of Miss Helen Smith; and though Mr. Cuthbert Dolworthy had taken a passage right through to Melbourne, he left the ship at the first opportunity for the purpose of watching the thorough recovery and restoration to bodily health of the lady who owed her life to his noble and gallant behavior."

Running my eye down the rest of the column of the Portstower Observer, in which this remarkable story appeared, I found its fit and proper conclusion under such a heading:

Ah me! I never thought that poor lady in Melbourne would have much of a chance. Oh, man, stern in courage, determined in purpose, unswerving in thy physical efforts to do the noblest deeds, how weak art thou still in thy heart! How easily turned from thy set intentions when the love of a woman is the sole commodity at stake!

"Married, on the 4th of February, 18—, at St. Barnabas, Bancroft, Cape Town, by the Rev. Sigismund Perkins, Cuthbert Dolworthy, Esq., of Dolworthy, Durham, Great Britain, to Helen, only remaining daughter of the late Josiah Smith, Esq., of Herne Hill."

SERVED OUT.

In the year 183– there lived at Bordeaux the last—or one of the last—of a long line of scoundrels who had filled that part of France infamous (to our ideas) by the execution of cold-blooded murders, committed under the sanction of what pompously called to call the Code of Honor. This was a certain Comte De V——, a man of great physical strength, imperturbable courage, and relentless cruelty. Not a bad sort of companion, as some said, when the fit—the dueling fit—was not on him; but when it came on once in about every six months, and then he must have blood, it mattered little whose. He had killed and maimed boys of sixteen, fathers of families, military officers, journalists, advocates, peaceful country gentlemen. The cause of quarrel was often no important one, and not present itself readily, he made one; always contriving that, according to the code aforesaid, he should be the insulted party, and have the choice of weapons; and he was deadly with the small-sword. It is difficult for us to realize a state of society in which such a thing could be permitted to go at large; but we know it to be historically true that such creatures were endured in France just as we endure that there were at one time wolves in Yorkshire; only the less noisome vermin had a harder time of it, for the progressive French soon dealt out to the human brute.

The latest exploit of the Comte De V—— previous to the one I am about to tell was to gond a poor young student into a challenge; and when it was represented to him that the boy had never held a sword in his life, so that it would be fairer to use pistols, he replied, that "fools sometimes made marksmen," and shot the next morning ran him through the lungs. The evil fit was on him; but the blood that shed quieted him for another while, and for three months of public opinion was unfavorable, and the air of Bordeaux became too warm for him.

But the scandal blew over after a time, and he came back to his old haunts, one of which was a cafe by the river-side, where many used to spend their Sunday. Into the little garden of this establishment our well-suggered one fine summer afternoon, with the lusty dark look and nervous twitching of the hands which those who were acquainted with him knew well meant mischief. The evil fit was on him; consequently he found himself the centre of a circle which expatiated as he went on. This did not displease him. He liked to be fleered. He knew he could make a quarrel when he chose, so he looked around for a victim.

At a table almost in the middle of the garden sat a man of about thirty years of age, of middle height, and expressive of countenance which at first struck one as mild and good-humored. He was engaged reading a journal which seemed to interest him, and eating strawberries with an expansion which does not call forth any latent strength of character. Above all, he was profoundly unconscious of the presence of M. le Comte De V——, and continued eating his strawberries and reading his paper as though no wolf were at that pleasant fold.

As the Count approached this table it became sufficiently well known to us that he was about to honor with his insolence; and the officer narrowed again to see the play. It is not bad sport, with some of us, to see a fellow-creature bested —especially when we are out of danger ourselves.

The strawberry-eater's costume was not such as was ordinarily worn in France at that time, and he had a certain air, which—the weather being warm—he had placed on the table by his side. "He is a foreigner," whispered some in the dress-circle. Perhaps he does not know Monsieur le Comte."

Monsieur le Comte seated himself at the table opposite the unconscious stranger, and called loudly, "Garçon!"

"Garçon," he said, when that functionary appeared, "take me away that nasty thing!" pointing to the list adressed.

Now the stranger's elbow, as he read his journal, was on the brim of the "nasty thing," which was a very good hat, but of British form and make. The garçon was embarrassed.

"Do you hear me?" thundered the Count. "Take me that thing away! No one has a right to place a hat on the table."

"I beg your pardon," said the strawberry-eater, politely, placing the offending article on his head, and leaving his chair a little aside; "I will make room for Monsieur."

The garçon was about to retire well satisfied, when the bully called after him:

"Have I not commanded you to take that thing which annoys me away?"

"But, Monsieur le Comte, the gentleman has covered himself."

"What does that matter to me?"

"But, Monsieur le Comte, it is impossible."

"What is impossible?"

"That I should take the gentleman's hat."

"By an oath!" observed the stranger, uncovering again. "Be so good as to carry my hat to the lady at the counter; and ask her to say how much I owe me the favor to accept charge of it for the present."

You speak French passably well for a foreigner, sir," the bully, stretching his arms over the table and looking his neighbor full in the face—a titter of contempt pervaded the circle.

"I am not a foreigner, Monsieur."

"I am sorry for that."

"So am I."

"May one, without indiscretion, inquire why?"

"Certainly. Because, if I were a foreigner, I should be spared the pain of seeing a compatriot behave himself very rudely."

"Meaning me?"

"Meaning precisely, you."

"Do you know who I am?" asked the Count, half turning his back upon him, and facing the lookers-on as much as to say, "Now observe how I will crush this poor creature."

"Monsieur," replied the strawberry-eater, with perfect politeness in his tone, "I have the honor not to know you."

"Death of my life! I am the Comte De V——."

The strawberry-eater looked up, and the easy good-natured face was gone. In its place was one with a pair of eyes which flashed like fire, and a mouth that set itself very firmly.

"The Comte De V——," he repeated, in a low voice.

"Yes, Monsieur. And what have you to say against him?"

"I? Ah, nothing."

"That may be well for you."

"But there are those who say he is a coward."

"Death and blood," said the bully, starting to his feet. "Monsieur will find me in two hours at this address," flinging him a card.

"I shall be favorable myself to seek Monsieur le Comte," replied the strawberry-eater, calmly tearing the card in two.

"I shall say of Monsieur what he, permitting himself to lie, said just now of me."

"And that is?"

"That he is a coward."

"You may say what you please, Monsieur le Comte, but those who know me would not believe you, and those who do not—my faith! what care I what they think?"

"And those are a Frenchman!"

No one but a Frenchman could have thrown so much disdain as he did into the "but."

The strawberry-eater made no reply, but turned his head and called "Garçon!" The poor trembling creature came up again, wondering what new dilemma was prepared for him, and stood quaking some ten yards off. "Garçon," said the stranger, "is there a room vacant in the hotel?"

"Without doubt, Monsieur."

"A large one?"

"But certainly. They are all large—own apartments."

"Then engage the largest for me for to-day, and another—no matter what—for Monsieur le Comte."

"Monsieur, I give my own orders when necessary," said the Count, loftily.

"I thought to spare you theytrouble. Go, if you please" (this to the waiter), "and prepare my rooms."

Then the strawberry-eater returned to his strawberries. The bully guawed his lip. He could not make head or tail of this phlegmatic opponent. The circle grew a little wider, for a horrid idea got abroad that the Count had not found one who was likely to suit him, and that he would have to seek elsewhere what he wanted.

The murmur that went round roused the bully. "Monsieur," he hissed, "has presumed to make use of a word which among men of honor—"

"I beg your pardon?"

"Which among men of honor—"

"But what can Monsieur le Comte possibly know what is felt among men of honor?" asked the other, with a shade of incredulity.

"Will you fight yourself with me, or will you not?" roared the Count, goaded to fury.

"If Monsieur le Comte will give himself the trouble to accompany me to the apartment which, no doubt, is now prepared for me," replied the stranger, rising, "I will satisfy him."

Was there no one to call "police?" no one to try and prevent what to all seemed imminent? Not a soul! The dreaded duellist had his evil fit on, and every one breathed freely now that he knew the victim was selected. Moreover, no one supposed he would end there.

The Count and his friend (?) were ushered into the apartment prepared for the latter, who, as soon as the garçon had left, took off his coat and waistcoat, and proceeded to move the furniture, so as to leave the room free for what was to follow—the Count standing with folded arms, glaring at him, the while. The decks being cleared for action, the stranger locked the door, placed the key on the mantelpiece behind him, and said:

"I think you might have helped a little; but never mind. Will you give me your attention for five minutes?"

"Perfectly."

"Thank you. I am, as I have told you, a Frenchman, but I was educated in England at one of her famous public schools. Had I been sent to one of our own, I prefer to think I should not have gotten more book-knowledge; but as it is, I have learned some things which we do not teach, and one of them is, that a man may mean advantage of any man, but to keep my own hand with my own hands. Do you understand me, Monsieur le Comte?"

"I can not flatter myself that I do."

"Ha! Then I must be more explicit. I learned, then, that one of the greatest follies of mere brute strength against the weak, or who, practiced in any art, compels one unpracticed in it to contend with him, is a coward and a knave. Do you follow me now, Monsieur le Comte?"

"I came here, Monsieur—"

"Never mind why you came for; be content with what you will get. For example—to follow what I was observing—if a man skilled with the small-sword, for the sake of the love of fighting, goads to madness a boy who has never fenced in his life, and kills him, that man is a coward and a knave, and a coward and a knave, and a knavish."

"I think I catch your meaning; but if you have plainly here—"

"I do not come to eat strawberries with pistols in my pocket," replied the stranger, in his old tone to which he had used throughout. "Allow me to continue. At that school of which I have spoken, and in the second year of my residence there, out of its small others where the same habit of thought prevails, it would be considered that a man who had been guilty of such cowardice and knavery as I have mentioned would be justly punished if, some day, he should be paid in his own coin by meeting some one who was more than at the same disadvantage as he placed that poor boy at."

"Our seconds shall fix your own weapons, Monsieur," said the Count; "let this farce end."

"Presently. Those gentlemen whose opinions I now venture to express have, I think, more care for blood which distinguishes some—who have not had a similar enlightened education—would probably think that such a coward and knave as we have been considering would best meet his deserts by receiving a humiliating castigation before his many friends and admirers."

"Ah! I see; I have a lawyer to deal with," sneered the Count.

"Yes. I have studied a little law, but I regret to say I am about to practice one of its provisions."

"You will fight me, then?"

"Yes. At the school we had been speaking of I learned, among other things, the use of the hands; and, if I mistake not, I am about to give you as sound a thrashing as any bully ever got."

"You would take advantage of your skill in the box?" said the Count, getting a little pale.

"Exactly. Just as you took advantage of your skill in the small-sword with poor young B——."

"But it is degrading, brutal!"

"My dear Monsieur, just consider. You are four inches taller, and some thirty to forty kilogrammes heavier than I am. I have seldom seen so fine an outside. If you were to hit me a good swinging blow it would go hard with me. In the same way, if poor young B—— had got over your guard he would have gone hard with you. But, then, I shall only black both your eyes, and perhaps deprive you of a tooth or so, unhappily in front, whereas you killed him."

"I will not accept this barbarous encounter."

"You must; I have done talking. Would you like a little brandy before we begin? No? Place yourself on guard, then, if you please. When I have done with you, and you are fit to appear, then you shall have your revenge—even with the small-sword, if you please. Monsieur, bully—coward—knave, take that, and that, and that!"

And the wiry little Anglo-Frank was as good as his word. In less time than it takes to write it the great braggart was rendered unrecognizable for many a long day. That number one caused him to see fifty suns beaming in the firmament with his right eye; that number two punctuated a similar phenomenon with his left; that number three obliged him to swallow a front tooth, and to observe ceiling more attentively than he had hitherto done. And when one or two other thats had completely cowed him, and he threw open the window and called for help, the strawberry-eater took him by the neck and—well, another and lower part, and flung him out of it on to the flower-bed below.

The strawberry-eater remained a month at Bordeaux to fulfill his promise of giving the Count his revenge. But then again the bully met with more than his match. The strawberry-eater had had Angelo for a master as well as Monsieur le Comte, and he, too, for pass the Count, who was too eager to kill his man, felt an unpleasant sensation in his right shoulder. The seconds interposed, and blood was an end of the affair. It was his last duel. Some one produced a sketch of him as he appeared being thrown over of the hotel window, and ridiculously awful to a Frenchman—rid the country of him. The strawberry-eater was silent when the Battle of la Alma was fought, and is the only man to whom the above facts are known who never talks about them.

ANDREW REED, THE YOUNG WATCH-MAKER.

"IT is not surprising that the sons of Dr. ANDREW REED should wish to publish the history of his life of goodness and active benevolence—though, in fact, the most eminent records of his character and works exist in the many institutions which owe their existence to his activity and liberality. These are the words of the Queen of England in reference to a man who was the honored instrument of doing such a vast amount of good, and who undoubtedly ranks among the first philanthropists of the age.

Fond of books from infancy, his good mother not only treasured up every penny for him, but entered with all sympathy into his pursuits—became his companion and friend. Nor was his pious father forgetful of the most eminent duties, the confidence of his son. The boy was sent to a school in Islington, and made great progress. He studied with his whole heart, and decided that he should learn his father's trade, but the boy petitioned to be allowed to study Hebrew and Greek. The careful parent, knowing that such studies might interfere with his progress in business, had him apprenticed to a master. But the temptations of books and very harmless one compared with the temptations of another kind that awaited ANDREW in his new situation. His master's son was a wild youth, and the young apprentice entered on his diary the following: "By the wicked behavior of my master's son I was made still worse. I went twice or thrice to the accursed play-houses." On this account he got his indentures cancelled, and returned to the parental roof. Working the usual hours at watchmaking, in his leisure he kept his mother's books, instructed his younger brother, taught a little orphan girl, their servant, to read and write—thus early beginning his orphan work.

Books, however, became books, were the choice friends of his leisure hours; and though he worked well at his trade, his good mother in her loving simplicity said to him, "There will be more which, if the lad be for business, show too much taste for study." And she was so far right, that God was leading him from secular to sacred pursuits. ANDREW REED's Hebrew and Greek studies led him to theology, and his pious mother no longer was to be decided in the family councils that he should go to college. He dismantled his father's workshop, sold his tools, and laid out the money in books.

It is almost needless to say that he was a successful student, and entered on his learning college had many invitations to settle; but he ultimately became the minister of the church in the New Road, London, where he remained the useful and honored pastor for no less a period than fifty years.

In 1818 he married ELIZABETH HOLMES, who proved an efficient helpmeet in the work of his ministry and in his plans of benevolence. His extraordinary career as a philanthropist is worthy of record. He began his work among the sea-faring population of London. He befriended the parents, established schools for the children, and founded the first penny bank for savings. He founded the London Orphan Asylum, the patronage of which became so extensive that in 1825 a large building was erected as Clapton at a cost of £20,000. Afterward he established at Wanstead an Infant Orphan Asylum, the erection of the building costing £40,000. He founded a third Orphan Asylum at Needham, and also the Earlswood Asylum for Idiots.

Besides these stupendous works of faith and labors of love, Dr. REED founded a Home for Incurables; and, not forgetting the interests of education, while employed in helping the helpless, he was the friend of the Hackney Grammar School, and always the active promoter of Sabbath and day schools for the children of the industrial classes.

Those who knew Dr. REED best loved him most. Declining all offers of change, he staid, as we have recorded, with his beloved people as their pastor fifty years. On November 27, 1861, the anniversary of his birth, and of his ordination as their minister, he resigned his charge.

Amidst all his literary and other labors he did not think of writing his life. One of his sons, perceiving that his venerable father was fast failing, asked him if he had ever composed any memoir. DR. REED replied by writing the following notes: "TO MY SAUCY BOY WHO HAD BIN WORLD WHITE MY LIFE, AND ASKED FOR MATERIALS.

A. R.

I WAS BORN VIRTUOUS;
I SHALL DIE TO-MORROW;
AND I MUST SO SPEND TO-DAY TO TELLING A LIE ABOUT IT.
BUT IN DOING WHAT I MAY FOR HIM
WHO HAS DONE ALL FOR ME.
I SPRANG FROM THE PEOPLE: I HAVE LIVED FOR THE PEOPLE—
THE MOST FOR THE MOST UNHAPPY;
AND THE PEOPLE, WHEN THEY KNOW IT,
WILL NOT ALLOW ME TO DIE OUT OF LOVING REMEMBRANCE."

What can be added to such a summary?

He died, as he had lived, happy in his Master's service, and surrounded by the tokens of His love, February 25, 1862, aged 74. He had given out of his own limited means £4540 in personal charities, and £2000 in gifts of benevolence; and he was the means of raising funds to the amount of £1,043,566 13s. 1d. for the helpless and afflicted!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MOSS, VIZELLEY has written to the papers to say that his celebrated Fortunate Horse has not a particle of Algerine in his composition.

America appears to think the Cuban harvest is at last fit for carrying. If she fail to accomplish the work it will not be for want of Sickles!

BAD FOR THE RATS—The coming of the Chinese.

A GOOD TITLE FOR A BOOK.—"Will It Take?"

THE FIRST SUBJECT OF CANNIBALISM—Job, when he was boiled.

A FAVORITE GAME IN THE ARCTIC REGIONS.—"Old sledge" on the ice.

Should old acquaintance be forgot?—Not if they have money.

HOW BOOTH.—At the American celebration of Independence-day at Vienna, this year, a speaker, growing eloquent on the future of the country, gave a description of its boundaries given by an enthusiastic Yankee, which was as follows: "The sun rises in the Atlantic, on the north by the Aurora Borealis, on the west by the Pacific, and sets in the Gulf of Mexico."

FROM A POSTMASTER.

When you call at the office for your mail, and the postmaster hands it out, ask him if he has any.

If you ask for mail and he tells you there is none, tell him you don't believe it.

Don't bring the mail to the office until the mail closes, then count the postage out and unlocking the mail-bag and putting your letter in.

When you want a stamp on your letter, tell the postmaster to put it on.

Be sure to ask the postmaster to credit you with stamps, and if he has any accommodations about him to let you have them.

If you have a box, stand and drum on it until the postmaster hands you your mail; but don't insist on his feed, especially if he is waiting on some one else.

"If you had avoided rum," said a rum-seller to his customer, "you would have been a rich man long ago." "And if you had never sold rum," said the bacchanal, "you would have been my driver."

One of our young readers in the West sends us the following letter and poem:

DEAR EDITOR,—I found out a rime on the picture in this weeks weekly entitled A Little Peacemaker. I think it is worth a trial and you will greatly oblige by publishing. I am not quite fourteen yet and I have been reading the Bible out of Byrne. Whenever I feel so inclined I get a life of Shakespeare and read a few of his productions, but I have read so often that there were pieces of arrantic in the theme of the poem, that I am afraid I am getting odious and soon even that dodge may fail. I have been reading the Bible ever ten years old and therefore I have not much education. I followed the career of Sindbad the Sailor and those other personages whose adventures are set forth in dime novels, and after reading that I plunged into science on my own book. Dipping one day into one thing and the next day into another, and here I am knowing scarcely anything and so I guess I will stop

Yours truly,

THE LITTLE PEACEMAKER

Mama leading 'galint the mantle
With her face all in a pout
Pa—Ma what's the matter
Shows there's been a falling out

Lilly sitting on the carpet
Flaxen hair and blue eyes
Looks from one unto the other
With a grave surprise

Till at last she drops her Dolly
Rises with a little run
Passes Pa who tries in vain
Over the daily news to run

Catches mama's flutless fingers
Tugs away with all her might
And her baby voice of pleading
Puts an end to mama's fight

Dispersed angry feelings widely
As the wind would scatter chaff
Mother stooped and kissed her darling
Breaking in a merry laugh

Papa dropped his paper joyous
Caught sweet Lilly to his breast—
Now I'll stop, for more is useless
Let the reader guess the rest

"I say, Sam Johnsing," said Pete Gumbo, "what be you reckonin' 'bout dis yere 'lection, folks talk so much 'bout it." "Well, I doesn't exactly know, Pete," said Sam; "all my relations wot I knows on is la ole Virginny."

THE PANTIN TRAGEDY—THE DISCOVERY OF THE SIX CORPSES OF THE KINCK FAMILY IN LANGLOIS'S FIELD.—[See Page 697.]

THE PANTIN TRAGEDY.

No murder for many years has created an excitement so universal as the recent horrid butchery, in France, of Madame KINCK and her six children (besides an infant unborn), to whom must probably be added another victim—namely, Madame KINCK'S husband. The bodies of the mother and of five of the children—four sons and one daughter—were, on the 21st of September, accidentally discovered by a peasant in a field in the neighborhood of Pantin, a little village situated a short distance northward from Paris.

On the 22d the police had already ascertained that the deceased were the wife and children of JEAN KINCK, an engine-maker of Roubaix (a manufacturing town of the north of France), who had just left their native town in order to join their husband and father in Paris. As the latter and his eldest son, GUSTAVE KINCK, had both disappeared, it was at first supposed that they were the murderers. Certain discussions, to which money matters had given rise, in the family confirmed this suspicion; and, moreover, a mysterious young man, who had been stopping for the last ten days at a small inn near the railway-station of Pantin, had given his name as JEAN KINCK.

JEAN KINCK, the father, was possessed of a property of 80,000 francs, equal to $16,000 in gold. He had gone to Guebwiller, in Alsace, to establish a branch of his business. He was soon followed by his son GUSTAVE, a boy of about sixteen years of age, and it was settled that the entire family should shortly remove its residence to Guebwiller.

In a few days Madame KINCK sent to her husband 5500 francs by a registered letter. KINCK did not himself appear to receive this money, but the letter was called for by a young man representing himself as JEAN KINCK, but whose conduct excited suspicion, in consequence of which the letter was not given up to him. Meanwhile Madame KINCK regularly received letters from her husband, dated in Paris. These letters were not in his hand—but that was explained by an accident. In obedience, as she supposed, to her husband's request, she departed from Roubaix for Pantin, September 15.

She was ignorant of the fate which awaited her. For, instead of being about to join her husband, she was rushing into the arms of JEAN BAPTISTE TROPPMANN, his probable murderer—the young man who had attempted to obtain the registered letter at Guebwiller! She, with her children, was beguiled to the scene of the terrible tragedy about to be enacted. It was at night, and out in the solitary field the mother and the children were brutally butchered, being literally hacked to pieces by the assassin. The victims were hurriedly buried, with only a scanty covering of earth over their bodies.

The bodies first discovered did not include those of the father and son. This led to the supposition that they were the murderers. There had been some alteration between KINCK and his wife about the question of altering their residence, and this was brought forward as confirmatory of the husband's guilt. A story was framed out of the merest fantsy: JEAN KINCK was jealous, and had murdered his wife on account of some illicit amour.

While these conjectures were rife, TROPPMANN, the real assassin, was discovered. It was at Havre. TROPPMANN was taking his beer at a sailor's drinking saloon, No. 97 Rue Royale, when a marine gendarme, named FERRAND, who was going his rounds at 10 o'clock P.M. to drive tardy sailors on board their ships, saw him, and, from the descriptions he had received of the supposed Pantin murderer, suspected him, and took him to the police station. The two went out together and walked along the Rue Royale and the Quai aux Casernes. Presently FERRAND asked his quasi prisoner what was his name. "Wandergenburque," at least that is the nearest spelling that can be made out. FERRAND ol- served that it was a queer name, and asked him if it was really true that he had no papers. "Yes," he said, "I have some letters in Ger- man," showing them. FERRAND was by no means satisfied with the German letters, and said he should have to take him before the Pre- fecture Imperial, at the mention of which hone- rable functionary TROPMANN turned deadly pale. Something in this manner but conversational examination, FERRAND said: "You say you come for Mann, in Bourbon-street. What is your busi- ness—what is your trade?" "At Roubaix." "And where are you last from?" "Paris." The three men to whom Roubaix, Paris, were a revela- words, mechanic, Roubaix, Paris, were a revela- tion to the police. Instead of keeping his own counsel till he had his man in safe custody, he could not resist the temptation of giving a hint for more in the direction of the dock, where the man mounted HUTCHEL, who had already saved four lives, plunged into the water, and after a violent struggle—for TROPMANN did his best to drown himself and double HADGEL—the mur- derer was brought near enough to a boat to be pulled on board by FERRAND alive.

THE VICTIMS OF THE PANTIN TRAGEDY.

THE PANTIN TRAGEDY—STRUGGLE BETWEEN THE ASSASSIN TROPPMANN AND THE CALKER IN THE HAVRE BASIN.

TROPMANN being taken to Paris and to the Morgue, was shown the bodies of Madame KINCK and her children, laid out in their coffin- slabs, and he was asked if he recognized them.

"The prisoner," says the account in the Gau- lois, "looked a few steps along the corridor, and, with a sang froid no one present exhibited said, without moving a muscle of his face or faltering in his tone, as he pointed with his finger to each of the dead bodies, 'That is Madame KINCK; that is EMILIE; that is HENRY; that is ALFRED.' He said it as coolly as that is little MARY." TROPP- MANN finally admitted that he was an accom- plice in the murder, but claimed that he was only an instrument in the hands of the KINCKS, father and son. On the subsequent Sunday about 30,000 persons were attracted by curios- ity to the spot of blood at Pantin, and in the course of the day the remains of Gustave KINCK were discovered. There were very fair- entitled that he had been murdered at about the same time as the others. This discovery dis- proved the truth of TROPPMANN'S story. It is supposed that it was KINCK, the father, had also been murdered by TROPFMANN, being the first victim.

This tragedy has occasioned the greatest ex- citement. Figaro claims to have had an in- creased circulation of 30,000, on account of its detailed publication of all the incidents of the murder.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book III.

CHAPTER I.

AUNT AND NIECE.

IN the first shock of amazement at the calam- ity which had overtaken the family at the vica- rage, none of those who participated in it had had room in their hearts for the entertainment of any minor sensation of surprise.

But it was not very long—not many days, that is to say—before Lady Tallis, or, as her proper title now ran, Lady Tallis Gelo, began to won- der how Mr. Lovincourt had discovered her whereabouts, and to question Maud on the sub- ject.

The latter had been very ill during the first days of her stay in London. Grief and anxiety alone would not have prostrated the youthful vigor of her frame. But so many hours of emo- tions preceding a long night-journey, and so over- whelming a shock awaiting at the close of the journey—a shock to great need of which she had stricken down the young girl, and laid her on a bed of sickness.

Her aunt had her own delicacy of health and inert habits to tend Maud. She would scarcely allow a servant to come near the suffering girl, but waited on her day and night with tender care.

In spite of the terrible circumstances which had brought Maud to London, in spite of the dreadful discovery that the man who had been guilty of the murders of Veronica, and Lucy- ne the husband who had wrought, outraged, and finally abandoned herself, it would not be too much to say that Hilda Tallis enjoyed the first moments of happiness she had known dur- ing many weary years by the bedside of her sis- ter's child.

It was sweet to feel that there was some one bound by the ties of blood to feel kindly toward her. It was still sweeter to find a being who— at least for a time—depended upon her for love, and care, and tenderness.

The poor lonely wife, in the first days of the discovery that her husband had ceased to feel for her even such love as can be inspired by a fair face, had longed with all her heart for a child.

The conduct of Sir John Tallis, which had gone on deepening through every shade, from gray indifference down to absolutely black bru- tality, had effectually quenched whatever germ of regard for him poor Hilda might once have cherished. But for some time she clung to the idea that he would be kinder to her if there were any prospect of her bringing him an heir. She was the kind of woman who would probably have loved her children better than her husband, even had that husband been good and affectionate.

She would have enjoyed superintending the government of a nursery, and have craved for no other compensation than that of her pret- ty little babies.

The dependency of sickness made Maud ap- pear almost like a child in her arms. Lady Tallis herself was more than needful devo- tion. She was jealous of any person save her- self approaching Maud's sick-room, or supplying her demands. And had Maud been the most fretful and imperious of invalids, instead of be- ing a gentle, thoroughly patient and self-con- trolled, Lady Tallis would have joyfully indulged her in every whim.

In a few days, however, the illness passed away, and Maud insisted on rising although Lady Tallis declared that she ought not to leave her bed for at least another week.

The vicar remained in London until Maud's health was re-established. He lingered about the house in a lower room, hiding, and would seldom consent to enter Lady Tallis's quar- ments; but he informed himself daily of his ward's condition.

At length, after rather more than a fortnight's sojourn in London, he returned to Yorkshire.

"It is painful to go back," said he, in his farewell interview with Maud.

"Must you go, Uncle Jasper?" she asked, her eyes brimming with tears, which she kept from falling by a strong effort of will.

"Must I go? Yes, I must give up the vicar- age. I can not exist without it. I can not af- ford to pay another man to do my duty there, and presume enough to live in Hugh's pla ce off the evil day a while longer. But to what purpose? The sight of the place—the very name of the place—is loathsome to me. But what can I do?"

"I wish I could help you."

"You can not help me, Maudie. No one can help me."

Then Maud asked a timid faltering question, finding her and trembling away her hand as she spoke. Had he heard any tidings of—of the fugitives?

She would not see his face, but his voice was very stern and deep as he answered her. They had gone abroad together, he had learned. Gone to Italy. It mattered nothing to what place. She was dead to him henceforward. Maud must mention her name no more. He had answered her question, but she must not venture to ever to speak to him of his lost daughter more.

"I can not promise it, dear Uncle Charles," said Maud, no longer able to restrain her tears.

"Hush! Do not you separate yourself from me too!"

"No, no! I shall always love you, and be grateful to you. But I—I can not make that promise. Some day you might be glad yourself that I did not make it."

Mr. Levincourt rose. "Good-by, Maud," he said, solemnly. "The time is coming near for my departure. I have but a couple of hours be- fore leaving London."

He was cold and chilled the door.

She heard his footsteps descending the stairs slowly and heavily. He paused, came back, and re-entering the room which she was silently weeping, took her in his arms and kissed her forehead. She clung to him, sobbing: "Oh, dear Uncle, what misery you have made your- self coming back. You are not angry with me, dear Uncle Charles?"

"No, no, not angry—never angry with thee, my sweet childie. God bless thee, Maud! God forever bless thee!"

"You will write to me, Uncle Charles, will you not?"

"I—perhaps—well, well, I will write you."

"And I may come and stay with you again some day? If even it is but for a time, I may come? You will be so lonely!" she added, with a passionate burst of tears.

"Heaven knows, my child! It may be that some days—Good-by, Maud. God Almighty bless and guard you forever!"

Then he went away.

Lady Tallis's conversations in her behavior to her niece were all kindness, but it often happened that she inflicted pain from want of judgment. On the evening of the day on which Mr. Lovincourt interview took place Lady Tallis's garrulity was grateful to Maud's feelings. So long as her aunt could talk on indifferent subjects, and let her listen in silence, or at most with the occasional contribution of a monosyllable, the young girl was able to retain a composure and quietude that were soothing to mind and body.

Lady Tallis's conversation rambled on dis- cursively from topic to topic. She talked of scenes familiar to her own childhood, and of persons who died before Maud was born, as though the latter must necessarily be thoroughly acquainted with what she knew so well.

All at once she bird down her work, and ex- claimed: "Oh, by-the-by, Maud, since I spoke last thing I particularly wanted to say to ye, and I have never said it yet!"

Maud was beginning to understand that her aunt's emphasis was by no means always pro- portioned to the importance of that which she had to say: at least as far as she (Maud) could judge of the relative amount of importance that Maud fairly be attributed to Lady Tallis's speech- es. She was, therefore, less startled than she might have been a fortnight earlier by her aunt's impressive announcement.

"What is it that you wanted to say, Aunt Hilda?"

"Why, my goodness, my darling child, I won- der how in the world I never asked the question before! It has been in my mind hundreds of times!"

Maud waited patiently, with an attentive face.

"How in the world did you and Mr. Levin- court find out that I was living here? Dye know, my dear, I am perfectly astonished to remember that I was not more astonished at the time! Can ye understand that state of mind? I was all upset by such a sudden, unex- pected kind of thing altogether, that I suppose a little wonder more or less didn't make much dif- ference?"

"Our coming straight to the place where you lived was a mere chance, Aunt Hilda. We came here merely for rest, and not a very strong one, that we might stay near Delaney and Mrs. Lockwood. And even then we should not have found you out but that Uncle Charles's card been carried up to Mrs. Lockwood with an in- quiry for Lady Tallis written on it. Otherwise, for you are now Lady Gelo, we should have mi-sed you, though you were so close to us. But Mrs. Lockwood knew at once that you were the person we were asking for."

"And did ye know Mrs. Lockwood? Why, now, just imagine how never mentioning to me in the most distant manner that she had the smallest acquaintance with any of the family! I declare it is most provoking, and that the first time I have spoken to her of my niece! For, my darling, I needn't say that if we have been separated all these years it has not been from any indiffer- ence on my part!"

Maud explained that she had never been seen or known by Mrs. Lockwood, but that she had met her son at a country house; and that the name was spoken of Lady Tallis, and of the manner in which he and his mother had made her lady- ship's acquaintance.

"It's all perfectly true, my dear, very ylike, ble of it!" said Lady Tallis, with as much so- lemnity of corroboration as though Maud had expressed the gravest doubts of Mr. Hugh Lock- wood's veracity.

"Yes, aunt; I did not feel any doubt of that," she answered.

"No, ye need not, child. An exceeding anni- able and gentleman-like young man he is. And his mother is a delightful person. I called on her accordingly, when I came to live in Lon- don. I was staying in a boarding-house; and that's what I would never advise any one I care for to do that ever they had to live! Oh, the upon my honor and word, the dreariness and misery of the boarding-houses I have been in- duced to patronize! I thought I would find something like society, but, oh dear me! the people you have to put up with are something to make one shudder, that wasn't what I was going to tell ye. Well, I asked Mrs. Lockwood did she happen to know of any respectable lodg- ings in her neighborhood. For I was resolved to get quit of boarding-houses altogether. And I behind it that a friend of some business-man- that would say a kind word to me once a month or so; for, indeed, child, I was very lonely."

"Poor Aunt Hilda!" whispered Maud, strok- ing Lady Tallis's thin hand.

"Oh, indeed ye may say 'rich Aunt Hilda,' now I have Mary Anne. Here, let me put this foot-stool under your feet. Nonsense, child, about 'troubling myself.' You're not half as strong yet as ye think yourself, Miss Fever! Well, so inst fancy my delight when she said that she would be very glad to let the first-floor of her own house, and that I need not go near! My dear, I jumped at it. And here I am, and extremely comfortable it is. And cheap. For you know, my dear child, that I have not an absurdity about of money. Sometimes I have much ado to get any at all. Well, there, then, we won't say any more about that matter. But ye'll like Mrs. Lockwood—oh indeed ye will!"

"Is she—I mean is her son at all like her?"

"Not the smallest bit in the world," rejoined Lady Tallis, with a sort of almost triumphant emphasis. "Not one atom. I never, in the whole course of things, saw a mother and son more entirely unlike each other."

"Oh!"

"Entirely unlike each other. Why, now, the young man—Hugh—is a strapping handsome young fellow as you'll be likely to meet in a long summer's day. Isn't he?"

"Oh yes."

"Well? Upon my honor, you don't seem more than half to agree with me. But I can tell you that if you don't think Hugh Lockwood a remarkably handsome, you are more than fas- tidious than the girls used to be in my time. It may be true that he hasn't quite the grand air, and all your notions of a Duchess's son or your grandpapa you may object to that. Hugh certainly is tant soit peu bourgeois."

"Oh, I think Mr. Lockwood is—is all thought of Lowater House—that Mr. Lockwood was thor- oughly a gentleman."

"Well, I'm delighted to hear it. I fancied you were turning up your nose at him a little. How flushed you are, child! Let me feel your forehead. No, I don't see any appearance of fever. And now the color is fading away again. I shall send you to bed at nine o'clock—not a moment later."

"Very well, Aunt Hilda. But you were say- ing—that—that Mrs. Lockwood—"

"Oh, to be sure. Yes, let me see. Mrs. Lockwood— Oh, now I have it! I was say- ing that she is so unlike her son, wasn't I? Well she is. He is, as I said, a strapping, ro- bust-looking creature. I suppose he inherits his burliness from his peasant ancestors. His father's father, you know, was— Ah! you do know all about it? Yes—quite rustics. And though is not in the least ashamed of his grand- father."

"Ashamed! Why should he be ashamed?"

"Well, my dear, if you come to that, why should we be proud of our ancestors? Upon my word, I don't know. Still, there is a kind of feeling. However, Hugh is too manly and up- right for any mean pretensions, and I quite re- spect him for it. But as to his mother, she is the tiniest fairy of a woman you ever saw in all your days. She really is more like one of the 'good people' that our old nurse at Delaney used to tell us about than any thing else—in size, I mean—for there is nothing fairy-like about her. Ah!"

"I am sure to like her for her kindness to you, Aunt Hilda."

"Indeed, she is very kind. And so thought- ful! and has such good manners! She came over to see me the day after I was in bed, and inquired about you. But she never intrudes. But I thought of asking her to take tea with us quiet- ly some evening, if you don't mind. The new her son is not at home she is lonely too. And before I had you, Maudie, I was very glad of Mrs. Lockwood's company."

Maud, of course, begged that her aunt would invite Mrs. Lockwood as often as she chose. But in truth she shrank from that as from a stranger. There was no hour of the day when Veronica was absent from her thoughts. There had been no separation for the twelve hour that had fallen. She had bade Veronica fare- well that night at Lowater House with no faint- est foreboden of what was to follow. The tormented herself sometimes with the idea that if she (Maud) had returned to the vicarage and remained with Veronica she would never have happened. There were moments when she longed, with a painfully intense longing, to set forth to follow her unhappy girl to Italy, and bring her back, and soothe and cherish her, and shelter her among them again. She could not understand how her guardian should abandon his daughter without an effort. Then the doubt arose whether Veronica herself would consent to return.

"If I could go to her, see her, and persuade her, she would come back; she would!" was the dreadful man. She can not care for him—"

So ran her thoughts. And then the remem- brance would arise that this a sudden love, that the man was the husband of her mother's sis- ter; and she would hide her face in her trem- bling hands, and shudder with a confused sensa- tion of terror.

She was spared the spectacle of any acute suf- fering on the part of her aunt.

Lady Tallis made to pretensions to outraged wifely affection. All such sentiment had been killed in her long before. Had she been a less curious phase of feeling—the last faint protest of her trampled self-respect—the one drop of blood that remained to show that she had once had a heart Veronica with something as near rancor as could be entertained by a character so flavor- less, meek, and weak.

Maud shrank with instinctive delicacy from any mention of Veronica to the wife of Sir John Tallis. But her aunt was under no restraint of the vicar's daughter on one or two occasions; and had mentioned her in terms that caused Maud the most exquisite pain. The confusion of the latter to all concerned in this misery and shame were peculiarly complicated and delicate. And the unvarying gulf strove to heal her grief. Maud's was still the same nature which had caused Mrs. Levincourt to characterize her as a "child of nothing," when she had suppressed her childish tears at sight of the strange faces in her new home. Mrs. Levincourt never knew that they in the little crib had been wetted that first night with bitter, but silent tears. Maud could bear the pain of her wound, but she could not bear that it should be ap- proached by a coarse or unsympathizing touch.

For all these reasons, and from the knowl- edge, specially acquired, that her aunt was too entirely devoid of dignity to be reticent upon any subject which interested her deeply, Maud looked forward with nervous dread to the introduction of Mrs. Lockwood into Lady Tal- lis's drawing-room.

CHAPTER II.

THE LOCKWOODS.

ZILLAH LOCKWOOD was a very remarkable- looking woman. It was not merely the small- ness of her stature that made her so. She was, as Lady Tallis had said, extremely fragile and spare like, but very delicate, with slender hands and feet, and an upright straight figure. But this small, frail creature conveyed an almost startling impression of power and authority. Maud looked forward with nervous dread to the introduction of Mrs. Lockwood into Lady Tal- lis's drawing-room.

Those who remembered Zillah Lockwood in her youth declared that she had been enchant- ingly pretty. It was not difficult to believe she had ever been so, in the strict sense of the word. There could be no doubt, however, that she was most attractive in appearance at attrac- tive face. And it was perhaps even more gener- ally attractive at fifty years of age than it had been at twenty. Her hair, of a pale gray of ing hair, soft, fine, and carefully dressed. Her fore- head was low and broad; her eyes dark and black and sparkling, but their lids were discolored, and there was a failed. Many look about the whole setting and surrounding of her eyes that contrast- ed with the fresh, delicate paleness of the rest of her complexion.

"Crying spoils the eyes. Years ago I cried, almost incessantly, for six weeks," she once said, quietly, to one who remarked this peculiarity of her face. "I was told that I was told me that I was risk- ing total loss of sight. So then I got frightened, and left off weeping—with my eyes."

Her jaw was slightly what is called underhung, and when the lips met and closed firmly (as they habitually did when her face was in repose) this peculiarity gave an expression of singular resolution to her mouth. It looked as though it were forcibly compressed by a special effort of her will. The upper lip was thin and straight. When she spoke, she showed two perfect ranges of small sharp teeth.

Her whole person was pervaded by an air of scrupulous and dainty neatness. Her hands were black, and her head was adorned, not covered, by a white muslin cap, whose crisply-frilled border of tulle rose like a nimbus above her face. The collar at her throat and the cuffs at her wrists were of plain linen in the morning, of lace in the evening, and in either case were guiltless of soil or stain.

"How she does it in this smoky London is more than I can conceive!" would poor Lady Tallis exclaim, casting a pathetic glance on her own dingy and crumpled garments. But her ladyship was one of those unfortunate persons for whose clothes dust and smoke and stains seem to have a mysterious attraction. "Sends" them on her collar, and settled there fondly. Dust eddied round her in suffocating clouds whenever she ventured into the streets, or else she found herself wading ankle-deep in mud. Gravy splashed itself over her sleeves at dinner; ink pervaded her person when she wrote a letter; and the grease from lamp or candle dropped on her silk garment with a frequency which almost seemed to argue conscious malice.

The first impression which Maud Desmond derived from Mrs. Lockwood's appearance and manner was a sense of relief.

She had half expected a vulgar, bustling, good-natured, noisy woman. Maud had gained sufficient knowledge of Lady Tallis to be aware that her perceptions were not acute, nor her taste refined. Indeed Maud, in pondering upon her aunt's character, was frequently forced to face with problems, the pursuit of which would have led her into deeper speculations than she contemplated engaging. Why was Mr. Lockman, gently born and bred, endowed with blunter sensibilities, duller brains, coarser—yes, truly coarser—manners than the poor widow of a humble artist, who sprang from mean obscurity and eked out her living as a letter of lodgings? And of the two sons, Hilda and Clive Delaney, had one been a refined, graceful, elegant gentlewoman, and the other—which a woman is Lady Tallis? Maud remembered her mother, and contrasted her bearing and manners with Lady Tallis's. Miss Desmond presented herself as a woman to be kind, thoughtful, and well-mannered, those persons who knew the speaker would have expected the object of her speech to be one whose society might be pleasant to the most fastidious. But when Hilda Tallis used the same phrases, Maud perfectly understood that they must be accepted with due reservations.

Her first sensation on meeting Mrs. Lockwood was, therefore, that she had been mistaken, a sense of relief. It was soon evident that there was no room for Mrs. Lockwood's failing in discrimination or taste.

"You met my son at Lowater House, Miss Desmond?" said Mrs. Lockwood, stitching away with undiminished vigor at the bed of a little chief. She had been drinking tea with Lady Tallis, and had seen Maud for the first time that evening.

"Yes. Mr. Lockwood was staying there at the same time with myself."

"Captain Sheardown has always been very kind to Hugh. His father, Admiral Sheardown, was my husband's earliest friend and patron. The admiral had a great taste for art."

"So had poor papa!" exclaimed Lady Tallis. "I remember Clara—your dear mother, my sister—had a very good taste for flower painting. And papa had a master from Dublin to stay in the house nearly the whole of the summer that Clara came out. My brother James and I couldn't endure him! Sure he was the snuffiest old wretch that ever lived. He would plague his life out by hiding his snuff-box."

"I expect Hugh bore most week," pursued Mrs. Lockwood calmly.

"And, indeed, I will be delighted to see him again," said her ladyship. "He is a pearl of young men."

"I don't know about being a pearl," said Mrs. Lockwood; "but Hugh is a good son.. I think he is on the whole a good man."

"Of course he is! Why wouldn't he be? Hugh is an excellent creature."

"It is a high encomium to make. In all my life I have only met with two good men."

"Well now, on my honor, I do believe there are a great many good men in the world—if one only knew where to find them!" said Lady Tallis. Then she added, "As for you, you ought to go down to Lowater House, and thank Heaven for such a son as Hugh. Oh, if I had only had a boy like that I'd have doted on him!"

Her last sentence possible smile flitted over Mrs. Lockwood's face. She kept her eyes fixed on her work, as she answered, "I have a sneaking kindness for Hugh myself. But he has his faults."

"I don't believe he has a fault in the world!" protested Lady Tallis, energetically.

"I can assure you that he has, though! Among others, extraordinary. Hugh is very obstinate. Ask Miss Desmond if she did not get the impression that my son has a strong will of his own."

Maud had been listening silently to the talk of the two elder women, and had been watching Mrs. Lockwood's face with an intentness that would have been ill-mannered had it not been for the fact that the latter kept her head cast down on her work, and so was unconscious of the young girl's close observation. Maud was a little disconcerted when the heavy dark lids were suddenly raised, and the bright eyes beneath them were fixed upon her face.

"Oh, I—I don't know," she said. "I suppose a man ought to have a strong will."

"And a woman—?

"Oh, a woman," interrupted Lady Tallis, "must just make up her mind to have no will at all! You must fight and struggle, but a man is always the strongest, as bout du compte! And as he has all the power, I don't see what use her self can be to her."

"Is that your philosophy, Miss Desmond?"

"Oh, I? I don't think I have any philosophy," answered Maud, simply.

"At all events, rightly or wrongly, my son is obstinate, and he wishes me to take a step that I think ought to be deferred yet a while. He is dying to set up on his own account, as the phrase goes. Digby and Long, with whom he was articled, have offered to keep him in their office on advantageous terms, for a couple of years. At the end of that time he will be in full practice. I might hankers after the two in the bush. We shall see. I am afraid Captain Sheardown's councils have confirmed Hugh in his desire. My son writes me that several of his father's old friends in the neighborhood of Shipley and Danecester have been encouraging him to make a start in practice, and have been promising him all sorts of things. Hugh is only twenty-four years old; and he begins to see most of what is said to him."

"I am quite sure," said Maud, with some warmth, "that Captain Sheardown would say nothing that he did not mean."

"Doubtless. But promises impossible of fulfilment are made with the most perfect sincerity every day."

After a little more desultory chat Mrs. Lockwood folded up her work, and went away, saying that she would see Miss Desmond to go to rest: and that she would prepare with her own hand a basin of arrow-root for Lady Tallis, who, in Hilda, was not looking strong, she said.

"My arrow-root is excellent, I assure you," said Mrs. Lockwood to Maud, "I have a receipt for it, and a certificate. I am a very fair cook, am I not, my lady?"

"Indeed, I don't know the thing you can not do, if you try!" said Lady Tallis, enthusiastically. And, when Mrs. Lockwood was gone, she descended to Maud on the subject of Hilda's good qualities in a strain of unmixed eulogy.

"Now, are you not enchanted with her?" she asked of her niece.

"I—yes; I like her very much. She is very clever, I think."

"Oh, clever's no word for it. She is an extraordinary little creature; quite extraordinary. You don't know all that's in that head of hers yet, I dare say, Maud."

"I should imagine that she has known much sorrow and trouble," said Maud, musingly. "I wonder what her history is?"

"Oh, as to that," rejoined her ladyship, to whom the suggestion appeared to be a new one, "I will ask her to-morrow. I'll tell you all she and Hugh have quite humble people."

"But, aunt, she has evidently received a good education, and she has the manners of a lady, moreover. Did you not notice her voice, her mode of speech? Both took that lay on the table, how admirably she pronounced it?"

"My dear child, for that matter, we had a dancing-mistress once who spoke French beautifully! And she was quite an ignorant person. Her father was a Parisian refugee, and she could not be called herself Mademoiselle de Something or other. I forget the name now. Any way, Mrs. Lockwood is very superior to her!"

The incoherence of these remarks, and the impossibility of conjecturing what it was they intended to prove, silenced Maud.

Presently Lady Tallis exclaimed, in a sudden, pouncing way, which her delicacy alone prevented from being startling, "Maud, my dear, I haven't told me yet how you like my little Queen of the Fairies!"

"Yes, aunt, I said that I liked Mrs. Lockwood very much: only—"

"Only what?"

"Well, it seems rather a pity that she should take such a gloomy view of things, does it not?"

"Gloomy? Now upon my word and honor a wonderfully little creature! I never saw or heard of! That is my notion, my dear girl."

"Gloomy is not the right word, either."

"Very much the right word, I should say."

"Yes; but what I mean is, that—that— It is rather difficult to explain. Mrs. Lockwood is very clever, and it is not because she finds things to be good, Aunt Hilda."

"Well, then, all the more credit to her for being cheerful."

"I think she would be more likely to be credited of an evil report than of cheerfulness, if because she is ill-natured, but because she expects evil to happen, and thinks it likely. I am sure that she must have had some great trouble in her life."

At the beginning of the following week Hugh Lockwood returned home.

He had, of course, already learned from his mother the fact that Lady Tallis and her niece were inmates of the house in Lamb's Court.

He was able to inform his mother of many particulars of the blow which had fallen on the family at the vineyard. The whole country was ringing with the story. Hugh had heard it discussed in all sorts of tones, by all sorts of people.

A great number were inclined to blame Mr. Levincourt severely for having been culpably negligent in regard to his daughter's association with a man like Sir John Gale. On the other hand, many persons (especially matrons of Mrs. Beggs's stamp) declared that belts and hats would not have sufficed to keep Veronica Levincourt in respectable obscurity; that they had always known, always seen, always prophesied, how it would end; that the girl's vanity and coquetry had long made them cautious of permitting her to associate with their daughters; and that it was all very well to blame the man—of course he was a wretch! no doubt of it!—but he must have been regularly hunted down, you know, by that artful, abandoned, dreadful, dreadful girl!

"There is nothing so cruel as the cruelty of one woman to another!" said Hugh, after recounting some of the things he had overheard.

"Is there not?" said Mrs. Lockwood, composedly. "And Mrs. Sheardown," she pursued, after a moment's pause, "she has one among the number of the cruel?"

"No; Mrs. Sheardown could not be cruel. No, she is not cruel. But she is—even she is—a little hard on the girl."

"If so!" said Miss Levincourt so very hand some as they say? You have seen her?"

"Yes; I saw her at Lowater. She is strikingly handsome. I don't know that I ever saw such eyes and such coloring—"

"And not vain or coquettish, as these 'cruel women say?"

"I—well, yes, I think she is fond of admiration. But her manner was very charming."

"That is charming, Hugh: that love of admiration. Masculine vanity is always tickled by the implied flattery of a pretty woman's airs and graces."

"Flattery!"

"To be sure. Haughty or explicit, stately or languishing, such a coquette wants to give attention; and that flatters you. How many men, do you suppose, would have been Veronica Levincourt's victims if they had not been flattered by her?"

"Mrs. Sheardown did not care two straws whether they looked at her or not."

"Yes, Hugh, that is the most masculine vanity, I can truly say that I never in all my life saw a girl whom I should have been less likely to fall in love with than Veronica Levincourt."

"That was fortunate for you!"

"Good, kind Mrs. Sheardown thought me in some danger, I believe. She doped a week or two of warning— That man must be as black a scoundrel as ever existed!" cried Hugh, suddenly breaking off.

"Is the identity on Sir John Gale with Sir John Tallis known in Shipley?"

"Yes. It was known from your letters. But, except to the Sheardowns, I said no word of the matter. But an old woman who was staying at Dr. Beggs's—certain Betsy Cox—has wrote up to some gossip-mongering crony in London for information about Sir John Gale. And that was why I came down to Shipley."

"Of course you did not see Mr. Levincourt again?"

"No one has seen him except his own servants and little Flew, the surgeon, since his daughter's flight."

"Not even in church?"

"Oh, in church, of course, he has been seen. The Sheardowns' pew-opener said away from the Gildas the first Sunday after the vicar's return. But I was told that the rustics, who compose the majority of the congregation, behaved with more delicacy than might have been expected from them. They kept out of the vicar's way on leaving church; and those who did see him contented themselves with silently touching their hats, and passing on. By-the-way, the person who told me all this is distinctly cut up by this dreadful affair. It is a certain Mr. Flew, a surgeon, and a really good little fellow. The village gossips say that he has a second-slave of Miss Levincourt. I never saw a man look more miserable. He fought her battles tooth and nail until it became known that Sir John Gale had a wife already. Then, of course, there was no more to be said of the girl's being married to him. But, although Flew is a gentlemanly-looking little fellow you ever saw, I should not care to be in the shoes of any man who spoke an ill word of Miss Levincourt in his hearing. I said the Shipley folks understand this so well, that if a group of them are discussing the unfortunate daughter, they break off at Flew's approach as though he were her brother. He is a loyal little fellow, and I am sorry for him with all my heart."

"He must be a very uncommon sort of man," observed Mrs. Lockwood, dryly.

"Ah, mother, perhaps!" exclaimed Hugh, kissing her forehead, and looking at her half fondly, half sadly, "our old quarrel! I can not understand how it is that such a good woman as you are should find it so hard to believe in goodness."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

SAXBY, an English naval officer, prophesied that a great flood would occur between the 5th and 6th of October, and also some time during the month of November in 1866. November is not in my prospect, but there have been floods enough in October to put Saxby among the prophets for all time. To be sure the first flood came a little before its time, and some of the others were not quite punctual, but meteorological science is not strong in exactness. Certain astronomers, also, calculated that the 8th of October would be the most unlucky Friday the 13th had known for many years, in consequence of the extraordinary attraction of the moon just about that time; but the 13th came and went, and nothing more never before approximated. But although one of the two papers from which I have taken the statement of the weather prophets, announced in a wonderful paragraph that all Broadway had been blown down, the new post-office site leveled with the ground, Central Park completely uncooked; that the high tide had almost depopulated the city, some few hundreds only being saved by clinging to Trinity steeple and the telegraph poles; that the editor himself was writing under some twenty feet of water; and that if the reader did not believe it he must ask the weather prophets—yet the people of the city, in general, was unconscious of such extreme suffering! Every body was so much rejoiced at the ample supply of Croton that they probably did not observe any special atmospheric changes. But the heavy rains and freshets of the last week threw down all records of fearful destruction throughout the country. October, 1869, will long be remembered as the date of one of the most extensive and desolating freshets ever experienced in the Eastern and Middle States.

Incidents of the great flood continue to come in from various quarters. Many small towns and villages have been almost cut off from communication with the outer world in consequence of the loss of bridges, the breaking away of highways, and the necessary suspension of travel. Large bridges have not been must singular of the many sad desolations caused by the freshet occurred in Phillips, a hitherto flourishing and beautiful town in Maine. Not only were scores of houses submerged, streets rendered impassable by black alluvial earth-work, and all the wood bridges floated away, and trees uprooted and broken to pieces, but the beautiful cemetery was completely ruined. The water swept with destructive force over it, and every stone and monument was moved from its place. Graves were washed into shallow fields; some broken; the iron fences inclosing lots were twisted into shapeless forms; and, sadder still, many of the graves were washed open, and the dead coffins in they were floated away. Some were found miles away; others have not been recovered. The body of one man who died last spring was found upon his own farm, at some distance from the cemetery. The whole neighborhood was in a state of desolation and ruin: but this invasion of the resting-place of the dead is most painful of all.

A wedding has taken place in St. John's Church, Sligo, Ireland, which created great amusement; the united ages of the couple being 191 years.

A wide and important field of inquiry is opened to the medical profession by the conflicting statements in regard to the utility of vaccination as a protection in small-pox. Many eminent men in Europe declare that the influence of vaccination upon the system is only temporary, and that the system is not protected against that dreaded disease. It is also affirmed that even when no new attack of small-pox occurs, the constitute diseases than those who have been vaccinated. On the other hand, many equally eminent physicians give their testimony from facts and from long experience, in favor of vaccination. "Who shall decide, when doctors disagree?" In the mean time, until this subject is worthy the most careful consideration and investigation of the most able physicians in the world.

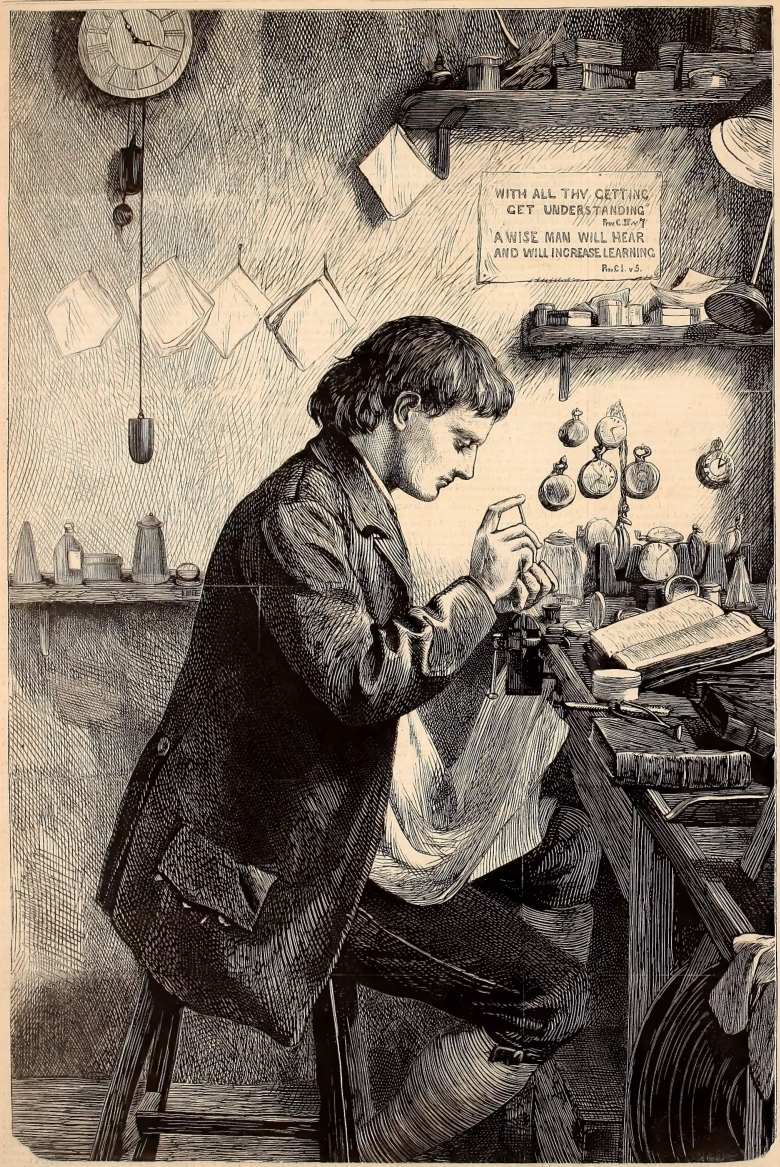
A School for Cooks has been discovered for the benefit dqôt of the Union Pacific Railroad, in Omaha. A saloon-keeper known by the name of "Billy Mack" has been in the habit of enticing boys into his saloon, giving them lunchtions in petty thieving, and purchasing from them the articles stolen. Twelve or Twelve or fifteen boys have nightly slept at his establishment.

Modern science regards insanity as merely a symptom of cerebral disease, which is quite as susceptible of medical treatment as other forms of bodily ailments. The universal opinion that the present system of charge of institutions for the insane is to the effect that when insane persons are kept only and judicious treatment from eighty to ninety per cent. will recover. In accordance with this modern view, a new hospital for the cure of the insane was lately erected near Philadelphia, the site being exceedingly beautiful, and affording magnificent views of the surrounding country. The contesting of two hundred and six acres fronting on the Hudson River, was presented to the State of New York for the ultimate site of a hospital. The work commenced on the building last in the season of 1867, ranging little more than one year. In 1868 one section of two hundred and thirty feet in length was completed; and another section over three hundred feet long will be finished next year. These two sections will accommodate about seventy-five patients, and will probably be ready for occupation in the course of a year.

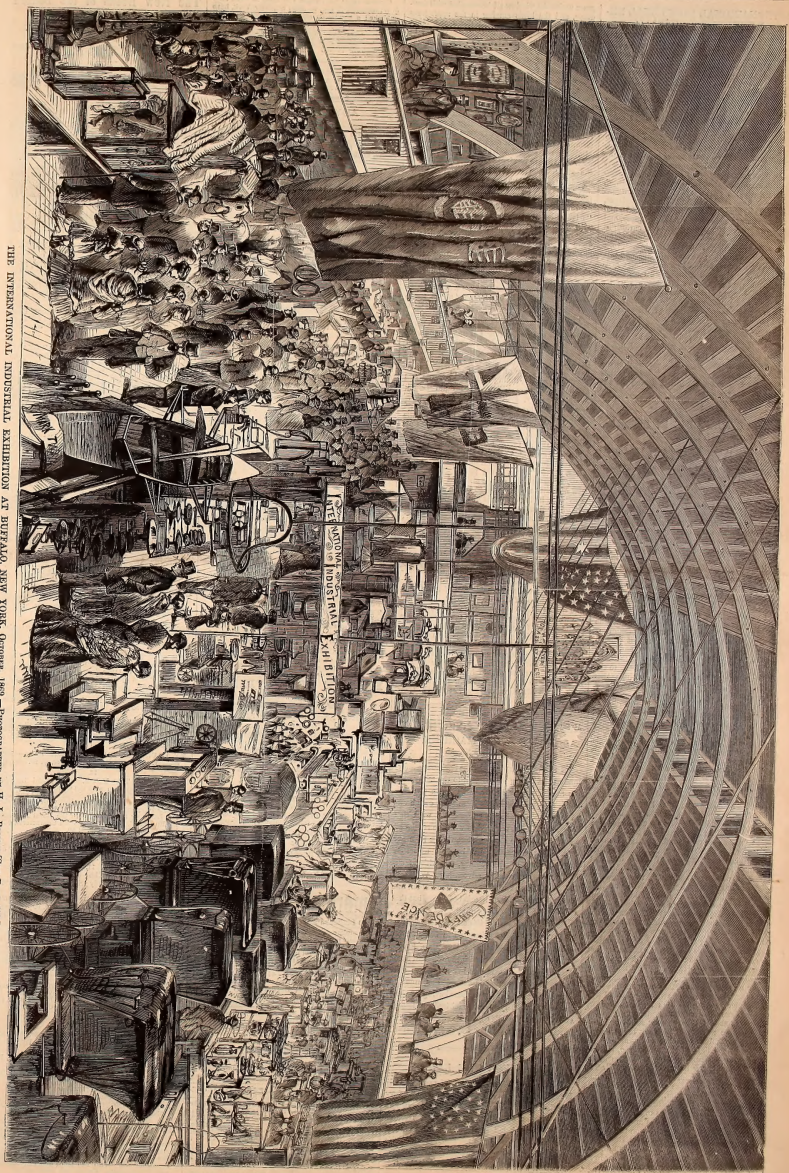
Titusville, Pennsylvania, is—if reports are true—a remarkable place. Within one week, recently, four weddings took place there; the four bridegrooms were all merchants; they did business on the same street, and occupied stores next door to each other; widowers; and last, but most least, in the aggregate they have all thirteen children.

The annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was this year held at Roxbury. Three hundred and seventy delegates are at present connected with the Board. The support of eighteen of the female missionaries has been assumed by the Woman's Board of Missions. In the Armenian missions sixty-five churches have been gathered, and are now under the care of native pastors, and sustained wholly or in part by their own people. Three hundred new members were added to these churches last year. There is a large native membership of about three thousand. The average attendance on Sabbath worship in the Armenian churches is about eleven thousand. More than one hundred young men are in training for the ministry in the seminaries at Aintoub in Marsovan, Bebek, and Harpoot. In Syria the event of the year has been the organization of the seminary for the education of a native ministry; and never has there been a brighter day in the history of the Syrian mission than the present. In India and more laborers. Eleven missionaries have gone to China within the year, and six more will soon follow. Four new stations will be established in China. The Hawaiian Missionary Board employs a missionary who is a native Hawaiian among the Chinese population of the Islands, which numbers over 1800.

Did it ever occur to you when lacing up your boot over much learn—not to take advantage of the modern—are expressed in this one fact, that the ancients wrought ornament into, or upon, what was useful, while the moderns take great pains, and apply the choicest materials, to fashion something which, though it have the form of usefulness, is never to be used, and is purely ornamental. This idea is fully exemplified when you see a drinking vessel, or a vase, end up on a bracket, a thing of beauty, except for the purpose of being shown as an ornament.



ANDREW REED, THE YOUNG WATCH-MAKER.—[See Page 695.]



THE INTERNATIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION AT BUFFALO, NEW YORK, OCTOBER, 1869.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY H. L. BIRD.—[SEE PAGE 702.]

INTERNATIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION AT BUFFALO.

THE First Annual International Exhibition was opened under the auspices of the Mechanics' Institute at Buffalo, October 6. The Rink, in which the exhibition was held, is 225 feet long by 100 feet wide, and, in addition to the main floor, great facilities for the exhibition of articles were afforded on the stage, and in the upper and lower galleries, which extended along the sides and ends of the building. The arrangements made evinced great taste, and the whole affair was an honor to the city of Buffalo.

The main floor was divided into five aisles. At the west end of the Rink a stage was located, being one of the most attractive portions of the interior. The exhibition included every variety of industry. There were fine specimens of photography, illuminated printing, wood engraving, electrotyping, and lithography. . . . There were sewing-machines; household furniture; carriages, clocks, and silver ware; furs, woollen goods, and dress patterns; stationery, crockery, cutlery, and glass-ware; wood and willow-ware; curiosities in hair-work and wax-work; carvings in bone, ivory, and wood; specimens of ladies' handiwork of every description; varieties of oils and artists' materials; models of new inventions; artificial limbs and dental machinery; agricultural implements; specimens of architectural work; native woods; musical instruments; upholstery; chromos and paintings; articles of verta; machinery, and, indeed, specimens of every department of human art and industry.

On the evening of October 6 the formal opening took place. The exercises commenced with a prayer by Rev. Dr. Lord, which was followed by an address from the President of the exhibition, Mr. DAVID BELL. The great object of the evening, however, was the HON. HORACE GREELEY'S address. The attendance during the exhibition was very large.

THE PICTURESQUE IN LITERATURE.

IF itself it is probable to the mass of readers a matter of very little interest to know that Dryden was very fond of wearing a black velvet coat, talked very little, but took snuff constantly, quoted much of "Egad," and was much given to anxious gesticulations in instructing the players at the rehearsals of his tragedies; and, except in so far as it refers to men distinguished in letters and politics, it can be of no interest at all to any one to know that he crooked little fingers, had naked questions, and translated the Iliad on the backs of old letters or odd scraps of paper, always kept a pencil running at his button-hole, boldly declared that if a thought or a phrase struck him in his dreams he might get up at once and make a note of it; that Ben Jonson, like Gray, had his hoards for writing, and threw down his pen and put on his hat for a walk when he had exhausted a certain vein of thought or criticism; that Buffon was wont to shave and put on clean linen when he sat down to write; that Johnson did not begin his work upon a three-legged chair; that Gibbon wrote three volumes of his history under the shade of a beautiful acacia overhanging the lake of Geneva, and that his first rough MSS. to the press without any intermediate copying; that Byron, after reading the Edinburgh Review on his youthful poems, sat down and drank three bottles of claret to his own share after dinner, took "a sheet-ful of Milton," and then relieved his soul by writing his "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers;" that Petrarch was excessively fond of turnips, and kept so he read over the letters to Laura; that Tasso had a peculiar affection for Molmsey, and thought it favorable to poetic inspiration; or that Sheridan finished his "Critic," locked up in the manager's room of Covent Garden, with a bottle of Madeira and an old stage copy of the Duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal. Thrown together pell mell, in a volume of one or a packet of odd letters, these and a second very important—the mere gossip of tetatales. Yet trifles like these often possess a distinct value of their own, and, after all, if it be by the light of this little-tattle of tradition that we can make the dry bones of history live, that we can re-endow the great soldier and the great statesman with flesh and blood, reproduce Napoleon in our imagination as Sir Neil Campbell has pictured him in his cabinet at Fontainebleau, dressed in his old green uniform, with gold epaulets, blue pantaloons, and red top-boots, unshaven, unwashed, with particles of snuff scattered profusely upon his upper lip and breast, impatiently pacing the length of his apartment, and shrinking from his soul from his fate; or that we can see Lord John Russell sitting down at his desk to draw up his scheme of Parliamentary Reform at sheet of note-paper or reproduce in our mind's eye Lord Melbourne and his Cabinet discussing the Corn Laws, the state of society Prescott reading his back against the door, and carelessly putting the question to the vote, "Now, sirs, is it to be, an eight-shilling sliding scale or free trade? It does not much matter which; but, mind, we must all say alike! It is only by such little touches that we can see Lord Derby and his colleagues in St. James's Square, settling the points of their Ten Minutes' Bill; or picture a great writer to ourselves in his library, see and know him as his friends saw and knew him, look over his MSS., and chat with him over the fire; stand with Gibbon, for example, in the ruins of the Capitol, and plan the History of the Decline and Fall; stroll along Fleet Street with Dr. Johnson to the Mitre Tavern, or to the Ki-cat, to meet Burke, and Beauclerk, and Goldsmith, and Garrick, and Boswell; spend half an hour with Cowper in his "workshop" in the garden at Olney, where he wrote his letters and fabricated his verse, "the grass under the window all bespangled with dewdrops, and the birds singing in the apple-trees among the blossoms;" walk down the High Street of Edinburgh with Professor Wilson to his class-room, "with a book under his arm and a week's beard on his chin," to lecture on Moral Philosophy; or sit at that old desk in the Morning Chronicle office and look at Dickens as he turns out the "Sketches by Boz or "Pickwick;" or look over poor Thackeray's MSS., to copy were refused by publisher after publisher, and speculate with him whether it is worth while to try one more house or burn the MSS.; congratulate him at last on finding a publisher, laugh with him over the petty vexations of criticism, especially at that sagacious production of criticism, especially at that sagacious production of himself as the editor of Oliver Goldsmith, with a dash of Horace Walpole, and share with him the gratification of seeing the public on every drawing-room table, and in every hand.

The works of these men, of all men of genius, rank among the richest and most valuable of legacies, not of thought and culture, and through them "friendships profound and generous are formed with men long dead, and with men whom we may never see. . . . The lives of these men have quite a personal interest for us. Their homes become as familiar as our own. Their little ways and familiar phrases become endeared to us, like the little ways and phrases of our wives and children. . . . Every trifle that illustrates their character, any note that brings them nearer to us, is treasured up in our memory as we treasure up the memories of friends. Every affectation, the lock of hair and the packet of faded letters, Brougham wrangling in court all day and penning petty point of law, afterward sitting down in his chambers to write an article on Phlebotomy for the Edinburgh, or to smash Professor Young's theory of light, by denying the accuracy of the experiments of one of the most careful and patient of inquirers, dining at Holland House and talking till the clock "de onni scibili, French cookery, Italian poetry, and so on;" Gray writing his Elegy only by gathering and perfecting a line by line; Sheridan telling the watchman who found him under the piazzas of Covent Garden, that he was "only a little Sheridan;" Charles Lamb taking up the candle to go and examine the bumps on the head of a man who unceremoniously called on "Mr. Milton was a great poet;" Tom Hood propped up by pillows on a sick-bed to quiz his own sentiment in the Song of the Shirt; Theodore Hook laying down his knife and fork at the end of the fourth course at a Lord Mayor's dinner and offering to write a farce in a week; Bacon finishing off a chapter of the "Advancement of Learning" and taking up his diary to make an entry "to have in mind and use the Attorney-General's weakness," or "to have ever in readyness matter to minister talk with the King" and another "to have both to induce familiarity and for countenance in public places;"—what can be more characteristic of the man than this anticipation of this perception? They are like those pen-and-ink sketches of Leech, where the whole character of a man is condensed in a single stroke of the pencil. They are, in a word, biography in hieroglyphics. Even with the help of these trifles "how poor a thing is perfected" in many of the great figures of history stand out before us! Without them, where we now at least have some sense of the reality of Socrates, or even "like Ossian's ghosts in hazy twilight, with the stars dim twinkling through their forms."

MRS. HENRY WARD BEECHER ON THE SEWING MACHINE.

(From The Mother at Home.)

"IS reply to numerous letters requesting information and advice with regard to the many sewing machines now in use, we gave in the July number of the 'Mother at Home' our own limited experience, and also expressed a wish that others would favor our readers with the results of a larger and more extended knowledge than our own. This suggestion has brought us letters from all parts of the country, all, without exception, enthusiastically advocating 'WILLCOX & GIBBS MACHINE.' We have room for but one out of the multitude of letters before us, but that expresses the general idea of all."

Here are more thousands of facts such as we have never before witnessed in favor of any labor-saving invention: Mrs. BEECHER, having given her own experience with the different kinds of sewing machines, invites her readers to offer theirs. Her invitation is extended as much to those having one kind as to those having another, and in reply she receives a multitude of letters, all of which, she tells us, are ENTHUSIASTICALLY IN FAVOR OF THE WILLCOX & GIBBS MACHINE!

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE had a WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine for more than fourteen years, and during that time it has been in almost constant use, without even the most trifling repairs. Many thousand dollars' worth of work has been done with it in furnishing my hotel, and my wife says she would not now exchange it for any other machine she has ever seen. A. D. FAILING.
New York.

CONSUMPTION: ITS CAUSE AND HOW TO CURE IT.—J. WINCHESTER & Co., 36 John St., New York, have published a handsome eight-page Circular on this subject, which they will send free to all desiring it. We advise every one of our readers to send for one. We are confident it will bring HOPE, JOY, and LIFE to thousands.—[Com.]

PERSE OUT THE MORBID HUMORS OF THE BLOOD by a dose or two of AYER'S PILLS, and you will have clearer heads as well as bodies.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO remove MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, and TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

HITCHCOCK'S
New Monthly Magazine
Read what Moore's Rural New-Yorker says:

HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.—If the excellent taste which characterizes this first issue of a new musical periodical is but a prelude of what is to come, then the publisher may rest assured of success. Handsomely illustrated, beautifully printed, and well edited, with choice gems of literature superbly interesting to lovers of music—such as biographies of MALIBRAN and JENNY LIND, Voice—and vocal and instrumental music, are very attractive and valuable.

JUST PUBLISHED:
FIRST NUMBER
OF THE HITCHCOCK
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

CONTENTS:
MADAME MALIBRAN. Portrait and Biography.
LEONARDO DA VINCI. Portrait and Biography.
MARRIAGES. Piano. 24 Pages.
CHEAP PUBLICATIONS. Editorial.
ART NOTES.
DRAMATIC NOTES.
MUSICAL NOTES.
POETRY AND CORRESPONDENCE.

THE STARRY FLAG. Piano.
WE'LL SOON, SO SOON, BE HEART TO THEE. Do.
KISS WALTZ. Piano.
KIT PLAYS THE FAIRY. Voice and Piano.

Specimen copies mailed free, on receipt of price, 25 cents each. Sold by Booksellers and Newsdealers.
Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK,
Publisher, 24 Beekman St., New York.
☞ Agents wanted every where. Write for Terms.

$1.—TAKING THE REINS.
GRANT, BONNER & DEXTER
BY JOHN W. EHNINGER, N.A.

"It is a striking likeness of the horse, and, I have no hesitation in saying, the best representation of a horse in action that I have ever seen.
"ROBERT BONNER."

This splendid photograph, embodying three life-like portraits, is 12½ x 7½ inches, exclusive of mount. Sent free of postage on receipt of $1 00.

Larger Edition, 13 x 21, beautifully mounted on India tint, at $3 00. Two copies for $5 00.

Address PILKINGTON JACKSON, Art Publisher, for HARPER & BROTHERS,
Liberal Terms to Agents.) New York.

PATENT STEM-WINDING WATCHES.
COIN-SILVER HUNTING CASES, $21; EXTRA FINE, $23.

Hunting-Case Full-Jeweled Lever Watches, $45, $48; Extra Fine, Ladies' Size, $36; Extra, $40; Enameled, $46.
COIN-SILVER
HUNTING CASES, $14; EXTRA QUALITY, $16.
AMERICAN MOVEMENTS.
Every variety. LATEST, LOWEST PRICES.

And Watches of every description, in fine Gold and Silver Cases, at Importers' Rates.

Goods sent by Express, to be paid for only after they have been received, examined, and accepted.

S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
Nos. 52 & 54 John St., N. Y.

Full Descriptive Price-Lists sent free.

JUST PUBLISHED:
THE American Tune-Book.
The Standard Book for Choirs to select from.

A complete collection of all the Church tunes which are widely popular in this country, with the most popular old and new pieces; compiled from all sources. Authentic and correct readings of the long meters, preceded by a concise exposition of the Singing Schools. Containing about 1000 favorite pieces, selected by 500 Conventions and Choirs, and who have been interviewed Teachers and Choir Leaders, who have been interviewed by the compiler. 448 pages. Price $1 50; $13 50 per dozen. Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston;
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

FURNITURE.—New designs and new styles: Ash and Walnut Chamber Furniture, with the most popular drawings furnished, with estimates for finishing Sewings with head and foot-boards adapted to the style of house and rooms. Only seasoned and stained and kiln-dried; none other will stand furnace heat. G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
Broadway, near Amity St.

N. B.—Curtain and Furniture-Covering Store at No. 447 Broadway.

PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY; CRANIAL DEFECTS in Criminal Classes; Salem Witchcraft—Are the Women to Blame? On the Expression of the Eye; A Beautiful Face—How it is Marred; General Washington's Head; General John A. Rawlins, Hon. W. P. Fessenden, Hon. Ann Packer, Mother Ann Lee, Spiritualism, &c., in the December Number of PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, only 30c., or $3 a year. Newsdealers supplied.
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. G. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

The New Books of the Season
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.
GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents per volume.
ADAM BEDE.
THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.
SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER, THE WEAVER OF RAVELOE.
ROMOLA. Shortly Ready.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y., Oct. 7th, 1869.

Efforts have been made to ascertain the opinion of the public and the press concerning the merits of these novels, and the following is a digest and better edition of GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS than has ever published by Messrs. FIELDS, OSGOOD, & CO., we think it proper to say, in explanation, and in reply to the unspoken question, why?

That we were the first to publish these Works in this country, and that the Early Sheets thereof we have paid from time to time in the aggregate the sum of Five Thousand Dollars in Gold.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

2.
THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE, King of Naples and of Italy. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. 16mo, Cloth, $1 50. Uniform with Abbott's Illustrated Histories.

3.
A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK; or, A County Family. A Novel. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "Carlyon's Year," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

4.
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 861 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, Royal 8vo, Extra Cloth, $6 00; Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 00; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

5.
THE MINISTER'S WIFE. A Novel. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "Perpetual Curate," "Life of Edward Irving," "Brownlows," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.
UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy: embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By THOMAS C. UPHAM, D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Bowdoin College. In Two Volumes. Vol. I. Intellect. Vol. II. Sensibilities, and Will. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75 per volume.

7.
IN SILK ATTIRE. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

8.
COUNTESS GISELA. A Novel. By E. MARLITT. Translated by A. Nahmer. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.
A GREEK GRAMMAR FOR BEGINNERS. By HARRY THURSTON PECK, A.M., Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of Georgia. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

10.
FOUND DEAD. A Novel. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

11.
THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By JAMES GREENWOOD, the "Amateur Casual," Author of "The Wilds of London," "Low Life Deeps," "Dick Temple," "Seminole," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

12.
FALSE COLORS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.
SANDS'S PHILOSOPHY OF TEACHING. The Teacher, Pupil, and the School. By NATHANIEL SANDS. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

14.
MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, $1 25.

15.
FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractiveness of the Country, and a Candid Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss as Involved in Amateur Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Instruction in Practical Farming Large or Small Places in the Rural Districts. By RICHARD L. ALLEN. With Characteristic Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

16.
META'S FAITH. A Novel. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

17.
THACKERAY'S NOVELS:
New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.
VANITY FAIR. 32 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.
PENDENNIS. 119 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.
THE VIRGINIANS. 180 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
THE NEWCOMES. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 94 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
BARRY EDMOND AND LOVEL THE WIDOWER. 12 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

18.
RHETORIC: a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Academies, and for Private Study. By REV. E. O. HAVEN, D.D., LL.D., President of the Northwestern University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 60.

19.
CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:
LAND CAMP. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

20.
FEG WOFFINGTON, CHRISTIE JOHNSTONE, and Other Stories. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

21.
THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel with Studies of Man and Nature in the Archipelago. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Tropical Nature of the Amazon," &c. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

S. W. GEERY,
IMPORTER,
Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 110 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.
The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.
My stock comprises some of the Choicest Liquors in the country.
Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.
Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

12 SPLENDID GIFTS. — THE ONE HUNDRED AND Improvements for 1870. NOW is the time to get up Clubs. The Great Original and Only Genuine Cash Gift Enterprise. Over 100,000 Packages Distributed. Every Package contains a Present. Agents Wanted Everywhere. Read our Extraordinary Offer. Read our Extraordinary Offer. Read our Extraordinary Offer

THE FLOWER OF THE FLOCK LEAVING THE FOLD.

WHY WALTHAM WATCHES

ARE THE BEST AND CHEAPEST.

Because, being made of the best materials, and every part being finished in the most perfect manner, they will run with great precision, and will not stop or run irregular, as is the case with other Watches.

We desire to increase the sale of these reliable timepieces, and have reduced the prices much lower than formerly.

Silver Hunting Watches, - - - - - $18
Gold Hunting Watches (18-carat cases), $80
Gold Hunting Watches (Ladies' size), $70
Gold Hunting Watches (Ladies' size), $70

Every Watch warranted by Special Certificate.

We send single Watches to any place by express, with the bill to collect on delivery, and we give the purchaser the privilege of opening the package and examining the Watch before paying, and if, after it is taken and paid for, it should not prove satisfactory, we will exchange it or Refund the Money.

We have sent thousands of these Watches by express, and to every section of the country, and by our improved method of packing they will go safely to any distance. Persons living in the distant States and Territories can save from 50 to 100 per cent. by buying from us.

Do not order a Watch till you have sent for our Descriptive Price-List. It explains the different kinds, gives weight and quality of the cases, with prices of each.

When you write for a price-list please state that you saw this in HARPER'S WEEKLY. Address, in full,

HOWARD & CO.,

Jewelers and Silversmiths,

No. 619 Broadway, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine we will not sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours, and which can be "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second thread can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines of the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical clamp machine manufactured.

PATENTS.—INVENTORS who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Twenty-three Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency.

A Pamphlet, containing full instructions in Patents, is sent gratis. Address MUNN & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

SMITH'S COUGH CARAMELS.
Excellent for the Throat & Lungs. Sold by all Druggists.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
67 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

THE SECRET OF BEAUTY lies in the use of HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM for the complexion. Roughness, Redness, Blotches, Sunburn, Freckles, and Tan disappear where it is applied, and a beautiful complexion of pure, satin-like texture is obtained. The plainest features are made to glow with healthful bloom and youthful beauty.

Remember, HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM is the thing that produces these effects, and any lady can secure it for 75 cents at any of our stores.

To preserve and dress the Hair use LYON'S KATHAIRON.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' SOAP SAPOLIO
211 WASHINGTON ST. N. Y.

FOUNTAIN PENS. One dip writes 4 pages. $1 50 a gross, postpaid.—Penknife and Pencil combined.—Eraser and Pen-Holder combined, and 12 Fountain Pens, 50 cents, postpaid. Sell at sight. AGENTS WANTED. CITY NOVELTY CO.,
404 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCUTER, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNCKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. MCNEIL, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. H. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BRADFORD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MIN. C. BUEHL, Pittsburg, Pa.; CLEVEY & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HAMMOND, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; J. H. HINTERMISTER, Ithica, N. Y.; H. S. MACKIE, Rochester, N. Y.; H. USTEN, Buffalo, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; COLBY BROS., Providence, R. I.; C. M. LOUDON, New Haven, Conn.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Pierre, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C. W.; E. PIERZ & BRO., St. John, N. B.

Hatter and Furrier.
DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
717 BROADWAY,
New York Hotel.
Importer of English Hats for Gentlemen's wear.
Ladies' Riding Hats, entirely New.
Ladies' Fine Furs in every variety.

AGENTS WANTED for
WILLSON'S
SCHOOL and FAMILY CHARTS,

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Don't Stop to Condole with the victim of sick headache. Go to the nearest drug store, procure TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, administer one or two sparkling and refreshing draughts, and in a few hours the pain will cease.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 75 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

No Longer "A Skeleton in every Household!"

THE RESILIENT DRAPERY SKIRT
"MONOCRAT,"
THE ONLY PERFECT SKIRT!
It is a complete Balmoral or Manila Skirt, with which steel springs are combined in a novel and ingenious manner, rendering it Elegant, Comfortable, Durable, and Safe.
The springs may be removed by any one with perfect ease, so that the skirt may be washed at pleasure.
For sale by all first-class Dealers.
THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO., Sole Manufacturers.

"PERFECTION"
Coffee-Pot.
(Patented June 1, 1869.)
Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful
SIMPLICITY,
DURABILITY,
and CHEAPNESS.
Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.
FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS.
SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.
Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1870.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year . . . $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year . . . 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year . . . 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

[For Prospectuses and particulars for Remitting Moneys, Postage, &c., see the fourth column of page 703.]

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains nearly DOUBLE THE AMOUNT OF MATTER furnished in The Galaxy, The Atlantic, Putnam, or Lippincott. It exceeds in about the same ratio any English Magazine of the same general class, such as Blackwood, Fraser, Macmillan, Temple Bar, Belgravia, or The Cornhill.

☞ A New Story, splendidly Illustrated, by WILKIE COLLINS (Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone"), will be commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY in November, 1869.

☞ Persons desiring to renew their Subscriptions to HARPER'S PERIODICALS will much oblige the Publishers by sending in their Names as early as convenient before the Expiration of their present Subscriptions. This will obviate the delay attendant upon re-entering names and mailing back Numbers.

☞ New Subscribers will be supplied with either of the above Periodicals from the present time to the end of the year 1870 for Four Dollars.

NEW YORK. Oct. 15, 1869.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS.

HARPER'S LIBRARY EDITION.
ILLUSTRATED.
12MO, MOROCCO CLOTH,
SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS A VOLUME.

VOL. I. ADAM BEDE.
II. THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
III. FELIX HOLT.
IV. SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE AND SILAS MARNER.
V. ROMOLA. (Nearly Ready.)

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above volumes by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 75 cents.

Dr. JNO. V. BURTON'S
TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.
WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL CRAVING FOR TOBACCO in any form, leaving the system free from poisonous and nervous influences. It is entirely vegetable, and contains no mercury or opium. It is a powerful tonic and invigorating agent, and an excellent tonic and aperient, enables the stomach to digest the heartiest food, makes sleep refreshing, and establishes robust health. Smokers and chewers of tobacco will find it invaluable. Ten cents per box, post free. An interesting treatise on the baneful effects of tobacco on the human constitution, voluntary, and sent free. Agents wanted. Address
DR. V. E. ABBOTT, Jersey City, N. J.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
☞ Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.
[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
Baltimore, Md.
☞ Send for Price-List.]

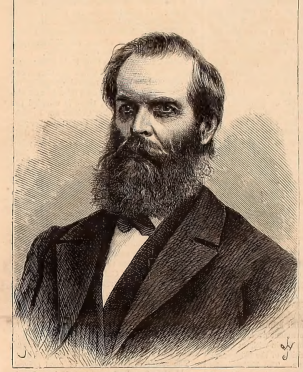
$10 PER DAY.—Wanted—Active, enterprising persons of either sex to sell an article required by every person. USEFUL, ATTRACTIVE. Sells at sight. Business honorable and profitable. Address
S. J. BESTOR, Managing Agent, Hartford, Conn.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 671.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.



GOV. J. W. GEARY, OF PENNSYLVANIA.—[PHOT. BY F. GUTEKUNST, PHIL.]

OHIO AND PENNSYLVANIA.

THE recent elections indicate that the balance between the two parties which divide the country has not been essentially disturbed by the events of the past year. The Republican party, indeed, may be said to rest upon a firmer basis, since many who voted for General GRANT last autumn, and who then felt uncertain as to the wisdom of the choice made by their party, are now the strongest adherents of the administration. In both Ohio and Pennsylvania the elections this fall have been very close, owing to the reluctance on the part of a large class of Republicans to vote except upon important national questions.

We give on this page portraits of the Governors of these two States, who have been re-elected—JOHN W. GEARY, of Pennsylvania, and RUTHERFORD B. HAYES, of Ohio. Both of these gentlemen were distinguished in the late war; both of them entered the service at the commencement of the struggle; and, though neither of them had a West Point education, both succeeded, by energy and fidelity, in obtaining a very high rank. Governor GEARY, during his first administration of the affairs of his State, provoked great indignation among the Democrats; but, notwithstanding that fact, and although his rival in the recent canvass, Judge PACKER, was well known throughout the State as a man of strict integrity, of immense wealth, and was every where respected, yet GEARY has been re-elected by a majority of from four to five thousand.

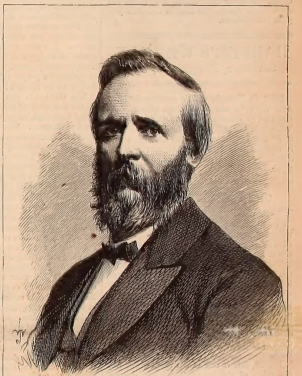
The majority for Governor HAYES is still larger in Ohio. The Democratic candidate, GEORGE H. PENDLETON, was an advocate of repudiation, and his defeat was on that account the more certain. We have laid so much stress upon the result of the late elections in Ohio and Pennsylvania, because the elections in these two States have so long been regarded as important indications of the political sentiment of the whole country.

ST. ANN'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH, BROOKLYN.

THE new Protestant Episcopal Church of St. Ann's, of which we give an illustration on page 700, is situated on Brooklyn Heights; it was dedicated October 21. This church association is the oldest Episcopal organization in Brooklyn. It was incorporated by the name of St. Ann's Church June 22, 1795; it had existed, however, since 1787, under the name of "The Episcopal Church of Brooklyn."

The new church, on the corner of Clinton and Livingston streets, is a master-piece of art. Messrs. RENWICK & SANDS, of New York, are the architects. Its style is what is termed the Second Pointed, which is a commingling, we believe, of the old Gothic and the Norman. The corner-stone was laid by Bishop POTTER and the Rector, Dr. SCHENCK, in May, 1867. Its dimensions are 75 feet by 126, the height from floor to roof being 90 feet. It is built of Belleville and Cleveland stone. This is the first successful attempt to interweave the Cleveland white with the Belleville brown sandstone in this style of architecture. The interior decoration is by COBB, the first polychrome painter in this country. The organ was built by HENRY ERBEN. An important feature connected with the church is its beautiful chime of eight bells.

REV. DR. N. H. SCHENCK, the present Rector of St. Ann's, is one of the foremost men in the Episcopal ministry. He preaches extemporaneously. He is a brother-in-law of the Hon. GEORGE H. PENDLETON, of Ohio.



GOV. R. B. HAYES, OF OHIO.—[PHOT. BY LEON VAN LOO.]

ST. ANTHONY FALLS DAM, MINN.

OUR illustration of St. Anthony Falls shows the workmen engaged in cutting out the rock for the purpose of putting in an apron for the water to run over. This will prevent the Falls from wearing away up-stream and leaving the mills without their motive power. St. Anthony Falls is eight miles above St. Paul. The Mississippi here has a fall of about 18 feet. The University of Minnesota is established at St. Anthony. The town contains five or six churches, about twenty stores, and numerous saw-mills, besides other mills and manufactories. The population in 1860 was 3258.

A WONDERFUL STORY.

IT is said that in the tombs of the Necropolis of ancient Egypt two kinds of mummies have been found. One is incomplete—that is to say, all organs necessary to life have been separated from them; the other, on the contrary, is quite complete. Having observed this, a Swedish chemist, Dr. Grusselbuch, who has the reputation of being both great and learned, Professer at the University of Upsal, has come to the conclusion that the Egyptian mummies are not all, as has been said and believed for some thousands of years, bodies embalmed by any process of preservation whatever; but that they are really the bodies of individuals whose life has been momentarily suspended, with the intention of restoring them at some future time, only the secret of preservation has been lost. Professor Grunselbach adduces many proofs in support of his idea; among others, his experiments during the last ten years, which he says, have always proved successful. He took a snake and treated it so as to benumb it as though it had been carved in wood; he, and it were as brittle that, had he allowed it to fall, it would have broken into fragments. In this state he kept it for one or several years, and then restored to life by sprinkling it with a stimulating fluid, the composition of which is his secret. For fifteen days the snake has been undergoing an existence composed of successive deaths and resurrections, apparently without sustaining any harm. The Professor is regarded as have sent a petition to his Government, requesting that a criminal who has been condemned to death may be given to him to treat in the same manner as the snake, promising to restore him to life in two years. It is understood that the man who undergoes this experiment is to be pardoned. Whether the Swedish Government has accepted or rejected the learned chemist's proposal is not known.

ST. ANTHONY FALLS DAM, MINNESOTA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WHITNEY AND ZIMMERMANN, ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1869.

☞ In November will be commenced "MAN AND WIFE," a new Serial Story, splendidly Illustrated, BY WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone"). New Subscribers will be supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement of the Story to the end of 1870 for $4 00.

THE PRESIDENT'S WORD.

WHEN the President's letter to Mr. BOUTWELL was published, the general feeling undoubtedly was that it was unnecessary. But, after all, it may be said that there was a quiet denial of the story so eagerly told and so skillfully insinuated of the President's complicity with the late conspiracy in Wall Street. The charge has since been openly made that he was virtually a partner in the shameful transactions of the gold clique: and it has become a question of veracity between the President and other persons of whom it may be said that their character does not above suspicion, nor their word as generally acceptable as Mr. STEWART'S bond.

Indeed, this is one of the cases which test the value of character. There are circumstances which may require an honest man to do more than admit or deny, and which may authorize him to enter into elaborate explanations. But they do not exist here. Party violence and individual unscrupulousness may assert and hint and wonder and deplore, but if General GRANT'S simple word is not enough to dispose of the matter in the minds of honest men, no evidence would avail. General GRANT has been in full view of his countrymen for the last seven years. His character is certainly as simple as his services are great. Incessantly and malignantly slandered, as every candidate for the Presidency and every President must be, deliberately falsehood has not been spared upon him, although it was implied by ANDREW JOHNSON, whom the country thoroughly understands, that intimacy, and therefore approval of appearances, General GRANT is the very man not to consider the interpretation that hostility and malice may place upon the most innocent action. Mr. VAN BUREN, the most accomplished of politicians, would certainly not have made a summer tour like President GRANT'S, and no other President would, under the circumstances, have written a letter to Mr. BONNER. But we have no doubt whatever that the popular confidence in the President is not in the least disturbed. On the contrary, General GRANT is stronger in the popular heart to-day than at any time since his election.

A ring of gold gamblers now virtually call him a liar. Such an allegation from such persons affects the President's good name as much as an insult offered to a lady in Rotten Row by a group of rowdies at a corner, and no more. The Ring may multiply apparent corroborations, they may swear their cry, the newspapers may deprecate and declaim, and announce that "this is a most damaging array of facts, if the allegations are to be accepted as true;" they may call it a "terrible counter defense" that the President's word. Defense against what? Against a charge made by persons whose word has no weight whatever with the great mass of intelligent and reputable citizens, that, being President of the United States, General GRANT used his knowledge and employed his official authority to make money in a conspiracy. What success could be so sweet to the conspirators as that the President should attempt a "better defense" than his word in support of such an assertion? WASHINGTON was accused of debauching the public conscience. His country believed it just as much as it believes that GRANT was an accomplice in the late gold conspiracy, whose designs he is known to have frustrated.

THE NEW YORK ELECTION AT HAND.

GENERAL SIGEL made a speech at Albany last week amidst great enthusiasm. In direct and resolute decision he declared for the part he should play which it is the great object of the Republican party to secure. "If a man may be denied the right of voting because he is black, I may be deprived of the same right because I am a German." "The laws must be made without distinction of color, race, or religion." "The true American citizen must not take the character of a Yankee or a Frenchman, of an Irishman or a German; but will unite the power of the American, the energy of the French, the activity of the Celt, the steadiness of the Teuton. The party that adopts these ideas, whether Republican or Democratic, is my party." As for the financial question, the General declared that honesty is the best policy. The new Constitution of the State should be adopted, if for no other reason than that it equalizes the suffrage, and removes the property qualification. The hero of Pea Ridge is not accustomed to dodge, and he spoke plainly of the Temperance question. "I do not consider intemperance a proper subject for legislation: it had better be reached by reformatory means."

The election is now close at hand. As in all the canvass of the year following the national campaign, there has not been much outward excitement. The Republicans have nominated representative men. Besides SIGEL and GREELEY for Secretary of State and Controller, MARTIN I. TOWNSEND, of Troy, the candidate for Attorney-General, is known through the State and beyond it as one of the most honorable of Republicans; a lawyer of great ability, experience, and success; an orator of inspiring vigor and humor; a man of unblemished life and unbroken energy, and of spotless character. Undoubtedly the character of the candidates, with the emphatic success of the party in Ohio and Pennsylvania, seem to assure the State to the most stimulating effect upon our friends in the State; and although a party which was defeated last year must be in struggling order, we would assume no one if the Republicans of New York should resume control of the State, in which beyond question they are a majority of the last Legislature.

The unchanged and unchangeable character of the Democratic party is shown in the renomination of the corrupt creatures of the Ring in this city has set aside Judge CLERKE, one of the ablest and most upright of Democratic judges, and has re-nominated Judge MCCUNN, whom to name is to describe. In not his nomination alone sufficient to satisfy any hesitating citizen of the spirit and policy that he sustains by voting for Democratic candidates? Of course in the city such candidates will be elected. But the power that controls the city nominated Mr. HOFFMAN, and to serve the purposes of the corrupt Democracy, as Mayor, issued the proclamation protecting frauds last year, and, as Governor, signed the Erie bill. Is it the Democracy ring that is expected to oppose corruption, and promote economy, and insist upon honesty in administration? Let those who think so vote with the ring on Tuesday.

A NECESSARY REFORM.

THE Secretary of the Treasury has thought it to be his duty to remove all his subordinates in Texas who are opposed to the election of the Republican candidate. Our sympathies and hopes in the election are certainly those of the Secretary. We have no doubt that the success of General HAMILTON would be a very great misfortune. But no misfortune is more serious to the country than the system of the civil service which make it a mere party machine. Safe and economical government is simply impossible if our present practice is to continue. The service of the country is prostituted by it to the supposed interests of a party, and the most absolute demoralization is inevitable. The Secretary, of course, may plead the traditions of a generation. He may ask whether, if the party in power insists upon honest and capable officers, it is not fair to put them in the places of those who already fill the offices, and so maintain a unity of sentiment and an harmonious support of the policy which the people have approved.

The reply to this ancient and usual remark is, that such a system necessarily leads to a disregard of honesty and capacity, and invites the officers to a kind of interest in elections which they ought not to have. Why is it desirable to change the subordinate officers of the civil service? Because they are desperate partisans. But why are they desperate partisans? Because they know that their bread and butter and the comfort of their families depend upon the success of those who will keep them in place. The Secretary of the Treasury would not find it necessary for a party purpose to move those officers if previous secretaries had not done the same thing. If the clerks in the service were not made partisans by the system they would attend quietly to the duties for which they are paid, and they and the country would be tranquil and satisfied. Is not party spirit furious enough already, that we must diligently study to exasperate it still further?

The President has not been trained as a political partisan, and he can see this subject with much more reasonable calmness than those who have been. He can see that, although ours is a government of party, there are considerations which party must respect or the common welfare be constantly imperiled. And the subject is one of such vital importance that we hope it may be recommended by him to the most careful consideration of Congress. That would commend it also to the most attentive reflection of the country. As the Nation truly says, the present difficulty is the public apathy and the neglect arising from the consciousness that a law on paper is of no use, and that as it would be administered by the same old politicians there would be really nothing gained. But by removing one of the great sources of corruption, a movement is made toward general political purification.

Nothing can be more than the present system, and if nobody will do any thing, it is plain that nothing will be done. But as the late memorial of Philadelphia citizens to their representatives declares: "If Democratic Republicanism be not a mistake the people must show themselves as competent to enforce the constitutional as to exercise the functions of government as a despotism can be." It is not enough that a government be powerful; the worst governments have been so. It must be wisely and faithfully guided as economy and good sense are indispensable to private success, so they must be felt to be essential to public prosperity. Undoubtedly the Secretary of the Treasury found himself perplexed by the situation in Texas. But his action, against which the Tribune warmly protests, will probably not only have seemed to him, but certainly show him, with all other good citizens, the imperative necessity of the reform of the Civil Service.

CUBAN BELLIGERENCY.

As we write, the Spanish gun-boats are still detained, and there has been no addition to the actual public knowledge of the intentions or the Administration. An article in the Tribune of Monday, by its public functionary, has proposed that the gun-boats be released at the demand of the Spanish Minister, and that reasonableness of the Government declare that it can not render this aid to Spain without giving Cuba comfort by recognition of the belligerent rights of the revolutionists. The Tribune asks whether Spain can make exception to this theory. But what ought the United States to say upon the subject? This proposition suggests a new kind of argument which consists in balancing both sides. But, as we have before said, however unfortunate for the Cuban cause our neighborhood to the island, and consequent convenience of any such step, the recognition of belligerent rights proceeds upon very different grounds.

While the United States are at peace with Spain, the citizens or the government of that country may undoubtedly order a fleet of gunboats to be built in New York. Nor can we properly prevent their departure, unless we have proof that they are to be employed in hostilities against a nation with which we are at peace, or in a war in which we have declared our neutrality. If, therefore, the gun-boats were to serve against Peru, we could rightfully detain them. But if they were to be used in the port of Barcelona against the Cuban insurgents, we could not rightfully stop them until we had declared the belligerent rights of the insurgents. To allow their departure, and to accompany it with a declaration that we would very justly be construed by the insurgents as a mockery, and by other nations as a folly. For to recognize belligerency at a moment when we know that the assailed government has acquired fresh means of subduing the revolt is to disregard the vital facts upon which the whole system of neutrality rests.

To apply these principles to the Cuban situation, it is very plain that the duration and character of the insurrection, the extent and force of the revolutionary sentiment, and the evident power of the revolutionary government are such as to justify the recognition of belligerent rights to-day, or they are not. If they are not, how can the conditions and prospects of the revolution be so improved by the increase of the Spanish navy as to justify such recognition? But if they are, why not declare our neutrality to-day, and forbid the departure of the fleet, which was detained, as is alleged, under suspicion of another destination? If the reasons of our recognition of belligerent rights is sympathy with a people fighting for independence, we have had the reason ever since the outbreak of the Cuban revolution, and it is a reason which should be the more persuasive in the degree of the feebleness of the effort. Upon this ground, indeed, if the resources of the Cubans were such that they could only sigh and not strike for liberty, the United States ought to have delivered them. But this is to authorize the United States to interfere with the free choice in the affairs of other nations, and to invite other nations to interfere at pleasure in ours: a policy which would destroy peace and liberty and progress every where.

It seems to be assumed by the Cubans who remain at some distance from the front of the revolutionary line that the United States will be responsible if the revolution fails. The honest and rigorous enforcement of our neutrality laws they regard as a measure of malignant hostility to Cuban liberty; and there have been the bitterest denunciations of our cold, commercial, selfish spirit; of our recreancy to our own principles and forgetfulness of our own history. But a proper enforcement of laws designed for the general welfare of civilization does not show a particularly selfish policy, while the American principle has always been that they who would be free must themselves strike the blow. Nor will any intelligent friend of Cuba allege that the American revolutionary colonies were aided by France from any feeling of affection, or from any desire upon the part of a monarchy to encourage rebellion among subjects. If it be true that the colonies would not have gained their independence without the aid of France, it is none the less true that France aided the revolution without the slightest sympathy with its principles or its purpose.

Indeed, the position of the United States today is not unlike that of which an ancient can be ashamed. With a natural sympathy for those who protest against long misrule, and who strive for independence, there is mingled the consciousness that neither Cuba nor the Frenchmen nor Englishmen should expect another people to liberate them from the oppressions of their own governments; and a perfect readiness, when the chairman of the meeting of sympathy first ask the measure, to assume the risk of trouble by declaring neutrality. Meanwhile, before this appears, the United States have refused to play false with their own laws and with Spain, their ally; but have made earnest representations to Spain, looking to the end of the war and the independence of Cuba. That Spain declines to yield is not surprising. No one who has observed the Spanish character, or who is familiar with the modern method of settling such questions, could suppose that Spain would concede of its own will that Cuba was victorious in the field. It was to be presumed that Spain would demand an apology, which leaves the question of force unsettled, and require a vote, while Cuba would naturally doubt the practicability of an honest vote, and would always feel, if there were a general disarmament and an election manipulated by Spanish residents, that the United States had bound her hands and betrayed her.

The result of the "tender of good offices" would, therefore, be favorable to Cuba. For it would leave upon the Spanish mind the impression that, while the United States would honestly respect their own laws and treaties, and would not recognize Cuban belligerency until they were justified in recognition by the law and practice of nations, yet that the sympathies of the country were with Cuba. That this has been the result is unquestionable. Apparently the struggle will continue, and the United States will recognize Cuban belligerency when the facts of the situation, and not American sympathies, authorize the recognition.

TRADE—HOW IT HAS BEEN AFFECTED.

DOMESTICS and fancy dress goods have been marked down out of concession to buyers, who hesitate in their purchases, not understanding the precise effect of the late affair in Wall Street. The weak in the canals, which prevented the usual transfer of grain to the seaboard, is unfortunate, especially as the West relies upon the active movement of grain to free its staff of obligations, and make its purchase of necessaries. The stoppage of traffic on the canals tightened the money market in the West, so that money borrowed to move Western produce became due during the detention of canal-boats. Owing to the two causes trade has been much slackened, purchases are made to supply only immediate wants. When the tendency of prices is downward, country dealers prefer to wait until the full decline is realized. Hence it is that this heavy sales must yet be made, as stocks remain very light in the hands of distributors.

The policy of marking down goods at so early a period in the fall trade is very questionable. It makes a great difference whether this is done when fifty per cent. of stock remain unsold, or when only one half or less of the residue after the season is nearly over. A leading manufacturer led the way, and others followed. Sales have not been enhanced by it; on the contrary, it has been regarded as a confession of weakness, and it is taken advantage of by many purchasers. So far as concerns some descriptions of domestics, it was scarcely possible to prevent a reduction in sympathy with cotton, although the price of the raw material is still too high to afford a reasonable profit to the manufacturers of domestics.

The failure of an important house, supposed to have arisen from a demand for margins made when gold had reached a high point in the late speculations, has tended somewhat to unsettle prices, as it is not known how far into the mercantile ranks these losses, occurring in the ordinary course of business, may have reached. Importers, who buy for gold and sell for currency, find that their business generally takes more or less of speculation, except they buy gold as fast as sales are made. The house in question borrowed gold experimentally, as it would fall, and had to meet the market at an excessive rate. The complications arising from the late speculations affect almost all business in a greater or less degree. A case which has come to our knowledge illustrates this difficulty.

A commission merchant in New York, in executing a foreign order for the purchase of cotton or breadstuffs at a given limit in price, must at the time of the purchase adjust several points:

1. The price of the merchandise in currency.

2. The rate of freight to be paid in the foreign market in their currency.

3. The rate which his draft or bill of exchange on the foreign merchant can be sold, payable in gold.

4. The rate at which he can turn the gold into currency, so as to be able to pay for the cotton or breadstuffs.

Dealers in this trade, having arranged for buying what cotton or breadstuffs they account, sometimes, owing to the condition of the market, sell the gold which they expect to receive for exchange. For this purpose they ordinarily borrow it, from a broker, paying, for the time being, the currency price. Through the New York Gold Exchange Bank these operations were easily managed. If no change occurred in the market rate, there would be no difference to adjust between the borrower and lender: and if not closed, which was at the option of either party, the transaction was renewed from day to day.

On the day preceding the late panic a merchant who had bought a cargo of wheat, desiring to sell himself of the then high quotation for gold, sold through his broker, A, to another broker, B, $25,000 gold at 143. The following day B's principal, his broker, A, in order to complete the transaction, borrowed this amount of gold from a firm, C, lodging with them the currency proceeds at 143.

Owing to the great decline in gold which occurred on Friday—after its rapid advance to 160, 162½—the firm, C, with whom the current gold loan was borne embarrassed.

At this time the merchant, finding that the wheat was not equal to sample, canceled the purchase of wheat, and at the same time, to enable him to meet or deliver the $25,000 gold, purchased $15,000 at 135. Before the residue was purchased it was found that B, to whom it was to be delivered, could not pay for it, and the sale was canceled by B paying the merchant 2½ per cent. in gold.

In this stage of the business the firm, C, unable to deliver the currency, obliged the merchant to take $25,000 gold at 135, while the market price was then only 130—the firm, C, paying the merchant the difference in currency between 135 and 143—and the borrowing transaction was canceled. Thus the latter becomes the unwilling purchaser of $25,000 gold at 135, which, added to his previous purchase of $15,000 at 135, makes in all $40,000 in gold at 135, less the amount received in compromise from broker, B, which, on $25,000, reduces the cost to about 133½.

This is by no means an isolated case. Many of the firms engaged in exporting produce have made such losses, and yet they were not buying business not supposing that they were speculating in gold, or that it was liable to any extreme fluctuations. The sudden and this manner of panic has affected the trade of the country in a most serious manner, ought to be condemned in all quarters. But yet some of them appear to be rewarded with new honors.

The power conferred last winter by the Legislature to classify the Directors of the New Railroad, in that only five shall go out in any one year, was not used until after the election for Directors, which occurred about the middle of October. If there had been any purpose or a doubtful contest there is no question but that the classification would have been made in advance of the election. It is probable that the right to make it then applicable was used to bring the stockholders into meeting with those who could not be divested of full control; and this accomplished, the process of excluding five was postponed for a year. A few, unable to stand any longer the public censure, resigned; and it appears that the Board is now largely filled with the clique which is understood to have made the raid upon Wall Street, and probably with employés in the offices of the Company. On looking at the classification it would appear to have been made in the inverse order in which public confidence is felt, and with the certainty that the group upon the road will never be loosened until the judiciary of the State shall send what remains, after its juices have been extracted, to a Receiver. Its life can be postponed only by issuing bonds convertible into stock, and selling the latter in some secret and illegal manner to the gamblers of Wall Street, who will hope to put it upon the public, and thus augment the great scandal upon the American name when the full history of this road will inevitably inflict.

The effect of the raid upon Wall Street, though seriously damaging, can not have the general results upon the finances of the country which many suppose. We have often shown that, as the credit circulation of the United States is to be hereafter limited by about seven hundred millions in greenbacks, National Bank notes, and fractional notes—no panic can arise of magnitude until this circulation becomes generally discredited. It is not supposes that such a dilemma is at hand; on the contrary, very few show any want of confidence in the present crisis. Business will always be disturbed by the variation in demand, which calls for money in one portion to move cotton, and in another to move wheat, and then to be at the sea-board to aid in making shipments; and it must be borne in mind that the South must retain more money than usual to enable it to conduct its enlarged business, and that California is likely to become debauched with paper-money, now that the Pacific Railroad makes the East and the West one people.

But, notwithstanding the large augmented demand for money in new quarters drains it from accustomed depositories at New York and elsewhere, the general condition of the demand is more urgent here than in other localities. In 1837 and in 1857 there was a large diminution of the quantity of money, arising from the export of gold and silver to foreign countries. Now, we repeat, the quantity is fixed, its circulation is limited to the United States, and instead of having to draw on other parts of paying debts from abroad, as we were obliged to do in 1837 and 1857, we have only to bid enough for it by telegraph, and our express companies deliver it before any loss of interest can ensue.

If these circumstances had received their due consideration, a serious fall in the price of commodities would not have occurred, which is a larger demand abroad for cotton and grain than this country can supply, there must necessarily be a corresponding activity in the distribution of the products of labor—a result which will become apparent at the sea-board and at our manufacturing establishments.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION OF NEW YORK.

On every point in which the proposed Constitution of the State of New York can be compared with the present one it is an improvement. The chief blot of the existing Constitution—the electoral disfranchisement on account of color—is wholly removed by the new one. The fatal defect of an elective judiciary is not indeed entirely removed, but provision is made for a submission of the question to the people. The improvement of the Legislature is sought by lengthening senatorial terms and extending Assembly districts. Cumulative voting, and the ballot-box, the registry is to be more stringent. And there is an admirable article to repress bribery and corruption. So important an amendment as that to the ballot-box in large cities in the State consider the new Judiciary article that they have united in a recommendation to the people to adopt it. The most distinguished Democratic lawyers in the Convention heartily supported the article in debate, and they are not to be diverted from the advocacy of it on the return in the autumn election of power by the hostility of the Democratic Convention.

The new Constitution has been generally published, but we suppose it will not be considered. The long session of the Convention, and the sharp censure which it received for delay from the chief organ in the State of the party under whose auspices it assembled, alienated the public sympathy, and its work was prejudged. Yet the duration of the Convention was inseparable from the nature of the work it was to do. A popular assembly, to revise the fundamental law of a State like New York, can not do its duty in a week or a month; for to the majority of its members very many of the topics presented are necessarily new. Certainly it was a body in which each party in the State had many of its able men, and in no political assembly composed of different parties has there ever been greater mutual courtesy and good feeling. Its labors resulted in a very good "party name"—as indeed a present Constitution by changes and additions, and the people of New York ought to accept the work.

NOTES.

THE defeat of ANDREW JOHNSON as Senator from Tennessee is a subject of general congratulation. It is not conceivable that he would have said or done a single wise thing in that position; and if the Opposition must elect a Senator it is desirable that he should be at least intelligent and courteous, qualities which the warmest friends of MR. JOHNSON will hardly claim for him. If it were not for the condition of Senator for BROWNLOW's health this defeat would undoubtedly be the political demise of the ex-President. But whether he reappears in public life or not, his name and career will always be a warning to the Republicans. There is something politically wiser than superficial excellency. The nature, character, habits, and training of a man are more powerful than any apparent change of opinion. They will control him when the long-run, and the party which would intrust him with place and power must not be surprised if he utterly deceives it. If the Republican party had selected a candidate for the Presidency in 1864 for the same reasons that persuaded them to nominate ANDREW JOHNSON for the Vice-Presidency, the result would be to-day. Character is as much more valuable than profession in politics as it is in every other sphere; and if ANDREW JOHNSON serves to impress that great truth upon party managers he will have been of real service to the country.

THE Evening Mail makes a statement in regard to the original publication by Messrs. Harper & Brothers of "Mr. E. H. DANA, Jr.'s Two Years Before the Mast," and prefaces it by the remark that, "The following is said to be MR. DANA's own account." It is simply impossible that it should be MR. DANA's account, for every important assertion in the statement is an error. Authors of one General Prescott have been, lost twenty years ago.

THE bust of ABRAHAM LINCOLN was unveiled in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, October 21, with imposing ceremonies. MR. HENRY WARD BEECHER, MR. BRYANT, and others delivered the oration.

The earthquake shocks of earthquake were felt in New England on the morning of October 22, Boston, Worcester, and Providence having the severest. Most of the Eastern States being shaken to such an extent that chimneys were greatly injured, although not hurt.

The new postage stamps have been designed by the Bureau of Engraving, and are said to be a great improvement on the old ones and on those used in Europe. President Grant's head is to be on them.

The Tweed case, which was to have been tried by the Supreme Court Chamber at Washington on the 3rd of November, is somewhat excited as regards which side he had been counsel for twenty-five years.

The Swedish government has given the extensive cotton factory, near Stockholm, Sweden, has just purchased 15,000 acres of land in Dunklin and Scott counties, Missouri, where he will establish colonies, build factories, and will engage in the cotton, sugar and tobacco manufacture of cotton. The enterprise will give employment to thousands, and, of whom will be driven away from Sweden, and the rest will soon follow.

Between the 11 and 13 of the Red of the Mississippi by the War Department, about that nearly 14,000 Union troops were interred in the national cemetery near Memphis, Tennessee, of whom 4995 are colored; 9000 are unknown, and 1000 are from Louisiana, 1000 Georgia, Georgia, Fort Donelson, Chattanooga, Murfreesboro, Corinth, and Nashville, Tennessee.

At the recent election in California for Judges of the Supreme Court the Democratic candidates were successful by a large majority.

The Congressional Select Committee on American Navigation Interests, which has just held meetings in Boston, Portland, Bath, Portland, Maine, visited Fall River, Massachusetts, on Friday, and there adjourned to meet in this city on the first Tuesday in November. We learn that the questions before the committee are to be considered are the following: Discriminating duties, one or all of which are desirable to restore our commerce. Abolition of all duties on materials entering into the construction of vessels. Admissibility of foreign ships to be purchased and registered as American vessels. And the granting of subsidies to steam-ship lines, as well in the domestic as in the foreign trade. The last question recommended to the Committee as indispensable to the growth of our mercantile steam marine.

Governor Hendricks, of North Carolina, has been compelled to issue a proclamation threatening the enforcement of martial law in Alamance, Caswell, and Chatham counties, unless the disturbances which are for some time existed therein shall cease. Thefts and murders have been committed; jails broken open—the latter for the purpose of rescuing the accused men hanged. Indeed, civil law has been put at defiance, and there is no security for life and property.

The far-famed Coliseum of Boston was drawn at a lottery October 12.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Upon the capture of Valentia by the Government troops the Spanish Republicans appear to have given up. As soon as their defeat was known Valentia was declared himself a Monarchist. The Duke of Montpensier now declares to be the fairest claimant of succeeding to the Spanish throne. General Prim has been in the Cortes, and has taken into Nassau, where she was released by the authorities. Prim's party in the Cortes is reported that she could not legally be held.

The Papal Army at Rome was reinforced by the arrival of 60 recruits from the United States.

Trial of 60 recruits from the United States.

The Spanish Republicans with an expeditionary force from Florida for Cuba, but has been captured by the Spanish October 1. He was the name of President Juarez, gave him a cordial welcome at the City of Mexico.

The line of railroad between Mexico and Vera Cruz is now in operation. Six miles are now in operation, and 40 miles of railroad are in active operation.

The greatest Catholic procession ever witnessed in Montreal took place October 14—over 100,000 people participated in the demonstration. This was on the occasion of the removal of the relics of St. Sesto from the Roman catacombs to the Bishop's palace.

It now appears to be certain that the Suez Canal will not be reopened before it can be of much service to commerce.

The Ecclesiastical Cabinet refuses an amnesty to the Carlist political prisoners in Spain.

The Earl of Derby died on the morning of October 23 in his 78th year.

The cholera has made fearful ravages in India during the past summer. Since 1865 there has been no hot season so fatal to European residents.

A temple has been recently erected in Calcutta by the Brahmo Somaj—a religious organization founded thirty years ago by an educated Bengalee, who despised the faith of his native country and was opposed to idolatry, but was at the same time wearied by the claims of Christianity. The service of this new temple consists merely of hymns, prayers, meditations, conversations, and readings.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

FATHER HYACINTHE on Sunday, the 24th, attended the French Catholic Church early in the morning, after which he went to Plymouth Church and heard Henry Ward Beecher, by whom he was cordially welcomed at the close of the service. Fore Hyacinthe has been the representative of his monastic charges.

The Virginia Legislature, October 15, elected Lieut.-Governor Lewis and Judge Johnston United States Senators.

The Tennessee Legislature, on October 22, elected Henry Cooper to be United States Senator in place of Fowler, whose term expires in March, 1871. The President Johnson was defeated, Cooper receiving 56 votes and Johnson 37.

The official majority of Governor Geary, in Pennsylvania, is 4,482. Judge Williams's majority is 4,913.

HAYES's majority for Governor, in Ohio, is 5073. The Republicans have seventy-six majority on joint ballot in the Senate and three in the House.

The Annual Reunion of the Army of the Tennessee is to take place at Louisville, Kentucky, November 17 and 18.

The Western Members of Congress, It is stated, are in favor of an increase in the revenue of the postal service. At test vote is expected to take place on a proposition for an appropriation to increase the mileages for the State and War Departments.

The Protestant Orphan Asylum, Washington, was burned on October 19 by the United States courts, and surrendered to the guardian of the asylum. Captain Boyle was held as a prisoner of war, and the crew were put under bail.

Alexander H. Stephens has been confined to his house since last February by illness. He has little hope of ever leaving home again.

Ex-Governor Hamilton Lincoln was unveiled in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, October 21, with imposing ceremonies. MR. HENRY WARD BEECHER, MR. BRYANT, and others delivered the oration.

The earliest indications of earthquake were felt in New England on the morning of October 22, Boston, Worcester, and Providence having the severest. Most of the Eastern States being shaken to such an extent that chimneys were greatly injured, although not hurt.

The new postage stamps have been designed by the Bureau of Engraving, and are said to be a great improvement on the old ones and on those used in Europe. President Grant's head is to be on them.

The Tweed case, which was to have been tried by the Supreme Court Chamber at Washington on the 3rd of November, is somewhat excited as regards which side he had been counsel for twenty-five years.

The Swedish government has given the extensive cotton factory, near Stockholm, Sweden, has just purchased 15,000 acres of land in Dunklin and Scott counties, Missouri, where he will establish colonies, build factories, and will engage in the cotton, sugar and tobacco manufacture of cotton. The enterprise will give employment to thousands, and, of whom will be driven away from Sweden, and the rest will soon follow.

Between the 11 and 13 of the Red of the Mississippi by the War Department, about that nearly 14,000 Union troops were interred in the national cemetery near Memphis, Tennessee, of whom 4995 are colored; 9000 are unknown, and 1000 are from Louisiana, 1000 Georgia, Georgia, Fort Donelson, Chattanooga, Murfreesboro, Corinth, and Nashville, Tennessee.

At the recent election in California for Judges of the Supreme Court the Democratic candidates were successful by a large majority.

The Congressional Select Committee on American Navigation Interests, which has just held meetings in Boston, Portland, Bath, Portland, Maine, visited Fall River, Massachusetts, on Friday, and there adjourned to meet in this city on the first Tuesday in November. We learn that the questions before the committee are to be considered are the following: Discriminating duties, one or all of which are desirable to restore our commerce. Abolition of all duties on materials entering into the construction of vessels. Admissibility of foreign ships to be purchased and registered as American vessels. And the granting of subsidies to steam-ship lines, as well in the domestic as in the foreign trade. The last question recommended to the Committee as indispensable to the growth of our mercantile steam marine.

Governor Hendricks, of North Carolina, has been compelled to issue a proclamation threatening the enforcement of martial law in Alamance, Caswell, and Chatham counties, unless the disturbances which are for some time existed therein shall cease. Thefts and murders have been committed; jails broken open—the latter for the purpose of rescuing the accused men hanged. Indeed, civil law has been put at defiance, and there is no security for life and property.

The far-famed Coliseum of Boston was drawn at a lottery October 12.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Upon the capture of Valentia by the Government troops the Spanish Republicans appear to have given up. As soon as their defeat was known Valentia was declared himself a Monarchist. The Duke of Montpensier now declares to be the fairest claimant of succeeding to the Spanish throne. General Prim has been in the Cortes, and has taken into Nassau, where she was released by the authorities. Prim's party in the Cortes is reported that she could not legally be held.

The Papal Army at Rome was reinforced by the arrival of 60 recruits from the United States.

Trial of 60 recruits from the United States.

The Spanish Republicans with an expeditionary force from Florida for Cuba, but has been captured by the Spanish October 1. He was the name of President Juarez, gave him a cordial welcome at the City of Mexico.

The line of railroad between Mexico and Vera Cruz is now in operation. Six miles are now in operation, and 40 miles of railroad are in active operation.

The greatest Catholic procession ever witnessed in Montreal took place October 14—over 100,000 people participated in the demonstration. This was on the occasion of the removal of the relics of St. Sesto from the Roman catacombs to the Bishop's palace.

It now appears to be certain that the Suez Canal will not be reopened before it can be of much service to commerce.

The Ecclesiastical Cabinet refuses an amnesty to the Carlist political prisoners in Spain.

The Earl of Derby died on the morning of October 23 in his 78th year.

The cholera has made fearful ravages in India during the past summer. Since 1865 there has been no hot season so fatal to European residents.

A temple has been recently erected in Calcutta by the Brahmo Somaj—a religious organization founded thirty years ago by an educated Bengalee, who despised the faith of his native country and was opposed to idolatry, but was at the same time wearied by the claims of Christianity. The service of this new temple consists merely of hymns, prayers, meditations, conversations, and readings.

THE GREAT national exposition of the progress of the industrial arts, which has been held in this city for several weeks under the auspices of the American Institute, closes Saturday, October 30. We are pleased to learn that it has been very successful.

HON. JOHN R. BRADY.

HON. JOHN R. BRADY.

THE unanimous nomination of the HON. JOHN R. BRADY for Justice of the Supreme Court, by the Convention of the Democratic party of this city, is a well-deserved tribute to the capacity and integrity of one of the ablest and most highly-esteemed gentlemen on the Bench. Judge BRADY was first elected to the Common Pleas in 1856. In 1862 he was re-elected, having received first the unusual compliment of the Republican nomination, and subsequently of every political organization in the city. He was consequently unanimously elected. In 1867 he was re-elected by a majority of nearly 60,000. Judge BRADY was not an aspirant for the nomination that has just been tendered him, being satisfied with his present position in the Common Pleas. The nomination sought him, not he the nomination. Indeed, he positively declined to be a candidate against Judge CLERKE, and only when it had been determined by the Tammany leaders not to renominate that gentleman did he yield to the urgent solicitations of friends of all parties, and accept. During the war Judge BRADY was among the first to proclaim his unswerving devotion to the Union. During his service of fourteen years on the Bench he has enjoyed the respect of the bar and the community, alike for the purity of his personal character and his ability and integrity as a Judge.

THE NEW FISH MARKET.

THE new building erected at Fulton Ferry for a Fish Market is now nearly completed; it was opened for business on October 25. The old fish market, on the same site, was a nuisance; but the new structure is an ornament to that portion of the city. The building is of wood; it is 195 feet long by 63 feet wide, and is two stories high. The roof is surmounted by three cupolas, each supporting a flag-staff, as shown in our sketch; and the front has three gables. There are eighteen entrances, each having a solid door with a large window above it. The interior is admirably arranged for the purposes of a market. The walls are painted a drab color, and the ceiling light blue. The cost of the building is $120,000.

This market is erected by the Fulton Market Fishmongers' Association, incorporated during the present year, and is devoted exclusively to wholesale business, supplying all the retail dealers of New York and adjacent cities, and furnishing large quantities of fish to distant cities. Two hundred and fifty vessels are employed in the fisheries of this market; and there are frequently discharging at the same time from fifteen to twenty vessels, each having from 15,000 to 25,000 pounds of fish on board. The fishing-grounds extend from Cape May to Cape Sable. Lobsters are caught from Cape Cod to the northern coast of Maine. The green turtles displayed for sale in the market are not taken by vessels specially fitted out for the business, but are brought to New York on fruit vessels from the West India Islands and Florida. The Fishmongers' Association leased the land along East River on which their market is built for $5,000 per year, with the right of using one half of the basin at the rear of the building. The Association agreeing to keep the pier in repair.

An elegant entertainment was given on the evening of October 18 in the market, by the Association, as a formal opening of the institution. Among the prominent gentlemen present were Rev. H. W. BEECHER, Rev. HYATT SMITH, Rev. Mr. HAMMOND, Rev. Mr. GALLAGHER, General STORMS, Colonel THOMAS DEVOE, and many officials of the city government. A magnificent supper was provided, and dancing was kept up until a late hour.

PRES. ELIOT, OF HARVARD.

CHARLES WILLIAM ELIOT, who on the 19th of October was inaugurated President of Harvard College, is a young man, a graduate of the class of 1853, and for several years adjunct Professor of Mathematics and Chemistry on the college staff. President ELIOT is a native of Boston; he belongs to the ELIOT family so long identified with the history of that city. His father, the Hon. S. A. ELIOT, was formerly a Representative in Congress, and at another time the Mayor of Boston. In 1863 CHARLES W. ELIOT resigned his professorship, and became connected with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in Boston, as a professor. He was abroad year before last in company with President ROGERS, of the Institute, when the latter was on his mission from Massachusetts to the Paris Exposition. Mr. ELIOT, while in college, was an oarsman, and is said to have been the stroke oar of the first Harvard Boat Club.

HON. JOHN H. CLIFFORD, who inducted him into office, thus closed his address to him on that occasion:

"Endowed with intellectual tastes and moral characteristics, and accustomed to the prosecution of studies, all eminently fitted to prepare you for your great work; familiar with all the departments, both of popilage and instruction, in the institution, within whose walls you have been nurtured and almost domesticated, as in a second home; your judgment enlarged and strengthened by the ripened fruits of foreign travel, and the observation and study of the best processes of education at home and abroad; receiving a generous and cordial welcome from your learned and accomplished associates to their companionship and chieftainship; and added to all these personal and social qualifications an hereditary loyalty to the institution which can not fail to inspire the heart of a son whose honored father, so many of us remember, was one of its most devoted, efficient, and valued friends—there seems nothing wanting to our heart-felt congratulations on this day, both to the university and yourself."

President ELIOT's inaugural address was an admirable lecture upon college education.

CHARLES W. ELIOT, PRESIDENT OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY JOHN A. WHIPPLE.]

THE DRAGON OF LYME REGIS.

THE British Museum has lately received the fossil remains of a flying dragon, measuring upward of four feet from tip to tip of the expanded wings. The bones of the head, wings, legs, tail, and great part of the trunk, with the ribs, blade-bones, and collar-bones, are imbedded in dark lias shale from Lyme Regis, on the Dorsetshire coast. The head is large in proportion to the trunk, and the tail is as long as the rest of the body: it is extended in a straight, stiff line, the vertebral bones being surrounded and bound together by bundles of fine, long, needle-shaped bones: it is supposed to have served to keep outstretched, or to sustain, a large expanse of the flying membrane or parachute, which extended from the tips of the wings to the feet, and spread along the space between the hind-limbs and tail, after the fashion of certain bats.

The first indication of this monster was described by Buckland in the "Transactions of the Geological Society," and is referred to in his "Bridgewater Treatise," under the name of Pterodactylus macronyx. The subsequently acquired head and tail give characters of the teeth and other parts, which establish a distinct generic form in the family of Flying Reptiles. The animal will be described in the next volume of the Monographs of the Palæontographical Society.

NEW FISH MARKET, NEW YORK CITY.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

THE MOTHER OF OSOPO.

I.

Upon the west bank of the Tagliamento, a river flowing through the Venetian territory, there stand the ruins of Osopo, which in 1859 was a flourishing village, with about 900 inhabitants.

But during the Italian war with Austria the German troops surrounded it. They forbade any one to pass in or out, so that the villagers could procure no food. Their reason for starving the village was this: It was situated at the foot of a rocky cliff, on whose summit stood a fortress, which the Austrians could not succeed in taking, on account of the only road up the cliff being so narrow and dangerous that the soldiers could only go up it one by one. The Italian garrison, of course, kept a sharp lookout on the path. The only resource of the Austrians, therefore, was to starve the village, in the hope that compassion for the helpless women and children, dying of hunger, would induce the fortress to surrender. All the men who could do any thing had fled to join the Italian army.

One evening in September, when every thing looked hot, dried up, and dusty, two women were sitting together on the door-step of one of the best-looking houses in Osopo. The house-door opened into a large room furnished with long wooden tables and benches, and surrounded with shelves, on which stood a quantity of glasses and red terra-cotta jugs. Over the door hung a bunch of grapes, and the words, "Osteria, Buon Vino," were painted in bright blue.

This had been the inn of Osopo, but it was deserted now. The rooms were drearily clean and empty; the glasses dusty and untouched. One of the two women was the mistress of the inn, and she held by the hand her two boys—pale, thin, half-starved little fellows of about three and four years old. The other woman, whose name was Maddalena, looked younger and rather less starved than the other. They were dressed nearly alike, in skirts of dark "bordato," a kind of strong cotton, with white bodices, and bright-colored handkerchiefs crossed in front and fastened down by the apron. There was another such handkerchief on the head, hiding a little the thick plaits of black hair, which were kept up by silver pins run through them.

Maddalena had shoes on, but Rosina's feet were bare.

"Look, Rosa," said the former, giving her friend a basket which contained some bunches of grapes and a little Indian corn flour.

"No, Maddalena," said Rosina, and she pushed it away; "a thousand thanks, but I can not rob you of your food."

"Nonsense: you know I am alone, and I deprive no one else of it. It is mine, and I really can not bear to see those two children, who but a short month ago were the finest in Osopo, dwindling away. Besides, I no longer need it. I have kept a handful of flour to make my 'polenta' for supper, and this evening I go to Udine. Come behind the house, Rosina, and you will see how the black clouds are hanging over the fortress and the hills all round. Tonight there will be a 'temporale,' one of those great autumn thunder-storms, and when the lightning is flashing, and the thunder and rain have driven even the Austrian sentinels under shelter, I will pass through like a flash of the lightning itself. They will not dream of any one's being out on such a night. To-morrow I shall be at Udine; there I have friends, and shall find work directly. Perhaps, too, I may see your husband there, and when he hears about you he will swim the river, as some of our soldiers from the fortress once did, and come to help you."

"I CAN NOT DRAG THEM ALONG WITH ME, AND I AM THEIR MOTHER."

Rosina's eyes flashed, and she shook her head.

"That is what you and all the village think," she said; "that my husband has forgotten me, and cares not what comes of me and his little ones. But I know! I know that he lies cold and dead on one of the battle-fields, or he would be here at my side. Ah! I would go with you, cara, if it were not for these poor little creatures; I can not drag them along with me, and I am their mother. Santa Maria Vergine! I love them more than life, Maddalena; but in this way we shall all three die together. What shall I do when that which you brought is exhausted? But you must go. You were right, for it rains already. A happy journey! I will pray for you always."

"And so will I, dear Rosa; I will do my best to help you. A rivederci, then. In heaven, perhaps."

II.

That night Rosina put her children to sleep after their scrap of supper, and then sat listening with pleasure to the rain and thunder that were aiding her friend's escape, and thinking, "To-morrow she will be at Udine. Perhaps help will soon come."

But each day she rose with the same hope, and each day was disappointed.

On the eighth evening after Maddalena's departure Rosina gave the children the last bit of the food she had brought, made them say their prayers, together with one for the safe return of the "Babbo," which they had said night and morning for a month past, and put them to bed. Then she bent over the elder and said, as calmly as she could,

"Nino must be good to-morrow, and take care of Cicio. Mammina is going to get bread. Old Natalia, who lives opposite, will come and dress you, and give you some breakfast, and stay till mamma comes back in the evening. Addio, cuore."

"Addio, mamma," said the sleepy child. The mother kissed those darling faces again and again: then she looked out. It was a dark, cloudy night. She put on a black shawl, and went to the house opposite. Taking up a pebble she threw it at a window, which presently opened, and some one looked out.

"Natalia," said Rosina, "to-night I shall pass the Austrian ranks, and go to Udine to fetch bread for the little ones. For the love of God go to them in the morning, dress them, feed them, and take care of them till I return. At this time to-morrow I shall be here again."

"Mad girl!" grumbled the old crone, "do you want to get shot? There's that Maddalena, who went away a week ago, and has not been heard of since."

"Is it likely she should?" half laughed Rosina to herself.

"As for the bents, I'll go to them; but as to feeding them, why, I've tasted nothing myself for two days."

Rosina threw something tied in a handkerchief in at the window, which came thump on the room-floor, saying, as she did so,

"In that are four apples I have saved. They'll keep up life in them for to-morrow till I come; and then I'll give you some bread, Natalia. For God's sake, remember." And she walked away.

"Fool," muttered the old woman. "Apples, did she say? The bents can do without. I dare say they've eaten to-day, and well too. Oh, this hunger! It's a wolf that gnaws, gnaws!" She felt for the bundle, and almost involuntarily bit a piece of one apple.

III.

Rosina did not know that almost before she left the village her children's food had already been consumed.

She walked on and on. There was the outline of the camp; she could distinctly hear the sentinel's step. Forward! forward! she was almost past. Alas! the moon, till now hidden behind dense clouds, came out. She went down on her hands and knees behind a hedge; a dried twig snapped under her weight. The sentinel turned: "Who goes there?" She tried to run; it was too late. The soldier was coming on, his musket raised.

"Mater, ora pro nobis." She turned and dropped on her knees. "Misericordia! I want to harm no one, only to get bread for my innocent babies. Bread! for mercy's sake!"

"Bread!" The Croat laughed mockingly, and held out half a black loaf. Her eyes glistening with mingled fear and hope, she stretched out her hand, and advanced a few steps to take it. Only a few. There was a shot, a long, fearful shriek, and a ball from the Croat's musket struck the mother's forehead. Did the sentinel laugh as he returned to his post?

ST. ANN'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N.Y.—SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.—(SEE FIRST PAGE.)

"A LITTLE HAND I COULD NOT SEE, SWEPT O'ER THE TREMBLING KEYS."—(SEE PAGE 710.)

IV.

THE next evening two little children were wandering along the road from Osopo. The small, transparent forms of skin and bone had no covering but a torn shirt. They wandered at last, as if by instinct, to where a figure lay, stiff and rigid, on the ground. They clung round it, crying, "Mamma, mamma, Natalia never ceases to dress us, nobody gave us any thing to eat. Up—come, mamma. How cold you are! Why do you sleep so long?"

The fort was taken at last, and both it and the village were demolished. If the husband and father ever did return to his native place he would have found nothing but charred ruins, and in the little cemetery a small wooden cross to mark the resting-place of all that he loved on earth.

A BLIND MAN'S LOVE.

By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

See Illustration on Page 709.

I HEARD the humming of the streets forever,
As in a sleep—the people came and went Around me as dreams, like shapes that pass
Unseen, but heard, in haunted lands; and oft
Light laughter and a motion close around me,
And gentle speech, disturb'd me. What to me
Was beauteous interchange of day and night—
The coming and the going of the sun,
Gathering grayness, and the rising moon—
And what to me was light of fire or stars,
Since light and darkness came and went around,
Unmark'd by weary eyes that could not see,
That had not seen the day for seven years?
Only, when sunlight daily went away,
My world grew dull and colder—that was all.

And I was hard and dull at twenty-three,
Dull with my grief, hard to the core from dwelling
Sleeping or waking, in the dark so long:
One, and one pleasure only had the power to stir
And trouble all my soul, until it felt
A sunshine of its own. A light fortell,
A tender greeting, fluttering of a dress,
A touch as soft as is a rose's leaf,
That flutter on the grass and makes no sound.
These were the intimations of a world
Beyond my sorrow, the admonishings
Which sweeten'd that dull gloom wherein I dwelt.
Oh, sweeter far than my beauteous thing
The eye could look upon, one little name,
One little soft sweet name, I murmur'd o'er,
Softly, to hear the sound still: ah! the name,
The little living name I murmur'd o'er,
And saw in golden letters in the dark!
May! May! May! May!—I brought me back the time
When I could see the roses and the leaves,
The silver pools of water, the blue hills
Netted in sunny weather! May! May! May!
I murmur'd it forever to my heart,
For joy, for joy of it!... Sweeter than all
To sit within my shadow-land, and hear
That one word spoken while a little hand
I could not see, swept o'er the trembling keys,
And all the air around me seemed to melt
Into a voice, and some midst there sat
One sweet girl-shape before an instrument,
Her bright hair waving, and her eyes of blue
Looking on me! Then the sweet round would cease,
The vision mode of music died away,
And I was weeping in the dark again.

At seventeen, a fever struck me down,
And I arose, and found the world was gone,
And nothing but a shadow world remain'd.
Six weary years we dwelt in London town,
My mother and I, and day by day stricken me.
Such help and skill as only could be found
In that great cloud of sound; for such it was,
And nothing more, to me. But nearly dead!
All skill fell powerless—still those weary eyes
Refused aid—still I wearied and grew hard.
Still mourn'd and pray'd to God that I might die,
Till that new friend, a neighbor's child, came near,
Made light of seeing, gave my soul visions
Ever to perceive and passion to create,
And handed me a pencil, touch, and scent, and sound,
Such as made darkness more divine at times
Than seeing and the sunshine.

Then at last,
Strange as a trumpet wakening the dead
To wonder and white robes, came blessed light
Into my darkness—creation; and I saw,
Yet, for a time, the motion of the world
Look'd dim and ghostly—shapes like phantome came—
Strange as those wondrous flowers she bade me call
Of darkness, and my spirit was opprest'd
With the most awful burden of the sense.
Slow, as a lily opens, leaf by leaf,
Light deepen'd—brightening, brightening—till at last,
Full-orb'd, it broke on a lily's heart,
Unclosed God's perfect day.

Then, as I sat,
Breathless with the new bliss of the bright world
Soft motion and the flutter of a dress
Disturb'd me. Turning, radiant as a rose,
I saw a face I knew not; strange and sweet,
Not beauteous—eyes not luminous, looks not light,
Like those which I had pictured in my dream;
Yet the face smiled upon me eagerly,
And lighten'd as it smiled—while, darkening,
I flush'd and murmur'd inarticulate words,
And, trembling like a leaf, she cried aloud
In the same voice that I had loved so long
In darkness—in the same beloved voice
That I had fondled in my shadow-land:
"Do you not know me? I am May!" whereon
I shiver'd and felt cold.

For all the world
Seem'd bitter and a cheat. The face I dream'd,
The light young delicate face with eyes of blue,
Had faded in the golden light of day:
And in its place a peevish twilight cheek,
A common creature of the clay, with eyes
Not luminous like the eyes I made in dream,
Lingerd and smiled. The world seem'd suddenly
Stale and unprofitable—all the blue of light
Was bitter—all the fragrant sense of love
Seem'd like a wither'd feast-day posy found
At daybreak, when the revelers are gone,
In the stale-smelling hall-room of the feast.
Then I beheld her, like a frightened bird,
With widening eyeballs shrink; and feeling shamed
To look so coldly on my little friend,
I squeezed a feeble smile into my cheeks,
And took her hand: she, fluttering from my touch,
Stood moving; and I saw her as we lived—
A pensive woman, delicate-limb'd, and small,
With brown hair braided o'er Madonna brows,
And dark eyes suffering from the gentle light
They shed on others: on her brow the light
Fell softened and gentle, as in a dream May!
This golden-hair, use spirit of my dream!
Nay, then, the world was bitter and a cheat!

Ah, love, my love! come nearer to me kiss
Her brood, dearest brow; and, sibling, may I kiss
Away all sorrow. Sweeter this soft hair,
Silver'd with the miraculous snows of time
Than all the inanimes looks that e'er beguiled
Rash suitors to the shallows... And at first,
This perfect face repell'd me—it arose
Coldly, like something strange, to which the voice
I knew so well could not be, and I loathed
The light for changing thee!

Then, for long days
The face withdrew, and left me to my thoughts.
And the streets murmur'd, and the world look'd bright,
And shadow-land had died into a dream.
Never had I felt so utterly alone!
Yea, darkness had been blest society
But now the light was terrible indeed.

Now shall I tell by what slow witchery,
Dear love, I grew to yearn for those soft eyes
And that pale, smiling face. Then, in the light
That was as darkness, unaware, again
I hearken'd for thy foot; and how I wept,
When from a distant casement I could see
The trouble of thy clinging. Then I cried
Thy name out loudly, like a man at sea,
And gently up before me rose again
The twilight of thy face; and all at once
I felt I loved it—that the sense was new—
Not with the fever'd humor of the desk—
Not as I loved the shadow in a dream—
But strangely, clingingly, and helplessly,
As weary men ask rest, as fever'd lips
Crave coolness, as in the parch'd Persian sands,
Under the sun's insufferable blaze,
Men seek the shadow of the locust-tree.

Yea, how I loved thee then, drew the blind,
And do not light the lamp, but let me sit
In darkness as of old; and play to me
The tune I loved so in the days of sound,
When I conceived there other than thou wert,
Yet never guessed, dearest, that I did.
What pictures come and fade before thy sight!
All life is hush'd—the world, the daylight fades
To twilight and a silvery star of sound!

PERHAPS IT WAS BETTER SO.

AN OLD WOMAN'S SKETCH.

BARMOUTH is a pretty little watering-place in the South. I have lived there a good many years, and have seen many changes in what was formerly a little fishing village, now grown up to be designated as a town. There is scarcely a clime along the coast that I do not know, and can not connect with some pleasant memory, from a path in the quiet dim pine-woods that I have not trodden in fine weather and wet, in early morning or moonlit night, to a spot, quiet place, young people are apt to call it "slow." There is no promenade. The pier is an unpretentious rude structure. Very few musical or musical people penetrate so far beyond the pale of civilization, and the few balls are given by the county families living around. There is no board of a poet with long hair, and his particular friend an eminent art-critic—a little man with a bald head and a long beard. The musical magicians bring down the last airs from the last opera with their organs and German bands, and set one wondering constantly why Mendelssohn died in the present generation. The circulating library is a constant source of interest, and one of the most exciting incidents is the arrival of a batch of new novels from town. I am very fond of reading—a habit acquired from my friends, I do not know how I should pass the long nights without my books; and though sometimes the troubles of young people bring me sorrow at my night, still I feel certain that when I get the third volume they will all be made happy, and that I shall be happy too.

One wet afternoon I put on my big cloak, and bidding my maid get my tea by the time I returned, I set out for the library. The new box parcel had just arrived, and after a perplexing selection, and having quite a heap in my arms, I was making the best of my way home, when I met Jolliffe, the postman. There was a letter for me — a rare occurrence—and so, doubly freighted, I reached home, where I found my fire burning and comfortable after the rain and wind outside. The letter was from Ethel Berry.

"My dear Miss Bowyer," she said, "Mamma and I are coming to Barmouth in a few days. We do so like to spend a quiet time with you, because it is quite stifling here; and I am so tired of the people and the rocket of London. Everything here and everybody are exactly as they were; nothing changes with you.

"A glimpse of the sea, a blow on the cliff, and the sight of your dear face will do me a world of good. Somebody's coming too!

"Your loving

This was just like Ethel, so fond of quiet, and loving Barmouth so truly. I was so glad to hear she was coming down again, for I looked upon her as a dear child of my own. I wondered who "Somebody" was. Not a lady-friend, or she would have said who. I could scarcely think of Ethel having a lover. I knew I should be jealous, and wonder why they could not leave her with me instead of wishing to take her away, when there were so many girls in the world. But I thought Ethel must be nicer than any of them, and consequently no wonder at any man thinking so too; and then she would be as though she was so happy. I felt quite delighted to know that, though full of curiosity, and told my maid that I expected visitors in a few days, and we began planning means to receive them. My book seemed quite uninteresting after this, although there was a wicked father and a patient suffering daughter in it, who would have made me cry at other times. Well, one morning when the sun was shining brightly upon the blue sea and chalk cliffs, and the wind was blowing freshly upon me as I was trimming my rose-trees in the garden, I saw a figure that I knew so well coming quickly toward me, and presently I had my dear in my arms. She was just the same. Tall and pale, her dark hair even with that tender pathetic look in them that is quite indescribable, and her golden-brown hair falling about her shoulders.

"And how are you and the roses? You look quite beautiful, though I do believe you're crying. Oh, Miss Bowyer, my thing is here, but fresh and bright! But stow, and tell me about every body and every thing."

And I did all of that that had occurred for the last six months, from how poor Lord Kelley bore the loss of his wife, to Jolliffe the postman, and the last litter of puppies.

"And now, in return for all this valuable information," I said, "tell me, Ethel, who 'Somebody' is?"

She blushed, and then with a little laugh—

"Oh, I must not tell you now; I will show him perhaps to-morrow, and he doesn't know! And she began admiring the roses and my big poor little water-color sketches, so that I did not press her to tell me more.

"And now," she said, presently, "I must take you to mamma, who would have so liked to come to you if she could."

So I downed my hat and cloak, and we set off for Thirlet House, where they lived when at Barmouth. It was surely one of the most beautiful mornings I ever remember; even in the dense world of London I recall the sky, the fair the vistas and usually dark nooks, and threw vivid shadows across the path in a manner that delighted me. It was like the sweet air as she danced along, as I have seen many people do who have been living in a big smoky town. As we were nearing the house I came one whistling "Voires-hi mes avenx" from "Faust."

"Somebody's coming," said Ethel, roguishly, and presently the whistler came in sight, and I was introduced to Mr. Arthur Dawlish. He was a large-limbed young man, with dark brown hair and very handsome, decidedly handsome, and knowing it. There was a languid grace in his bow to me, and indeed a general air of sleepy complacency that was irritating.

"So glad to know you," he said, smiling; "I have heard so much about you from Ethel, and you are the very person I most wanted to see." I wood in this way. I hear you paint, and all that sort of thing; rather nice bits about here, don't you think?" Mrs. Berry and Miss Crawford are waiting for you, so perhaps we'd better go to them;" and then we went on to the Hall.

Dawlish was a friend of Mrs. Berry's, a noble-looking woman, with the same dark blue rhetatic eyes as Ethel's, walking about with her crutch, and looking terrified, daughter-like, at General Crawford, beside her—a medium-sized girl of four-and-twenty, with very black hair, dark brown eyes, and very vivacious. Old men and women become spectators to the little tragedies and comedies enacted by the young, and, little noticed themselves, they can remark that escapes the more active members; and, I gossiping with Mrs. Berry, and Ethel and Dawlish and Miss Crawford monopolized Arthur Dawlish, and how animated he became when speaking to her! and how I unconsciously I compared her to Ethel, and though she talked well, I thought her somewhat Frenchified animation and loud laugh contrasted unfavorably with Ethel's quiet smile and air of repose. I took Ethel home with me that night, and when we had parted with our escort I said to Ethel,

"Isn't he nice? And oh, if you knew how good and patient he is, and how much he loves you! I am sure he is!" I was encouraged to say so then, and are to be married in June, and—isn't he handsome?"

"He is very handsome," I said, cheerily.

"Every body thinks so, but I was afraid you might not; and mamma likes him so much; so does Georgiana. I think, though he may be vain, not like that sort of girl. Very rude, as I told him." And so she ran on, and I listened, glad to talk my thoughts about so happy.

And so day after day passed, and I was constantly going to the Hall, or Ethel and Miss Crawford coming to me, and as a consolation to me she would dine with me. The more I saw Miss Crawford the less I liked her; I did not think with Ethel that Dawlish was so indifferent to her—indeed, he seemed quite devoted to her—and observing him look after her when she moved about, and the eagerness in his speech to her that he never showed with Ethel, a daily-noticed fact, I began to suspect that she had in vain tried to shake off, which God knows was only too soon confirmed. One morning I was painting in my little sitting-room: the morning was oppressively warm, and every thing was so still that I could hear the plash of the waves against the distant cliffs. Mr. Dawlish was in the garden, smoking one of my rose-trees which was suffering from blights, Ethel and Georgiana were gathering the latter early. The smoke a cigarette that he had made for her. It was so hot that I leaned back in my arm-chair, unsingly contemplating my sketch of a piece of broken worn cliff against a stormy gray sky, when I heard him talking earnestly, and, unconsciously listening, I heard him say:

"I can't stand this much longer; you know how much I love you, and I can't act this indifference toward you."

I was all attention now. He was not speaking to Ethel.

"But, Mr. Dawlish," Georgiana answered, "how can you speak to me thus, Sir? Are you not engaged to Ethel?"

"Of course I am; but it can be broken off—it shall! You know how I love you; why, you have made me—you have won me over. I thought I loved her until I met you; but I have only just learned what love is.

"You have no right to say this to me. I shall go to Miss Bowyer."

"I think not. Come, we understand one another; and why act this farce when no one is by? Georgie, Ethel! Oh, why did I ever come in peace? I loved her in my contented, easy sort of way until you came, and now I only pity her."

"I am sorry to hear this," she answered. "I never dreamed you cared for me; I thought you had me as a friend, and now you wish me to be an enemy."

"Georgie, don't you like me?"

"I will tell you. I like you.—I love you, though it is wicked to say so, but I thought you were playing with me. I never dreamed you were in earnest, and I tried to go away and leave you with Ethel; but I could not—my passion was too strong. I fought, oh so hard! but I succumbed. Have pity upon me for my weakness." I ought never to have told you so much."

"If I had but met you before I was bound in honor, pie said, passionately, "we should have been spared this wretchedness."

"No, you should not have cared for me if you had been free."

"How bitter you are! Do you want me to swear I love you more than I ever thought I could love any thing? You can not trust me, while she—"

"Trusts you implicitly, and is deceived. Arthur, I speak bitterly because I love so fondly. A woman ever abuses the man she loves as passionately as I love you; but I will not have to bear you maligned by others, and if they did speak against you I would console and defend you—I would not hear any thing bad of you, for your sake. You know it!" she said, in a passionate voice.

"Hush, dear; we shall be overheard!" he said, hurriedly. "Scenes are so absurd, you know; I love you so much; but what will they say, pledged as I am?"

"Oh, courageous man!" she interrupted, bitterly, "what will they think of me?"

"Well, people always say horrible things and tell any amount of lies; but of course I am perfectly indifferent to any thing they may say. Only yesterday Ethel was talking about our marriage-day, little thinking, poor child, how distant that may be. She is going to be so deceived—so sorry."

"How cold you have grown! Do I not suffer too?"

I could not bear to stay and hear more; trembling with indignation and dizzy with the shock, I went through the French window into the garden. Dawlish was still smoking the same grass puffing at his pipe, and Miss Crawford was standing beside him swinging her straw hat in one hand, and resting her other hand on his shoulder. He colored slightly as I looked at him; but she returned my glance with her usual self-possession, as she said with one of her trilling laughs,

"Come out to look for Ethel, Miss Browne? She is at the foot of the cliff gazing at the sea, as though she were Hero expecting Leander to emerge from the waves. A most charming study."

With a nod I passed quickly down to the shore. She was sitting on a rock looking out to sea and beside the pier, and thinking so intently that I stood by unnoticed for some time. She was looking downward with that far-off gaze that some eyes have when people are very happy or in great trouble. Presently she turned her head and saw me.

"Why, you have come out without your hat, and you look so pale and tired! Have you felt that way Arthur pretended to have done?" she added, encouraging the "slaughter of the innocents?" It is so hot; and I was so happy thinking what a prize I had got among men, and how delightful we shall get on together—Arthur and I, I mean —that I could have gone on dreaming all day."

I sat down beside her.

"I am rather tired, dear;" and that was all I said.

It all seemed like a bad dream. How could I break it to her? she trusted him so entirely; to her he was so good and true. I did not think he really cared for me, but Miss Crawford—I was merely a passing whim with him; he seemed so weak, unstable, and so little worthy of trust that I shuddered to think of my darling being married to such a man; but if I remained silent after what I had heard, if I did so many people so, allow things to come right, would they come right? If they went wrong, the sin would rest with me; and then I knew Ethel's trusting confidence, once rudely abused, could never be restored.

"Oh, what can I do!" I thought, with her small hand in mine; "she looks upon me as a guide, an adviser, and I am so unfit for a great ordeal that the sight of her happiness, and the knowledge that I can bright it forever, makes a child of me.

I could not do it: I sat silent and wretched, wondering how it would all end. We went up to the house, and Ethel joined them on the lawn; while I, pleading a headache, went to my room to think over my trouble. Dinner came, and I tried to be cheerful, and join in the running talk of the young people; then Dawlish proposed a stroll upon the pier as the only place where we should get a breath of air, which might do my head good.

It was a beautiful evening. The sun was sinking in a blaze of crimson and gold, painting the sea, with the faintest ripple on its face, the old black pier, and the boats gently rising and falling, with rose-color. The hills over at Whitecliff were lines of blue and mauve. People were in groups upon the pier and beach, love-making, flirting, and gossiping. The long-haired poet and his inseparable companion were the centres of admiring circles; fathers were spelling out their newspapers in the fading light, while children proffered to them trophies in the shape of tiny fish they had captured from the sea. The wet shingle sparkled like a mass of rude jewels, and the distant pine-woods looked vividly green and cool from the rocky cliffs.

Every thing was so calm and peaceful that we ceased even to talk, and the loud laughter of the fishermen about the beach jarred upon the senses. We sat down upon a seat above the wooden railing to the water, looking idly, moodily smoking, and Ethel looking at him from time to time wonderingly. He was usually in unequable spirits than she was particularly over his air of preoccupation. Miss Crawford sat upon the steps with a book upon her knees, but she was not reading. The sun sank beneath ridges of angry-looking red, the hills grew pale and indistinct. Impatiently knocking the ashes from his pipe, and shaking himself like a big Newfoundland dog, Dawlish rose.

"I shall go out for a sail," he said; "it's there's just wind enough to manage to row and along. I feel hipped, and want a change of some sort. Miss Browne, will you and Ethel and Miss Crawford come? Though you are not a good sailor, the sea's like a big duck-pond, and the boat won't pitch a bit. Jack," he called to a fisherman loitering in the boat at the sails up, "is the water pitch a bit."

I declined to go, dreading the mist that was gathering: and Ethel would not leave me, she said, with my head so bad; so he nodded, and seeing Jack had unfurled the sails and was waiting for him, he sauntered down the steps and got into the boat.

"Jump out, Jack," he said; "I shan't want you. I'm an old hand at it, and can sail her myself well enough."

"I wouldn't go out beyond the bar if I was you, Sir," the man said. "We shall have a dirty night, and the wind blowing off the shore you will have to make a long tack coming in, Sir;" and he pointed anxiously at the long black clouds fast rising in the west.

"All right; I shall be back in an hour; let go," and waving his broad straw hat to us, and hooding us good-night, he settled himself comfortably in the stern, and the boat glided slowly out to sea. We remarked watching it until it became a mere blot upon the waves, and then, the wind growing colder, I proposed that we should return home. Some people took possession of Miss Crawford, and Ethel and I walked slowly up the cliff together, turning now and then to look at the boat as it grew smaller and smaller. When we got indoors, feeling no inclination to talk, I took one of my novels, while Ethel laid upon the hearth-rug gazing dreamily into the fire.

"Hark!" she said, suddenly; "what is that?"

There was a low moaning rush and increasing noise, as though the trees were bending to the wind. We went to the window. The moon shone brightly, though obscured occasionally by flying masses of thick cloud.

"Arthur will surely have come back by this time," she said, anxiously. "Shall we go down to the pier and see if any of the boatmen are still there?"

We hastily put on our cloaks and hats. The wind blew so strongly that we could scarce fight our way down to the beach against it. It was fearfully cold. The little waves had become big crested breakers, and the foam was flying along the sands in great white patches. Lights showed the little wooden pier-house for shelter we found Jack.

"Has Mr. Dawlish come in?" I asked.

"No, Miss; and I don't think he will to-night, the wind blowing off the land. But," he added, quickly, "I'll manage he run into Whitecliff before this wind came on. He's too good a sailor to beat against it in such a craft as an open boat. So it's no good your waiting here any longer, Miss. He'll be snugly housed by this time t'other side of the water. Good-night, Miss."

Wishing him good-night, I persuaded Ethel that he must be right, and that we had better go too. So once more we fought our way up the cliff. It was nearly o'clock when we got back. She looked pale and anxious, so I insisted upon her having a little wine. She just touched it with her lips.

"Do you think Arthur would be sure to get safely to Whitecliff? Oh, if any thing happened to him!" she said.

"But, my dear," I answered, as bravely as I could, though I felt terribly ill at ease myself, "a sailor can surely know best. I am sure that he is asleep in bed now, dreaming about you; and unless you go down at once, and say good-night, he will be angry when he next comes back to-morrow! He will not easily forgive himself the fright he has caused you."

Very obediently she did as I wished, and I went to my room, but I felt it useless to try and sleep through the storm. A terrible dread had taken possession of me, and I could not shake it off. I drew my easy-chair to the fire and listened to the storm. I could not rest. I felt as strangely nervous and excited. I could in the stillness of the house hear every sound outside with painful distinctness—the creaking of the trees, the rattle of the casement, and the confused roar of the wind and waves. I caught sight of my face in the mirror over the mantlepiece, and quite started, it looked so haggard and spectral. The fire burned low, and I put on some logs of wood. At length, thoroughly worn out with the day's emotions, I had fallen into a troubled doze, when I was awakened by a low voice speaking rapidly. I turned, and saw Ethel in her white night-dress, peering through the window into the night. "Oh, Arthur," she sobbed, "come back! Why did you leave me? why did I not go with you? Cruel sea, spare him, he is so dear to me; we love one another so dearly, you can not harm him. Why am I here safe and sheltered while you may be fighting with the waves for your dear life? If any thing happened to you I should die, I should not care to live without you. Oh, if we could but die together! How could I let you go! The treacherous sea looked so peaceful, so kind, but I knew it was not. Arthur, my love, my love, I will go, and perhaps may never see you again. My love, my love, I love you better than life, and you love me! Like the strong, bitter wind blows! will it never grow still! I cannot bear it! Arthur, how can you! You may often have thought us cold and thoughtless; you may never have known how I hung upon your every look and word—"

"Ethel!"

"I could not sleep," she said, piteously, turning to me. "Do you think he is safe? I see you are fearful. What can we do?"

"Child," I said, "he is in the hands of God. We weak women can not do any thing. He can do all things. Pray to Him; put your whole trust in Him; be sure He will hear you."

"I have prayed, but I am weak to have to wait and do nothing. Listen to the wind; and to think he may be in it at this very moment! Let us do what we can. I will go and collect all that I feel." She sank upon the floor at my feet, looking up at me pitifully. "Forgive me, but I thought you knew me as saying; and I wouldn't hurt you for the world."

I wrapped a thick shawl round her, and sat through the weary night in unbroken waiting for the morning. It came at last, gray at first; then the sun brightened, and the sun rose. The wind had fallen, but the sea was angry, and the spray flew in showers over the head of the pier. The light of the brightening sun and sunshine was very cheering, and we felt half ashamed of our fears of the night.

"Now you must go and get some sleep, or Dawlish will be quite shocked at the sight of this little wobegone maiden when he comes over this morning," I said, as Ethel, calling me by that name, had first called me, and fell into a heavy, dreamless sleep. Presently Martha came up with a cup of tea.

"Parson Dale wishes to see you, ma'am; but he says he isn't in any hurry, and will wait," she said.

Dressing as quickly as possible, I hurried down stairs, where I found him walking quickly to and fro in the room. He stopped when I entered, and seemed at a loss how to go on, I said,

"You wished to see me, I think."

"Miss is a terrible early lady;" and then he stopped, and I saw how grave he was.

"A message from Mr. Dawlish?" I gasped out.

He had a letter in his hand, and pointed to it significantly.

"I had wished to prepare you for this sad news: this is a message about all that remains of Arthur Dawlish."

"He is dead!"

"Read."

He gave me the open letter, written in an unsteady hand. I can hardly tell how I gathered the sense, the words so swam before my eyes. The body of a gentleman had been washed ashore in the Whitecliff cove supposed to have sailed from Barmouth; then a description of Arthur followed. I wrung my hands, while he tried to console me with trite commonplaces.

"Go away, please," I said, "lest she should hear. Bishop of Argyle and the Isles to-morrow! a few days ago—" strange if we consider that those engaged in it are navigating what they call the Clyde. The night is dark. There is no open vision. The track is unknown. The sailors meet and declare that the captain is inimitable, and that they may be, if they please, asleep. Does this seem a grotesque description? Alas! is it not a true one? This project is one of the wretched needs of great need—a proof of weakness, not, as it has been called, of strength —of the failing strength of that Church which requires such expedients help to bolster up her once so great authority. Alas! darkness lit by no fitful flame is no little to illumine the profound around it. The construction of an artificial means can only produce children in its own likeness. It is the offspring of compromise. In a meeting of wizards to create a brazen head like Bacon's, or a calculating head like Babbage's, the true subject of the forthcoming assemblage at Rome, when we think of the objects which it has in view, and the interests which are at stake, is more puzzling than the brazen head. Its use is recognized to be blunt, and more strength is to be put upon it, all blunt as it is—that is the proposed remedy. Why do not say this to those far from it. Were this a meeting of humble Christians, or the heads of Christ's Church (if it has heads), assembled after truth, our deepest sympathy and our highest reverence would go with them. But this it is not. It is from the spectacle of men seeking to make certain their own preconceived opinions by a decree of their own, and to impose God's word to support them, to turn the flood into a particular channel, and to rule God's acts into unison with their own."

The London Times returns to the so-called miracle of St. Januarius, remarking that the question is less as to what belief the miracle deserves than as to who it is that any longer believes in it. Where is there an Italian who can at all read and write who thinks of San Gennaro and his miracle with any other feelings than those of scorn and indignation, with feelings of bitter resentment against that evil combination of evil and ecclesiastical misrule by which the mass of his brutified countrymen have been plunged into a depth of superstition and fetichism from which it is doubtful whether all the efforts of the present educational system will ever have power to rescue them? The miracle has never been discreetly seen, never put to the test of sound evidence, never wholly believed, never freely impugned. Those have seen and those have believed who were determined to see and believe. It is the same with the smoking fountain and blood-sweating crucifixes, table-turning and spirit-rapping. It is faith that does it all. Pope Pius IX. may, at the close of the Ecumenical Council St. Januarius's miracle a dogma. It will not, for all that, be believed any more or any less than it is now; but there will always be some to go and see it, whether they believe it or not.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

BY OUR SAGE.—Life is a disease of which one dies at last.

PUNABLE.—To open your wife's jewel-box, and discover a strange gentleman's hair done up as a keepsake.

SHARP WORK THEY.—A gentleman, talking an apartment, said to the landlady, "I assure you, Madam, I never left my last lodging landlord in a hurry." She answered, "I hope it was not, Sir, because you went away without paying."

TOO PARTICULAR.—"I went in to bathe," said a Yankee, "where the water was so low the men had a bogg double-jointed shark making rapidly toward me. I found it to be about a foot long, and a yard of me I faced round, dived under the shark, and, taking a knife from my pocket, ripped him across. 'But did you bother with your clothes on?' asked an inquisitive listener. "Well," answered the story-teller, reproachfully,—"well, I did think you ought to be particular in a shark."

After all there is not much difference between the followers and the opponents of Dr. Denver. The one are swallowing, and the other are straining.

KATIE CORRESPONDING.—The following are literal translations from essays composed by Katie boys at the ministers' seats, Kickstown, York, North Africa: "The Rhinoceros.—The story of the rhinoceros. The rhinoceros is a very angry beast. The name of the beast is one. It is said that when it sees a man it comes to him, till he climbs into a tree, and then escape from that beast. And if he does not run he is killed by it; but if he runs and climbs into a tree he will escape, because that the rhinoceros does not know how to climb. But it is said that it sits underneath the tree where the man has climbed; but I don't know whether the man has climbed, or whether that rhinoceros is sitting there still." "The Rhinoceros.—The Rhinoceros is a monster. It is said that when thou seest its dee there are old garments of the people and people leave houses. It is said that it eateneth thee: if a goat should die there is a pestilence in the land, and people die and they are daubed with blood, that it may eat them. For it is said that it eateneth not thee, when it seeketh and wishes to run the stones rattle in its stomach, and is said burning till the morning, and the people come and kill it."

The secret of the success of Chicago newspapers is said to be that the last news everywhere else is the town takes every paper, for fear a divorce notice in which they are interested may be published and they not find it out.

"Why, dear me, Mr. Longwallow," said a good old lady, "how can you drink a whole quart of that bad whisky at one draught?" "Why, madam, the man could breathe again he replied." "I beg pardon, Madam, but upon my soul I was so hard I couldn't blow it out."

"OUR COUNTRY."

Greatest country! bravest people!
Finest churches—finest steeples!
Fastest horses—fairest women!
Biggest lakes that ever swim in.
Most of railroads; longest rivers—
Roads execration! to shivers!
Never finishing, never finishing,
Some of 'em! Others only sinkin';
Jumps the highest—equals the lowest;
Runs the fastest—leads the slowest;
More disasters—more delusions;
More contentions—more confusions—
Who can beat us? who outdo us?
Who can hold a candle to us?
Biggest country—bigger to be—
Now let me hear of sinking Chinese.

A NEW SOCIETY.—The last society spoken of in California is the "Pay-Nothing." It is said to be alarmingly prosperous. The motto-word is "Lend us a dollar." The grip-word is "Broke!"

MANY of the police seem to regard the public as so many bottles of medicine, "To be well shaken before taken."

A billet-doux did William send,
To tell the love that burned him
But it was more than Mary could,
The answer she returned him.

The Siamese Twins always go to bed at the same time; but Chang usually gets up about an hour before Eng. By an understanding between themselves Chang does all the indoor work and Eng runs errands. That is because Eng likes to go out; Chang's habits are sedentary. However, Chang is a good deal the stronger. Eng is a Baptist, but Chang is a Roman Catholic. Eng was baptized at the same time that Chang was, on condition that it should not affect Chang's religion. The two were strong partisans, and both fought gallantly on the Union side in the late battle. Eng was a Democrat, and Chang on the Confederate. They took each other's votes, and neutralized each other. The Siamese were so evenly balanced in favor of each that they could not vote. Chang is a Democrat, and Eng a Republican. They are married, Eng to a Baptist, and Chang to a Roman Catholic. They have been married a long time; but the vexed question was finally decided by the two wives, who consider them both partners, and then exchanging them.

"Shut your eyes and listen mit me," said Uncle Van Heyde. "Vell, the first time I saw Mrs. Partington she was sitting on a bed; and she had a new bonnet on her head, and there was a bow of ribbon before her, and there be tree dollar goose, and she was sitting on a bed." "I can not see," "Vy, I did not count him, say more, and he come out about right over since."

While trudging along one day alone a soldier met a Methodist circuit-rider, whom he at once recognized as such, but affected ignorance of it. "What command do you belong to?" inquired the preacher. "A regiment in Van Dorn's army. And yourself?" "I belong to the army militant." "Militant, indeed!" quoth the Lord. "Free, my friend," said the soldier, "you've got a very long way from headquarters."

DEMOCRATIC

MADE

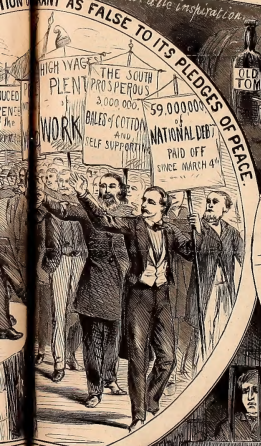
PLATFORM

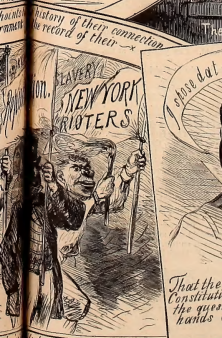
the Military,

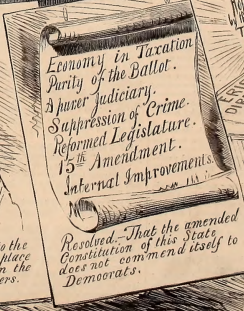
The abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau.

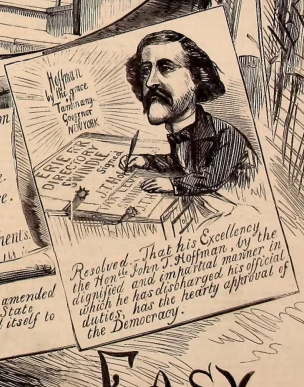
We arraign the administration for its indifference to the fate of American citizens, victims of foreign despotism.

And for its military dictation:









EASY.

BELOW THE HEIGHTS.

I SAT at Berne, and watched the chain
Of icy peaks and passes,
That towered like gods above the plain
In stern majestic masses.

I waited till the evening light
Upon their heads descended;
They caught it on their glittering height,
And held it there suspended:

I saw the red spread o'er the white,
Just like a maiden's blushing,
Till all were bathed in rosy light
That seemed from heaven rushing:

The dead white snow was full of life,
As if some huge Pygmalion
Had sought to find himself a wife
In stones that saw Deucalion.

Too soon the light began to wane,
Though lingering soft and tender,
And the snow-giants sank again
Into their calm, dead splendor.

And, as I watched the last faint glow,
I turned as pale as they did,
And sighed to think that on the snow
The rose so quickly faded.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book II.

CHAPTER III.

IN MR. FROST'S SANCTUM.

MESSRS. FROST AND LOVEGROVE, solicitors, had their offices in a large old house in Bedford Square. The whole of the ground-floor was used for offices. In the upper part of the house lived the family of the senior partner.

The chief reason for selecting the locality of the offices—which did not sound, Mr. Lovegrove said, an altogether "professional" address—was that he might enjoy the advantage of residing at the place of business; of being, as he was fond of mentioning, "on the spot."

"That is exactly what I don't want," said Mr. Frost, and accordingly he inhabited a house at Bayswater.

But the Lovegroves, especially the female Lovegroves, dwelt in family conclave that Mr. Frost lived at Bayswater rather than at Bedford Square because Mrs. Frost deemed Bedford Square vulgar. She was reported to have asked where it was, with a vague air of wonder, as of an inquirer into the geography of Central Africa. And Augustus Lovegrove, Junior, the only son of the family, gave an imitation of Mrs. Frost setting out to visit her husband's office, furnished with a sandwich-case and a flask of sherry, as though for a long journey; and mimicked the tone of fashionable boredom in which she would ask a coachman where one changed horses to go to Bedford Square. But that, said his sisters, was only Gus's fun.

In fact, there was a suppressed, but not the less deadly, feud between the houses of Frost and Lovegrove on all social points. In their business relations the two partners seldom jarred.

Mr. Frost was a match cleverer man than Mr. Lovegrove. He was also the better educated of the two, and nature had gifted him with a commanding person and an impressive address.

Mr. Lovegrove was a commonplace individual. He said of himself that he had a great power of sticking to business; and he said truly. Mr. Frost entirely appreciated his partner's solid and unobtrusive merits. He declared Lovegrove to be "a thoroughly safe, dependable fellow." And the flavor of patronage in his approbation was in no degree distasteful to Mr. Lovegrove.

In the office their respective qualities and acquirements were the complement each other; and they agreed admirably. Out of the office their views were so dissimilar as to be antagonistic.

Mr. Lovegrove was a very devout High-Churchman, and thought his head gravely over Mr. Frost's want of orthodoxy. Indeed, to describe Mr. Frost's opinions as unorthodox was to characterize them in the mildest manner. Mr. Frost was a confirmed skeptic, and his skepticism was nearly allied to cynicism.

There is a homely illustration, immortalized by the pen of a great modern writer, which may, perhaps, convey an idea of the state of Mr. Frost's mind.

In one of that great writer's well-known pages political reformers are warned, when they empty the dirty water out of the tub, not to throw the baby whose ablutions have been made in it floating down the kennel likewise. Get rid of the dirty water, by all means; but—save the baby!

Now Mr. Frost, it was to be feared, had not saved the baby.

Then the women of the two families did not stand in amicable relations toward each other. Mrs. Lovegrove was envious of Mrs. Frost's wealth. Mrs. Frost was disdainful of Mrs. Lovegrove.

The two husbands would occasionally remonstrate, each with the wife of his house, respecting this inconvenient, not to say reprehensible, state of things; and would openly, in marital fashion, wonder why the deuce the women were so spiteful and so silly!

"I wish, George, Mr. Frost would say, "that you would behave with decent civility to Lovegrove's wife when you meet her. She does not come in your way often. I think it very selfish that you will not make the least effort to please me, when I have told you so often how serious an inconvenience it would be to me to have any coolness with Lovegrove."

"Why can't you get on with Mrs. Frost, Sarah?" Mr. Lovegrove would ask, gravely. "I and Frost never have a word together; and two more different men you would scarcely find."

But none the less did a feeling of animosity smoulder in the breasts of the two ladies. And perhaps the chief circumstance that prevented the feeling from breaking out into a blaze was the wide distance which separates Bayswater from Bedford Square.

At the latter place Mr. Frost had a little private room, the last and smallest of a suite of three, opening one within the other, which looked on to a smoke-blackened yard some five feet square. Mr. Frost had shut out the view of the opposite wall by the expedient of having his window-frame filled with panes of colored glass. The diminished the amount of the opportunity of daylight that was admitted into the room. But Mr. Frost neither came to his office very early nor remained there very late; so that his work there was done during those hours of the day in which, when the sun shone at all, he sent his beams in through the red and purple panes of the window.

It was understood in the office that when Mr. Frost closed the outer one of the green-baize double doors which shut in his private room, he was not to be disturbed save on the most pressing and important business. So long as only the inner door remained closed, Mr. Frost was accessible to six-and-eightpence-yielding messengers, when once their knock which usually kept the outer door open was removed, and the dark green portal had swung to, with a subdued noise, as though in deference to their pullers, then no clerk in the employ of the firm, scarcely even Mr. Lovegrove himself, willingly ventured on the task of disturbing the privacy of the senior partner.

And yet one morning, soon after Hugh Lockwood's return to London, Mrs. Lockwood walked into the offices at Bedford Square, and required that Mr. Frost should be informed of her presence: during the fact, carefully pointed out to her notice, that Mr. Frost's room was shut by the outer door; and that Mr. Lovegrove, Mr. Frost was understood to be particularly engaged.

"I feel sure that Mr. Frost would see me if you would be good enough to take in my name," said the little woman, looking into the face of the clerk who had spoken to her.

There was something singularly irresistible in the composed certainty of her manner. Neither were the lady-like neatness of her dress, and the soft, refined tones of her voice, without their influence on the young man.

"Have you an appointment?" he asked, hesitating.

"Not precisely an appointment for this special morning. But I have frequently been admitted at this hour by Mr. Frost, who will kindly take in my name to him, I am quite willing to assume the responsibility of disturbing him."

"Well, you see, ma'am, that's just what you can't do. The responsibility would be on our shoulders, whether it turned out that I am doing right or wrong. However, since you say that Mr. Frost has seen you at this time before—Perhaps you can give me a card to take in to him."

Mrs. Lockwood took a little note-book out of her pocket, tore off a blank page, and wrote on it with the neatest of tiny pencils, the initials Z. L.

"I have no card," she said, smiling; "but if you will show Mr. Frost that paper I think you will find that he will admit me."

The clerk disappeared, and returned in a few moments, begging the lady to step that way.

The last door did stop short at the green-baize door closed silently behind her short, trim, black figure.

Mr. Frost was seated at a table covered with papers. On one side, and within reach of his hand, stood a small cabinet full of drawers. It was a handsome article, such as is frequent in inhaid wood, and would have seemed more suited to a lady's boudoir than to a lawyer's office. But there was in truth nothing of what Mr. Lovegrove called "the shop" about the furniture or fittings of this tiny sanctum. The purple carpet was soft to the foot, the walls were stained of a warm stone-color, and the two easy-chairs—the only seats which the small size of the room gave room for—were covered with "morocco leather of the same hue as the carpet.

Over the chimney-piece hung a picture—one of the Academy—and shining that Wardour Street could turn out. Mr. Frost called it (and thought it) a Salvator Rosa.

The only technical belongings visible in the room were a few carefully-selected law books on a spare shelf near the window.

Lovegrove does all the pounce and parchment business," Mr. Frost was wont to say, jocosely. "He likes it."

But no client who had ever sat in the purple morocco easy-chair opposite to Mr. Frost failed to discover that, however much that gentleman might profess to despise those outward and visible symbols of his profession which he characterized generally as "Lovegrove's paraphernalia," he was none the less a keen, acute, practical, hard-headed lawyer.

Mr. Frost looked up from his papers as Mrs. Lockwood quietly entered the room.

His face wore a look of care, and almost of premature age; for his portly upright figure, perfectly dark hair, and vigor of movement betokened a man still in the prime of his strength. But his face was livid and haggard, and his eyebrows were surmounted by a complex series of wrinkles, which drew together as he knit, that gave him the expression of one continually and painfully at work in the solution of some weighty problem.

He rose and shook hands with Mrs. Lockwood, and then waved her to the chair opposite to his own.

"Tell me at once," he said, folding his hands before him on the table, and slightly bending forward as he addressed the widow, "if your business is really pressing. I scarcely think there is another person in London whom I would have admitted at this moment."

"My business is pressing, and I am much obliged to you," replied Mrs. Lockwood, looking at him steadily.

"You have, with your usual incredulity, that I had no real occupation when your visit interrupted me. Sometimes, I grant you, I shut myself in with fictions for a little— Hah! I was going to say pence! for a little quiet, for leisure to think for myself, instead of having out my thinking faculties for other people. But to-day it was not so. Look here!"

He pointed to the mass of papers under his hand (on the announcement of Mrs. Lockwood's approach he had thrown a large sheet of blotting-paper over them), and fluttered them rapidly with his fingers.

"I have been going through these, and was only half-way when you came."

"Bills?" said Mrs. Lockwood.

"Some bills, and some— Yes; chiefly bills. But they all need looking at."

As he spoke he forced them aside with a careless gesture, which half hid them once more under the blotting-paper.

Mrs. Lockwood's observant eyes had perceived that one of them bore the heading of a fashionable milliner's establishment.

"I am sorry," she said, to interrupt the calculation of your wife's bonnet bills; but I really must intrude my prosaic business on your notice."

"What a bitter little weed you are, Zillah!" rejoined Mr. Frost, leaning back in his chair and regarding her thoughtfully.

"You have no right to say so."

"The best right, for I know you. I don't complain—"

"Oh! you don't complain!" she echoed, with a short, soft laugh.

"No, I do not," proceeded; "I do not complain that your tongue is steeped in wormwood sometimes; for I know that you have not found life of honey. Neither have I, Zillah. If you knew my anxieties, my sleepless nights, my— But you would not believe me, even if I had time and inclination to talk about myself. What is it that you want with me this morning?"

"I want my money."

"Have you come here to say that?"

"That's the gist of what I have come to say. I put it curtly, I remember, shortly. But you know very well that that is always the burden of the tale."

"Do you expect me to take out a pocket-book full of bank-notes and hand them to you across the table like a man in a play? But," he added, after a moment's pause, with his own temper, "it is worse than useless for us to jangle. You are too sensible a woman to have come here unless you believed that I owed you me. Tell me what has induced you to take this step?"

"I desired to speak with you. To the first note I sent you, asking you to call in Gower Street, I got no answer."

"I was absent day and night at the time. I meant to come to you as soon as I had an hour's leisure."

"To the second note you replied that you were going out of town for three days."

"It was quite true. I only got back last night."

"And therefore I came here this morning."

"Has any thing new happened?"

"Something new is always happening. Hugh is bent on setting up for himself. His father's friends in the country have subscribed for it."

"It would be time on his part to leave Digby and West for the next year or so. I give this opinion just as a friend: if I were asked for his views by a perfect stranger." You doubtless think that I am actuated by some underhand motive."

"No, I do not think so. And, moreover, I should agree with you in your opinion, if I did not know that Hugh is entitled to a sum of money which will enable him to make the experiment he contemplates a judicious instead of a rash one."

"I do not see that."

"Hugh, at all events, has the right to judge for himself."

"And you have no right to interfere by judgment."

"Sometimes I am tempted—may, often, very often, I am tempted to do so. Hugh every thing, and let him fight his own fight. I am so tired of it!"

"Tell him, then!" ejaculated Mr. Frost, impatiently. "I, too, am weary, God knows!"

"You have the power to put an end to your weariness whenever you please. Do me justice. After all, I am but claiming what is my own."

"It is your own. I know it. I have never sought to deny it. You can not say that I have."

He rose with a quick, irritable movement from his chair, and stood leaning against the mantlepiece, with his face to the empty grate.

Then why not restore it at once, and end this weary business?

"Surely you must understand that such a sum is not to be had at a moment's notice!"

"A moment's notice! How many years is it since you promised me that it should be restored as soon as Hugh came of age?"

"I know, I know. But during this last year or two there have been embarrassments, and—and difficulties."

Mrs. Lockwood leaned her head on her hand and looked up at him. "Do you know," she said, slowly, "what I begin to be afraid of? That you have been telling me the truth lately, and that you really are in pecuniary difficulties!"

The blood rushed darkly over the lawyer's face, but he met her look with a smile and an ironical raising of the eyebrows.

"Upon my word," he said, "you are civil—and ingenious. You begin to be afraid that I have been telling you the truth? I presume you have hitherto supposed that I kept your cash in hand, round, yellow sovereigns, locked up in a box, and that I took nothing to do but to take them out whenever I chose and hand them over to you! I am sorry that I can not gratify you by realizing your apprehensions. I have been telling you the truth, but, nevertheless, your money is safe!"

The air of superiority in the man, his voice and bearing, were not without their effect on Mrs. Lockwood. Her face faltered and fell. Then she said, "You can at least name some time for a settlement, can you not? Give me some fixed date to look forward to. I have been very patient."

"Look here, Zillah, I have a very advantageous thing in view. It will be highly lucrative, if it comes off as I anticipate. It has been proposed to me to go abroad in the character of legal adviser to a very wealthy and powerful English company, and—"

"To go abroad!"

"Temporarily. For a few months merely. It is a question of obtaining a concession for some important works from the Italian government. If the affair succeeds, I shall be in a position not only to pay you back your own—that," he added, watching her face, "is a matter of course in any case—but to advance Hugh's prospects very materially. Will you have a little more patience and a little more faith, and wait until the winter?"

"Six months?" said Mrs. Lockwood, wearily.

"Yes; six months. Say six months! And meanwhile— As for Hugh, since he knows nothing, he will be suffering no unpleasantness."

"Hugh! Oh, thank God! If it had been a question of subjecting my son instead of myself to the grinding of hope deferred, the matters would have been settled in one way or the other years ago!"

Mr. Frost looked at the small, frail figure before him; at the pale, delicate-featured face, framed in its soft gray curls; and he wondered at the strength of resolution to endure that was expressed in every curve of her mouth, in the firmness of her attitude as she stood with her little round hands clasped in front of her, in the steadiness of the dark eyes whose setting was so worn and tear-stained.

"Could I, Zillah," he said, taking her hand; "I will come to Gower Street soon."

"Yes; you had better come. Hugh misses you. He wants to talk to you about his plans, he says."

"I shall give him the advice I told you—to go to Digby and West for at least another year on the terms they offer. Bless my life, it is no such hardship! What hurry is there for him to undertake the responsibilities and cares of a professional man who has, or thinks he has," added Mr. Frost, hastily correcting himself, "nothing in the world to depend upon for his own exertions?"

Mrs. Lockwood made as though she were about to speak, but then checked herself with a little, quick sigh.

"Zillah," said Mr. Frost, taking again the hand he had relinquished, and bending down to look into her face, "there is something new! You have not told me all that is in your mind."

"Because all is in my mind as yet—my subject is all vague and uncertain. But I fancy—I think—that Hugh has fallen in love."

Mr. Frost took the rest of the women, and put your real meaning into the postscript. I knew there was something you had to say."

He did not move from it at all. It is only a surmise—"

"I have considerable faith in the accuracy of your surmises; and it furnishes a likely enough motive for Hugh's hot haste to make himself a place in the world. Can you guess at the woman?"

"I know her. She is a girl of barely eighteen. She lives in my house."

"What! that Lady—Lady—"

"Lady Tallis Gale's niece, Miss Desmond."

"Desmond! Desmond! Why, did I know, I have it! Lovegrove is trustee under her mother's will. She has a mere pittance secured to her out of the estate. Not a penny more. Handsome, those kind of people, though they may be almost beggars, would, ten to one, look down upon your son from their height of family grandeur. This girl's father was one of the Power-Desmonds, a beggarly, scatter-brained, unworldly, Irish gentleman. Why, every day the young lady has been taught to be proud of her (probably hypothetical) descent from a savage prince or a fairy-tale!"

"Very likely. But your eloquence is wasted on me. You should talk to Hugh. I'm afraid he has not his ears open to you."

"Set his heart! Hugh is—how old? Three-and-twenty?"

"Hugh will be twenty-five in August."

"Ah! Think of a woman of your experience talking of a young fellow of that age having 'set his heart' on any thing! No doubt he has 'set his heart.' And how many times will it be set and unset again before he is thirty?"

"God forbid that Hugh should be such a man as some whom my experience has taught me to know!"

"Humph! Just now this love on which Hugh has 'set his heart' was a mere surmise on your part. Now you declare it to be a serious and established fact, and 'God forbid' it should not be!"

"When will you come?" asked Mrs. Lockwood, disregarding the sneer.

"I will come to-morrow evening if I can. You know that my time is mine to dispose of."

"True. But it is sometimes easier to dispose of that which belongs to other people than of one's own rightful property, is it not?"

With this Parthian dart Mrs. Lockwood disappeared, gliding ghostlessly out of the small room through the next chamber, and acknowledging by a modest, quiet little bend of the head the respectful salutation of the clerk who had first admitted her, in rising to open the door for her exit.

WILD-FOWL IN SOUTH AFRICA.

ONE illustration on page 716 represents a scene which Mr. THOMAS BAINES (a gentleman who has spent several years in traveling through the region of the Zambesi River) saw on December, 1864—a multitude of flamingoes, pelicans, and dunkers on the sand-spit dividing Sandwich Harbor from the sea. It should be observed that many of the harbors on the shores of Southwest Africa are formed by the prevalent southwest wind driving from sea by projecting point a constant shoal, between which and the beach is a sheltered bay, where vessels of moderate burden may lie in perfect quiet while the surf breaks furiously outside this apparently fine harbor. Walvish (or Whalefish) Bay and Sandwich Harbor are of this class, and the lagoons and shallows of each are favorite resorts of dunkers, cormorants, pelicans, and flamingoes. The dunkers are so numerous that a flock of these birds wheeling in nuzzy evolutions over the bay and skimming the beach darkens a space of ground half a mile or more in extent. The flamingoes, wading to a uniform depth, form regular lines along the edge of the beach, like regiments of soldiers; or, when disturbed, rise in the air like a flickering rosate cloud, dazzling with intense brightness under the unclouded sun. Some of the smaller species of flamingoes which are found more inland are entirely of a deep and beautiful crimson. The Kimberley gold-field, and the shore has crimson wings, white neck with a delicate flush of pink, and pink or light crimson beak and legs. The bird most seen in the foreground of our engraving has not yet attained its perfect plumage. Its wings are marked with brown, just hinting at the color to come to succession; its beak is pale blue, and its legs are slenderer. A thorn-backed shark, some yards of the skeleton of a whale, and a few shells are seen lying on the beach.

"HESITATION."

SWEET seventeen! Poets have sung about it—painters have painted it, or tried to paint it—musicians have crammed peans of praise to it on their harps, sackbuts, psalteries, banjos, and all kinds of instruments; cowards have fled in fear of captivating influences; warriors have trembled before its exacting charms. What wonder, then, that one poor creature—like the one depicted in our illustration on page 717—should feel in her honest heart sick when the moment arrived in which her fate—or, rather her fate?—too bashful to look in the glass, and see reflected there the half coy, half-impudent face that bids him come if he dare, and yet seems to dare to come, filled with strange wonderment that that coffee pot should cheer him on and bid him not be such a fool, in looking for what he has got in his own days, when the plump old lady beside him was much such another skittish maiden. She has not frequently for her encouragement—as for the bashful lover there is a touch of proud remembrance of the time when she, too, hesitated; and, knowing that hesitation was torture, she prolonged the pain for the sake of the triumph. It will be all over presently, for there is a courage on that youth's brow which, when he is within arm's-length, will carry him on till there shall be the reflections of two faces in that one small bit of looking-glass, and then hesitation will be over, and by one word the life-history of both will be fixed.

A LEOPARD HUNT WITH FOX-HOUNDS.

OOTACAMUND, the principal sanitarium of Southern India, has a great advantage over the Himalayan stations, being situated in the midst of an extensive plateau, instead of being perched amidst precipitous lofty hills. To the west of Ootacamund, which occupies nearly the centre of a plateau of thirty square miles, stretch the vast undulating downs, covered with short but strong and coarse, and affording such unfailing foothold, that, even in the wettest weather, the horse may easily be ridden at speed along the steepest hill-sides, which are unbroken even by a mole-hill. A few small thick woods, dotted over these slopes, harbor innumerable jackals, regular mountaineers, strong-limbed and long-winded. The Madras fox-hounds, which are necessarily sent away from the plains during the hot season, from March till October, have been this year engaged in the Nilgiris; but the Ootacamund pack have been meeting twice a week. They have given good sport and acquitted themselves very creditably, in spite of the difficulties involved in the fact that to view eight or ten jackals in an hour is by no means an uncommon occurrence. A fair number of victims have, nevertheless, been pulled down in full career, or ignominiously dragged from earths; and "Jack," though not possessing, perhaps, the pluck of an English fox, will often give a smart run of twenty to forty minutes, very different from the mere gallop on the plains. But our illustration is from a sketch furnished by a local correspondent, who took a part, on June 22, in a most extraordinary run, which has created the wonder of all the Anglo-Indian sportsmen. The hounds had run down a jackal and killed him in the Nunggenad Valley, and the only persons with them were Mr. SCHMIDT, Mr. ATKINS, and the huntsman, when a fine full-grown leopard suddenly darted from the thicket, and away went every dog full cry after this strange object of chase. They soon came up with the unwieldy animal him, and rolled him over; but he punished some of them with his teeth and claws. He broke from them, and got into a copse, with a view to climb a tree; but the hounds again caught him, and he then turned at bay. Thirteen couple of them, having got deep into the thicket, were out of sight, while the barking, yelping, and howling of the dogs, and the furious growling of the leopard, told of the conflict on. Then the huntsman, and several gentlemen who had by this time come up, endeavored in vain to call off the dogs, which it is believed by the natives is too valuable to be exposed to the risks of such an encounter. After the efforts of half an hour the hounds were got out. None of them were killed, but several were badly bitten. Guns were meantime sent for, and Mr. Atkins made two good shots at the leopard, crippling him, with the first and killing him with the second.

CHARLES READE'S IDEAL WOMAN.

THERE is, perhaps, no writer of equal eminence who has so clearly shown the character and principles of his genius in the first chapter or two of his novels as "Peg Woffington," his earliest work, is at once an epitome and admonition of all he has done. Mr. Reade's repertoire is limited. He has one brilliant, splendid woman, full of noble instincts, of passion and generosity, of high and delicate sentiment, and of delight, and whom he can not too often reproduce; and he has another simple, tender, wise, tenacious creature who is the type of endurance, the defender, the only being who fully comprehends the first; and between these two he has a fancy for placing a number of commonplace, unsympathetic men. This is but a small circle, yet it is wide enough to give occasion for many exquisite contrasts and delicate studies. It is impossible to no doubt a weakness in point of art; but we doubt much whether it is not an additional charm to the ordinary reader that he knows what he is to get, and whom he can trust. The story requires a perception of character, and requires to have it impressed upon him by many repetitions. The favorite conception of our novelists, like Mrs. Woffington, his Christie Johnstone, his Kate, are all more or less repetitions, with changes of costume and circumstance, of Peg. It is the very ideal of womankind, according to what Mr. Mill would call the imperfect and inductive definition which the world has been permitted it since the beginning of the world; a being full of perception and delicacy, of wit and humor, of quick sympathy, of instinctive truth, however concealed by, at the same time, not above the deceptions of society; of unconquerable courage, of the subtle imagination suggests for the management and well-being of others; a creature equal to all emergencies, rising with her nerves value to any danger; able to brace herself for every necessary exertion, and to do whatsoever may be necessary with a certain splendor of self-devotion. Something of Rosalind, something of Imogen, is in this fine conception—yet it is original, and has never been done in the same manner by any other. That Mr. Dickens never dreamed of such a being, nor even the broader intelligence of Thackeray, we are sure; and that the fine, versified genius of Lord Lytton, it is unnecessary to say. Mr. Reade has made this woman; he has clothed her, in the first instance, with the vent of romanticists, but in beautiful power and strength, the fullness of health, and truth, and purity and tenderness. He has set her forth not as a passive, but an active being, able to do almost any thing she puts her hand to, and never ashamed by no misconception or self-consciousness, though white and splendid with natural modesty. Whatever she undertakes she undertakes to her coming and her goings impress themselves on all minds; she is the centre of the picture wherever she appears. The interest of her life is the continuation between what this noble creature can do and what she can not. She can labor with a man's energy and boldness; she can risk fortune at the tide; she can save lives and win hearts. But she can not sway some one weak, selfish soul about her, or even one weak part of herself, nor take away from it the faithful affections of which it is unworthy. Every thing else she can do, but not this. Her faithfulness is proof against her own clear sight and discrimination. Such is Peg Woffington, the actress; such is Christie Johnstone; such is Kate Peyton; such is Kate Gaunt. Each is perfectly true to her surroundings and to her age. There is, so to speak, no resemblance between them; their costume is varied with all the skill of consummate art; they think as becomes their different positions and habits, with the slightest confusion of identity; and yet they are one. Perhaps—such a thing is possible—had the author begun—such a thing is possible—had the author concentrated his powers on one production of his favorite character, something more effective still might have been the result. But we should be very reluctant to be put to it which of the trio we would part with. Not Christie, the pride of Newhaven; and not the brave, sweet, gay, infinitely gifted actress. If one were to be sacrificed, Kate, we think, would have the least hold on our hearts. And yet how noble is Kate in her virtues and her errors, her boldness, her fears, her miserable mistakes, and suffering! The woman walks through the book, with her grand stature and stately form, winning us, enchanting us, offending us, like a real creature. The reader feels disposed to pause, and warn, and remonstrate, and hid her look well what she is about. Harm will come of it! we call out to her unconsciously: and she knows it—half hears it—yet is onward. What a woman! If there were many like her, how poor would all Mr. Mill's pleas for equality sound (as, Heaven knows, without that they sound quite enough)! Equal to the good-natured lout by her side, whom she condescends to love! One might as well speak of equality between a cloud and the sea, or between the pole-star and a smoky lantern. This is the thing of all others which Mr. Reade has done best; and we are not one of his contemporaries, and few of his predecessors, who have given such an idea to the world.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

FATHER HAGGERTY has arrived in this port on the 10th of October on board the Borussia. He sailed October 5. The passage was made in eight days and sixteen hours—the shortest transatlantic trip on record. In our editorial columns last week we gave a history of the conflict between Father Hyacinthe and his Superior. This conflict has now been continued for several years. Even in 1866 he was restricted by instructions from Rome, which, against which, however, he sometimes rebelled. During that year, in a discourse delivered by him in the Church of St. Sulpice, in Lyons, before the Archbishop, instance of this, the sermon Father Hyacinthe confined himself at first to the subject which had been given him, and which was by his superiors. The commencement of his discourse was cold and unimpassioned, and failed to excite any enthusiasm in his audience. Suddenly, however, he followed his own inspiration, and uttered an eloquent apostrophe to the Virgin, which brought the whole assembly and in the Church, and on the universal selfishness which prevailed in the place. This latter portion of his discourse excited little surprise, and was the subject of much comment. In a second sermon he was reprimanded by his superiors for his activity over dogma. "I have wandered over the world," he said, "and have every where found only genius of intelligence, and the love of understanding. I have entered the cloister, and have there only met with absolute faith." The Archbishop of Lyons, Cardinal Donald, heard this sermon preached, and publicly defended at it. In the next burst of his indignation he went for Father Hyacinthe, and forbade him to preach in any church of his diocese. The urgent representations of the highest authorities induced him to withdraw that prohibition. He again sent for Father Hyacinthe, and in a mild and unconmonly forbearing manner told him that he would be no more to do the Church if he went on with his violent attacks upon it. Father Hyacinthe could not resist this friendly advice, and promised to control himself in future. It was not until lately that he found himself unable to keep this promise any longer.

Before his departure for this country Father Hyacinthe gave utterings to Miss Vinnie Ream for a new bust.

Who has a desire to understand what French-and-Chinese music is like? The editor of a San Francisco paper has published a Chinese theatre for the purpose of ascertaining, and thus enlightens the public: "Imagine yourself in a Chinese theatre. Fifty or sixty Mongol men are putting in rivets, a mammoth tin-shop next door on one side, and a forty-stamp quartz mill on the other. Add to these charivari party with six hundred instruments in front, four thousand enraged cats in the rear, and a faint idea will be conceived of the performance of a first-class Chinese band of music."

In Cambridge, Massachusetts, fifty families propose to try co-operative housekeeping, on a capital of ten thousand dollars. Culinary, laundry, and sewing departments will be established, and the scheme gives full promise of being successful. It is said Professor Blot will have general charge of the kitchen.

In Hartford, Connecticut, another plan is suggested to make housekeeping cares lighter. It proposes the erection of a building, to cost one hundred by sixty, having a basement, four full stories, and an attic. On each story there would be six complete suits of rooms, a hall and staircase, and a dumb-waiter.

In the basement would be a kitchen and restaurant; and the apartments would be rented to families, they can take their meals in the restaurant or have them sent to their rooms. The owner of the building proposes to furnish the rooms every thing, and provide all things at reasonable cost. This every family would have its home, with the advantages of a share of housekeeping. It is very evident that in the course of the next quarter of a century various projects will be devised by which many of the annoyances now incident to housekeeping will be removed, and yet the home be preserved.

Vishnu, a god of the Hindoos, has very much startled his worshipers of late, by anything past them at night on a celestial white elephant, with a flash of lightning. Those who are so irreverent as not to believe in Vishnu, however, declare that this celestial wheel is the property of a Mr. Stevenson who is ambitious to be the first velocipede rider under an Asiatic sun; but finding the best opportunity for the exercise of his bicycle at night, and illuminating his path by a lantern.

We are interested in the fate of the poor wretch who fell a victim to the belle who went this last year to the White Mountains, and there under a vow to accept the man who made her the hundredth offer of marriage. She kept her resolution, to the story goes. But who was the man? What was his name? And hasn't he wished before this time that he was one of the unlucky ninety-nine?

Presence of mind prevented a fearful accident on the Fort Wayne Railroad, near Jackson, Michigan, a short time ago. An express train was sent out from the depôt for some special purpose, and it reached full speed round a curve to a bridge six hundred feet long. Instantly the engineer reversed the engine, for he saw a man with his wife and two children on the narrow portion of the bridge, where it is just wide enough for a train to pass, about midway of its length. Catching up the children in his arms, the man told his wife to run toward the end of the bridge, until the train should reach her, and then jump into the water. She did as directed, and fell into the river beneath of the iron monster she jumped from the bridge, fortunately alighting in not more than two feet of water, and the train passed her in safety. The father could not run with the same speed, but he coolly and steadily, in the face of the approaching train, lowered himself with them to a brace beneath the bed timbers, and there held them fast within a few feet of the water, while the train came thundering over them. Near the centre of the bridge the excitement on engineer and brakeman effected the stoppage of the train, and their assistance was rendered to extricate the frightened family from their yet very perilous position.

The Hippodrome in Paris, which was recently destroyed by fire, was an immense building of glass and wood, which contained seats for spectators, but the ring had no covering but the sky. The conflagration was terrific, and illumined all Paris, fortunately having night into day. The Hippodrome itself was not an expensive structure, but many other buildings in the vicinity were consumed.

Our readers may not be aware that in Jamaica Notaire herself supplies us with marking-ink. He brags among a plentiful season. Another occurrence of the scandal which has introduced the subject of incest to the attention of young persons is a forthcoming drama entitled the Countess Gaiccioli's 'Recollections of the Poet.' It will be a six-shilling volume. The Countess was the fair and fascinating husband, M. de Boissy, would not be a bad book. He was a frank man, and used to introduce his wife as "Mrs. Byron De Boissy ma femme, ancienne maitresse de Byron."

Archbishop Manning, of England, recently delivered a lecture at Stockbridge, in which he said that modern civilization was a state of society "founded on lawless, godless education, falsehood, and the contradictions in matters of religion, and the absolute renunciation of the supreme authority of the Christian religion." He also interprets the Pope's refusal, in refusing to secularize himself to Liberalism, progress, and modern civilization. "I will not," he said, "do it not. Your progress means decay; I maintain Christian marriage. Your progress means secular education; I maintain that education is inseparably and necessarily Christian. You maintain that it is a good thing that the people should think as they will and they like, preach as they like, and propagate what errors they please. I say that it is sowing error broadcast over the land. I say that I have no mercy over the Christian world, that I am not the vicar of the Good Shepherd if I do not feel the supreme interest of the Christian Faith. I am all these. You ask me to abdicate, to renounce my supreme authority. You tell me that I am powerless in the civil power. That is a subject of the King of Italy, and from him I am to receive instructions. I have to the way I exercise the civil power. I say I am liberated from all civil subjection, that my Lord made me the subject of no one but Himself and His successor; that I, Pius IX., am sovereign. I acknowledge no civil superior, I am the subject of no power on earth. I am sovereign this—I claim to be the supreme judge and director of the consciences of men—of the peasant that tills the field and of the king that sits on the throne—of the schoolchild that lives in the shade of privacy and the legislature that makes laws for a kingdome—I claim the right of Supreme Judge of what is right and wrong." Would it not be as fair to say that Romanism is founded upon the battery so to declare Protestant progress" founded upon divorce."

Mr. Gladstone, the British Premier, has shown great boldness and liberality as he has exhibited in his theological appointments. He has recently promoted the Rev. Frederick Temple, D.D., to the bishopric of Exeter. Dr. Temple has been head-master of Rugby for ten years, and was one of the writers of the "Essays and Reviews" which have since agitated the Church. Bewley, the author of "Ecce Homo," to the chair of Modern History at Cambridge. Both these appointments have provoked censure. Lord Shaftesbury styles "Ecce Homo" "the most mischievous book that has ever been published in the jaws of the Christian Seeley is distinguished by high character and great ability. He is an eminent layman of wide culture, a thinker of considerable power, a student of history in the loftiest sense of the word, and a writer who can express his meaning with force and vividness.

Captain C. P. Ball's lecture at Steinway Hall, in this city, on the evening of October 15, was a success. The hall was filled nearly to its utmost capacity. These accounts of Arctic discoveries appear to be of very great interest to the public.

There are three "Homes for Disabled Veterans" which have been established in different parts of the country since the close of the civil war. One is located at Augusta, Maine; one at Dayton, Ohio; and one, which has very recently been opened, at Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The fund of these institutions consists of military dues and forfeitures of deserters, unclaimed pay and prize-money, and a most commendable ten million dollars. These asylums are not hospitals, nor almes-houses, but places where disabled soldiers may receive subsistence, care, and suitable instruction; where employment is provided, for which proper compensation is given, and where every thing possible will be done for the comfort of those who have bravely defended our country's flag.

The Milwaukee Home is situated about three miles west of the city. The park includes 40 acres, a part of which has been appropriated to farming purposes, and the remainder is being finely laid out under the supervision of an experienced landscape gardener. The building is neat and tasteful, contains every needed convenience, and can comfortably accommodate five hundred inmates. It is heated by steam, and a gasbome will soon be built. The kitchen is fitted up with modern improvements, and the washing and ironing are to be chiefly done by steam machinery. The "Home" is in the form of a cross, and the first-floor of the central building is mostly occupied by public rooms; the dormitories are in the second, third, and fourth stories. There is a central tower, a hundred and fifty feet high, which affords a fine view of the surrounding country.

FLAMINGOES, PELICANS, AND DUIKERS, AT SANDWICH HARBOR, SOUTH AFRICA.—[See Page 715.]

A LEOPARD HUNT WITH FOX-HOUNDS IN SOUTHERN INDIA.—[SEE PAGE 715.]

"HESITATION."—[SEE PAGE 715.]

THE COLOSSEUM.

WITHOUT gazing with one's own eyes on the mighty fabric it is impossible to comprehend its vastness or its grandeur as a ruin. On the spot where it was reared by Titus and Vespasian, on their return from the conquest of Jerusalem, a lake formerly existed, the work of the infamous Nero. Twelve thousand Jewish prisoners of war, brought to Rome to give eclat to a triumph of imperial dignity, in the year A.D. 72, goaded on day by the whip, laid the foundation of the Colosseum. They worked many years at their task, till Vespasian died. Their descendants, the poor, crushed, despised Jews, may be seen in the Ghetto by any traveler who has the curiosity to examine that quarter of the city. Titus dedicated the edifice in the year 80, and the inauguration lasted one hundred days. Fifty wild beasts were daily killed, and no less than five thousand were slaughtered in combats in the arena. It was four stories high, oval, without a roof, and would seat comfortably 87,000, besides giving standing-room for witnessing the spectacles for 22,000 more. An awning protected the audience from sunshine and rain. Palaces of amazing size, public and private edifices, and structures without number, have been built out of brick taken from its walls for several hundred years, and yet the remaining mass is one of the wonders of the world. Happily further depredations have been interdicted, and some attempts made to repair the weakest parts, so that the Colosseum may probably outlast, in fact, ruin as it is, one or two thousand years longer.

QUARRELING.

THE tendency to let any dispute drift into a quarrel is very much a matter of habit; but it is a habit which may be greatly modified, if not wholly cured. We should avoid quarrels, to begin with, that moderation in language and temper is evidence, not of weakness of character, but of the reverse. While a quarrel is in embryo, moderation and self-control may remove it; but when it passes that stage—when it is developed into a quarrel—then the credit of setting the matter to rights is at an end. The prudent man will now simply withdraw himself from the affair, instead of needlessly involving himself in a useless struggle. Of course, it requires some discretion to know when the dispute has reached the point of being quarrelsome; and it is at this point that it should be thrown up. Considerations of false pride should not be allowed to interfere. No matter how just your cause is, there is nothing to be gained by declaiming against the injustice of your opponent, who sees only right on his side. A man ought to study the history and development of former quarrels, in which he has been engaged, in order to see how senseless they were, and what an enormous waste of time and temper they involved. He will see the most contemptible grow more definite, until it reaches that stage at which it is impossible to remove it without the most drastic abnegation on one side or the other. He will perceive that neither side is willing to take the lead in coming to an arrangement. The cause of dispute becomes a side-issue, bigger. Each disputant is now more confirmed in his notions. By-and-by, they are not to anxious to prove themselves right as they are to punish each other for being quarrelsome and causing annoyance. The original grounds of quarrel is lost sight of in this sense of mutual injury. They are angry with each other because each has quarreled, and the quarrel is continued out of revenge. How does it end? Time, the great pacifier, smooths down their wrath; but look at all they have suffered and lost in the interim! It is fortunate, indeed, if one or other perceives the obvious lesson, and resolves thenceforth to abandon any dispute which reaches the irretrievable and merely reciprimitory stage.

A USEFUL HOUSEHOLD MACHINE.—The most perfect WRINGER of which we have knowledge is the UNIVERSAL. We do our readers a real service when we recommend such a machine to their notice.—[Com.]

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION.—This is one of the most promising and readable Youths' publications with which we are acquainted. It is issued from Boston, is most judiciously conducted, and has among its contributors such writers as Mr. Stowe, Mr. Alger, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and others equally acceptable to the young people. Its subscription for 1870 are more than ordinarily attractive.—[Com.]

"THEY CURE!" What cures? AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL for a Cough, AYER'S PILLS for a purgative, and AYER'S SARSAPARILLA for the complaints that require an alterative medicine.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

$10, $12, $15, $20, $25.

Watches and Imitation Brazilian and Australian Diamond Jewelry. New Styles Oroide Gold Chains, $3 to $10 each. Call or send for Price-List.

JOHN FOGGAN,
No. 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fellows, N. Y.

Popular Music at Popular Prices.

HITCHCOCK'S

SHEET MUSIC FOR THE MILLION,

At Five Cents per Copy.

Sacred Music and New and Popular Songs

ARRANGED WITH PIANO ACCOMPANIMENTS.

Also,

Instrumental Pieces, Polkas, Waltzes, Schottisches, Marches, Duets, Operatic Airs, &c.

TO THE PUBLIC:

Believing that whatever tends to amuse and instruct, to cultivate and develop the mind, or to elevate the character and diversify the nature of Home Enjoyments, is ever welcome to the American People, this Series is respectfully presented. Our object is to enable all classes—rich and poor—to have a desire for Music, to become possessed of all the popular productions of the day, without incurring an almost prohibitory expense: in a word, to supply

CHOICE MUSIC AT A PRICE WITHIN THE REACH OF ALL.

HITCHCOCK'S HALF-DIME MUSIC.

NO.	AUTHOR.
180.	I'll Ask my Mother. Earnshaw.
149.	Have You Seen Her Lately? Tutc.
148.	The Hard to Give the Hand. Glover.
141.	Rise Water, Wreath of Roses. Millard.
145.	Spanish Muleteer. Scotch.
146.	The Mile of Edinboro. Scotch.
144.	Coming through the Rye. Balfe.
143.	The Prince of the Valley. Claribel.
140.	I can not Sing the Old Songs. Claribel.
139.	Janet's Choice. Claribel.
138.	Strangers Yet. Rogers.
137.	Waiting by the Gate. Clippingdale.
136.	Wild Youngs Lady. Sear.
135.	Call Her Back and Kiss Her. Clifton.
134.	The Bluebell Polka. Rogers.
133.	There was a Simple Maiden. Machrives.
132.	Sunset Galop. Wild.
131.	Hamlet, Prince of Denmark. Raymond.
130.	Heaven and Thee. Ogleblum.
129.	The Roman Maurice. Rogers.
128.	The March of the Silent Men. Viviani.
127.	It Ought not Thus to Be. Abt.
126.	In Happy Moments. Wallace.
125.	Old Simon the Cellarer. Hatton.
124.	The Fairy's Frolic. Sedgwick.
123.	The Bridal Ring. Rodwell.
122.	The Heart Bowed Down. Balfe.
121.	The Love Light's in your Eyes. Sedgwick.
120.	Waverly Polka. Sedgwick.
119.	The Drawing-Room Schottische. Douglass.
118.	The Harper and his Boy. Gaisford.
117.	She is not Fair to Outward View. Sullivan.
116.	Little Maid of the Silver Tear. Balfe.
115.	Then You'll Remember Me. Balfe.
114.	When the Swallows Homeward Fly. Abt.
113.	You and I. Claribel.
112.	Only a Lock of Hair. Claribel.
111.	Mary Emma Polka. Rogers.
110.	I'd Clasp Me to Thy Heart Again. Balfe.
109.	Scotch Lassie Jean. Peabody.
108.	Dancing Love. Rogers.
107.	Tommy Dodd. Raymond.
106.	Wood-Nymph. Flowers.
105.	Never Mind the Rest. H. Fase.
104.	The World is Full of Beauty. Waverly.
103.	O that I were a Song! Hime.
102.	The Well-Blossomed Tree. Musgrave.
101.	Smiles and Tears. Clippingdale.
100.	I have None. Carrington.
99.	Go it while you're Young. Waverly.
98.	Grandma Waltz. Goldbeck.
97.	Molly Bawn. Lover.
96.	Jessica. Porter.
95.	I'm not Myself at all. Lover.
94.	Beautiful Hope. Bard.
93.	The Cavalier. Glover.
92.	Continental Schottische. Rogers.
91.	Of what is the Old Man Thinking? Knight.
90.	Sally, Sally. Lover.
89.	Ka-loorie-um. Hatton.
88.	Nothing Else to Do. Hatton.
87.	Crescent-City March. Rogers.
86.	Fuddle your own Canoe. Robson.
85.	Scenes that are Brightest. Wallace.
84.	Castles in the Air. Adams.
84.	The Bell goes a Ringing for Sarah. Hunt.
83.	Sweet Bird. Glover.
82.	School for Jolly Dogs. Copeland.
81.	Will we ever a Wooing. Raymond.
80.	Maggie Morgan. Scotch.
79.	Mary Ann Polka. Scotch.
78.	Larboard Watch. Duet. Williams.
77.	The Bashful Young Lady. Stewart.
76.	After Dark.

NO.	AUTHOR.
75.	Bachelor's Hall. Culver.
74.	Oh would I were a Bird. Waverly.
73.	Oh, my Pretty Blue-Eyed Witch. Blamphin.
72.	My Angel. Taylor.
71.	The Pilgrim's Wife. Guglielmo.
69.	Day and Night I Thought of Thee. Covert.
68.	My Mother Dear. Shrivall.
67.	Barney O'Hea. Lover.
66.	Chestnut-Street Belles. Raymond.
65.	Boston Belles. Raymond.
64.	Be Careful and Beware. Sacr.
63.	Where there's a Will there's a Way. Lloyd.
62.	Love's Request. Raymond.
61.	The Lancashire Lass. Blamphin.
60.	Bell Ringing Polka. Irving.
59.	Mabel Waltz. Waverly.
58.	Sweet Days of Memory. Balfe.
57.	Sweetheart. Waverly.
56.	Root-Black's Song. Claribel.
55.	Lady Mine. Raymond.
54.	Five O'Clock in the Morning. Waverly.
53.	Those Tassels on the Boots. Nathan.
52.	Pretty, Pretty Bird. L'Eclair.
51.	Why Wandering Here? Offenbach.
50.	Call me Thine Own. Balfe.
49.	Le Sabre de mon Pere. Inst'l. Richards.
48.	Woodside Waltz and Polka. Gabenbach.
47.	Home, Sweet Home. Inst'l. Frout.
46.	Perichole's Letter. Inst'l. Bailey.
45.	The Moonlit Sea. Leander.
44.	St. Nicholas Galop. Raymond.
43.	Velocipede Johnny. Raymond.
42.	Gems d'Amour. Inst'l. do. Raymond.
41.	Gems from Orphee. Violin and Piano. Raymond.
40.	Belles of Mowbray. Raymond.
39.	Flying Trapeze. Wade.
38.	Fond of Music. Inst'l. Claribel.
37.	Susan's Story. V. Galetti.
36.	I will not Ask to Press that Cheek. Forbes.
35.	The Rosy Wreath. Claribel.
34.	The Life Boat. Hatton.
33.	Light of the World. (Sacred Song.) Hatton.
32.	Bessie's Charm in Spring. Waverly.
31.	See the Conquering Hero. Inst'l. Handel.
30.	Take Back Your Gold. Claribel.
29.	The Passing Bell. (Sacred Song.) Dolores.
28.	Still I Love Thee. Andrews.
27.	Waltzing Down at Long Branch. Andrews.
26.	Riding Down Broadway. Millard.
24.	She might not Suit your Fancy. Benedict.
23.	Arm-in-Arm Polka Mazurka. Claribel.
19.	The Rose of Erin. Molloy.
18.	Silver Chime. Forbes.
17.	The Old Cottage Clock. Claribel.
16.	Life Let Me Shine over all. Blamphin.
15.	Maggie's Secret. Graf.
14.	Little Fanny May. Wiener.
13.	The Danish Boy's Whistle. Wiener.
12.	A Home Without Love, by Darling. Lee.
11.	Genevieve Waltz. Schubert.
10.	Skating-Rink Polka. Gabriel.
9.	Champagne Charley. Hatton.
8.	Pride of Erin. Lloyd.
7.	I Really don't Think I shall Marry. Molloy.
6.	Kiss Me, Sweetheart, Good-by. Claribel.
5.	Not for Joseph. Claribel.
4.	Ellie Rhine. Maclagan.
3.	We'd Better Bide a Wee.
2.	Won't You Tell Me Why, Robin?
1.	Captain Jinks.

The above can be obtained at the Music, Book, and Periodical Stores, or by enclosing the price.

FIVE CENTS each. Other choice selections will rapidly follow.

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 24 Beekman St., New York.

SI—TAKING THE REINS.

GRANT, BONNER, & DEXTER.

BY JOHN W. EHNINGER, N.A.

"It is a striking likeness of the horse, and, I have no hesitation in saying, the best representation of a horse in action that I have ever seen.

—"ROBERT BONNER."

The splendid photograph, embodying three life-like portraits, is 12½ x 17½ inches, exclusive of mount.

Sent free of expense on receipt of $1 00.

Larger Edition, 19 x 21, beautifully mounted on India tint, at $3 00; Ten copies for $26 00.

Address PILKINGTON JACKSON, Art Publisher, Care of HARPER & BROTHERS, Liberal Terms to Agents. New York.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.

Nos. 75 and 77 Spring St., corner Crosby.

ESTABLISHED 1850.

Wholesale and retail manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c., suitable for city and country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and amusing, 25 cents a package. Library or Love, 50 cents. Send to W. C. WEBER, 4 Astor Place, N.Y.

PATENT STEM-WINDING WATCHES.

CORN-SILVER HUNTING CASES, $21; EXTRA FINE, $28.

GOLD

Hunting-Case Full-Jeweled Lever Watches, $45, $48; EXTRA, $60.

Ladies' Size, $36; EXTRA, $46; Enameled, $46.

COIN-SILVER

HUNTING CASES, $34; EXTRA QUALITY, $16.

AMERICAN MOVEMENTS,

Every variety. LATEST, LOWEST PRICES.

And Watches of every description, in fine Gold and Silver Cases, at Importers' Rates.

Goods sent by Express, to be paid for only after they have been examined, examined, and approved.

S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
Nos. 52 & 54 John St., N. Y.

Full Descriptive Price-List sent free.

LACE CURTAINS, Styles for 1870.—L Made after our own designs, and imported by no other house in America. Nottingham Lace Curtains, over one hundred different patterns, many of them now first introduced in this market.

Curtain Materials and Furniture Coverings of Brocatelle, Rep, Terry, Damasks, &c. Curtains and Lambrequins made to order. Manufacturers of Tassels, Cords, Gimps, Fringes, and Trimmings. Window Shades of all kinds on hand or made to order. Wholesale or retail. G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
No. 447 Broadway, between Howard and Grand Sts.
N.B.—FURNITURE STORE at No. 661 Broadway.

WATCH BUYERS,

Before purchasing, should write for a Descriptive Price-List of Foreign and American Watches.
SPRAGUE & EASTMAN, 96 Washington St., Boston.

Freeman & Burr,

CLOTHIERS,

138 & 140 FULTON St.,
NEW YORK,

invite attention to the magnificent stock of Men's and Boys' Clothing. It is of unparalleled extent and variety, made up in strict accordance with prevailing styles from the most fashionable materials, and for novelty of design and excellence in workmanship can not be surpassed.

OVERCOATS for all seasons, $8 to $50.

SUITS for all occasions and occupations, $12 to $60.

BOYS' SUITS for all ages, $6 to $20.

COUNTRY ORDERS.—Rules for self-measurement and samples of goods free. Freeman & Burr mail free, on application, their new rules for self-measurement, patterns of goods, and price-lists, which enable gentlemen in any part of the country to order clothing direct from them with the certainty of receiving perfect-fitting garments.

S. W. GEERY,

IMPORTER,

Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,

Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 346 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Wines has been the special business of this house for years.

My stock comprises some of the finest liquors in the country.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any before offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. Its great recommend is the attention of scientific men. Not has it been only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

Price now $16 to $22.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, gratis, on application.

Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., with charges.

Address JULES D. JEANNERET,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

FRENCH CLOCKS,

BRONZES,

FANCY GOODS,

MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,

Opera Glasses,

FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,

PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES,

WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,

No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!

NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement on all previous remedies before attained. It consists of the alternated inhalation of harmless liquids—they are colorless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing, and powerful curatives. Relief and comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in due course of time. It penetrates through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease, breaks it up at its fountain head—removes all the wretched symptoms, such as pain in the temples, dullness in the head, obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat, "cold in the head," sneezing, dizziness, loss of smell, hearing, taste, and sight, and even the sense of taste and smell. It literally extinguishes this loathsome malady in all its forms forever, and cures the most hopeless case known. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to CERRIT NORTON, office 31 Ann St., N. Y.

BELONGS TO NO SECT.

BUT GIVES THE NEWS OF ALL THE CHURCHES.

NEW YORK OBSERVER.

$3 00 PER ANNUM.

SAMPLE COPIES FREE.

SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

"A GOOD BARGAIN!" "CHEAP READING."—The October Newsdealer, and December Numbers, PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL MAGAZINE—worth 20 cents—sent gratis to new subscribers who remit $3 for the volume for 1870, during October or November. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

THE MYSTERIOUS PUZZLE. A Great Sensation. Sent for 10 cents.
WALTER HOLT, 102 Nassau St., N. Y. Box 1338.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS. Complete. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition, Complete in 8 vols., 12mo, in Cloth Case. 75 cents per volume. Half Calf, $2 00 per volume.

ADAM BEDE.

THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.

FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER.

ROMOLA.

2.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By ERMENE YATES, Author of "Kissing the Rod," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

3.

THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE, King of Naples and of Italy. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. Uniform with

ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES.

16mo, Cloth, $1 00 per volume.

CYRUS THE GREAT, DARIUS THE GREAT, XERXES, ALEXANDER THE GREAT, ROMULUS, HANNIBAL, PYRRHUS, JULIUS CÆSAR, CLEOPATRA, NERO, ALFRED THE GREAT, WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, RICHARD I., RICHARD II., RICHARD III., MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, QUEEN ELIZABETH, CHARLES I., CHARLES II., JOSEPHINE, MARIA ANTOINETTE, MADAME ROLAND, HENRY IV., PETER THE GREAT, GEORGE III., KING PHILIP, HERNANDO CORTEZ, MARGARET OF ANJOU, JOSEPH BONAPARTE.

4.

A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK; or, A County Family. A Novel. By the Author of "One of the Family," "Lucy Dayy's Year," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

5.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, Descriptive, Topical, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution," With 300 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1084 pages, large 8vo, Price, in Cloth, Library Style, $6 00; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

6.

THE MINISTER'S WIFE. A Novel. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "Perpetual Curate," "Life of Edward Irving," "Brownlows," "Agnes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

7.

UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy; embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By THOMAS C. UPHAM, D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Bowdoin College. In Two Volumes, Vol. I.: Intellect, Language; Vol. II.: Sensibilities, Will. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per Vol.

8.

IN SILK ATTIRE. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.

COUNTESS GISELA. A Novel. By E. MARLITT. Translated by A. Nahmer. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

10.

A GREEK GRAMMAR FOR BEGINNERS. By WILLIAM HENRY WADDELL, Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of Georgia. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

11.

FOUND DEAD. A Novel. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

12.

THE SEVEN CURSES OF LONDON. By JAMES GREENWOOD, "A Lodger in London," Author of "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "Reuben Davidger," "Wild Sports of the World," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

13.

FALSE COLORS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

14.

MOORE'S BYRON. The Letters and Journals of Lord Byron. With Notices of his Life. 8 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $4 00.

15.

GUICCIOLI'S LORD BYRON. My Recollections of Lord Byron, and those of Eye-Witnesses of his Life. By the COUNTESS GUICCIOLI. Translated by HENRY E. HERSFORD. A. Portrait. 16mo, Cloth, $1 75.

16.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, $1 25.

17.

META'S FAITH. A Novel. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

18.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS.

New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's own Illustrations.

VANITY FAIR. 24 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.

PENDENNIS. 19 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

THE VIRGINIANS. 332 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE NEWCOMES. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HENRY ESMOND and LOVEL THE WIDOWER. 42 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

19.

RHETORIC: a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By HOY. E. O. HAVEN, D.D., LL.D., President of the Northwestern University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

20.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 30 cents.

FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

PUTTE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

PEG WOFFINGTON, CHRISTIE JOHNSTONE, and Other Stories. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

21.

THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and the Rio Negro," "Essays on Trees of the Tropics," &c. With Ten Maps and Fifty-one elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE CELEBRATED IMITATION

Gold Watches and Jewelry.

THE COLLINS METAL, THE ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE ORIDE.

The $15 Watches, in appearance and for time, are equal to gold cases costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, at $20, are not surpassed by gold watches. For TIME, ELEGANCE, FINISH, and DURABILITY, no imitation of gold can begin to compare with the Collins Metal. Excepting the intrinsic value, it is equal to gold. Every watch fully warranted by certificate.

CHAINS FROM $8 TO $8.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Ear-Rings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Charms, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Necklaces, Gold-Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send the seventh Watch free of charge. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money need not be sent with the order, as bills can be collected and taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. We employ no agents; orders, therefore, must be sent to us. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only office is No. 335 Broadway, two doors North St. (up stairs), New York.—C. E. COLLINS & CO.

HENRY WARD

BEECHER'S

SERMONS IN

PLYMOUTH PULPIT

Are being read by people of every class and denomination all over this country and Europe. They are full of Extraordinary Power and Thrilling Feeling. Plymouth Pulpit is published weekly, and contains Mr Beecher's sermons and Prayers, in form suitable for preservation and binding. For sale by all Newsdealers. Price 10c. Yearly subscription received by the publishers, $3, giving two handsome volumes of over 400 pages each. Halfyearly, $1.50. A new and superb Steel Portrait of Mr. Beecher presented to all yearly subscribers. Extraordinary Offer! Plymouth Pulpit ($3) and The Christian Union ($2 00), an Unsectarian, Independent Family Paper, 16 pages, cut and stitched, clearly printed, ably edited, sent to one address for 52 numbers for four dollars. Liberal inducements to canvassers and those getting up clubs. Specimen copies, postage free. Address

J. B. FORD & CO., Pub'rs, 39 Park Row, N.Y.

Bloomington Nursery.

500 Acres. 18th Year. 10 Green-Houses.

Fruit, Ornamental and Nursery Stock, immense and reliable assortment, at low rates for cash.

Apples—including most magnificent stock of yearlings; also Standard Pears, Cherries, Plums, Peaches, Oldenburg, Hicks, Transcendent, and other Crab Apples, 3, 4, and 5 years.

Peaches, Pears, Cherries, Plums, Quinces, Grapes, Currant and Gooseberry Bushes, Asparagus Roots, Orange Osage Plants, Roses, own roots: Tulips, Hyacinths, Narcissus, Iris, Lilies, Crocus, Snowdrops, Jonquils.

Also superior colored plates of Fruits and Flowers. Send 10 cents for Catalogue.

F. K. PHŒNIX, Bloomington, McLean Co., Ill.

$10 Watches $10

THE GREAT TRADE INFRINGEMENT ASSOCIATION, Incorporated by the State, have purchased the entire stock of the Bankrupt Co., of 10,000 Engraving fully illustrating and describing all our Watches, Chains, Jewelry, Diamonds, &c., and Circulars, and will when ordered, send out, on the following plans:—No. 1 Single Engraving, 10c.; Twelve, 25c. Each premium, $2; Twenty-five, and one Watch, $5. Each premium, $10. Every engraving entitles the holder thereof to a Watch worth twice the amount of money sent for it. Thus, for 10c. we send a $20 Watch; for 25c., a $50 Watch, &c. Agents wanted. Send for circular, with the buyer may obtain a watch worth $250. Circulars free! The 44 ladies' Gold Hunting Watches, $10.

MICHELIN & CO., Managers,
No. 6 Nassau Street, New York.

GREAT INDUCEMENTS TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Let those who want a firstclass Lady's Magazine send for the Weekly Paper send at once for a sample copy of

THE LADY'S FRIEND

and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, and see the unequaled inducements offered. $2 50 a year for each, or $5 for both. Four cents for the evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to it, may be made by any person who can read and write. Either paper is only a sample of the value of the literary business, we make this unparalleled offer. To such as are not acquainted with us, we say that we have been 20 years in business. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will be to commence one the right start, and a list of the cash premiums we award, sent free. Address at once. Most and best family newspapers published—if you want the best, don't fail to send for specimens before subscribing elsewhere.

DEPOSIT PUBLISHING HOUSE,
No. 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—Weare now prepared to furnish all classes with employment at their own homes, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not already supplied with work, we will send a sample free by mail. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will be to commence work on, and a list of the cash prices we pay for work, sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address G. STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

FURNITURE.—New designs and new styles; low prices for first-class warranted goods. Original drawings for Furniture, Cabinet Work, and Interior Decorations for dwellings with hard wood and furniture adapted to the same. Also, manufacturers of the new patent and steam-dried lumber used; none other will stand furnace heat. S. D. J. & J. BELTER & CO., 667 Broadway, near Amity St.

N. B.—Curtain and Furniture-Covering Store at No. 447 Broadway.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $3, $5, $8, $10, $20, $30. Send for a circular to LOWE PRESS CO.,
15 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

THE CHURCHMAN

THE BEST and CHEAPEST Weekly Newspaper, with the LARGEST circulation in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Established in 1845, and now enlarged, illustrated and till Jan. 1, 1870, to new subscribers for the small sum of $2 a year, in advance.

E. J. MALLORY & CO., Hartford, Conn.

BOOSEY'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS. Complete catalogue, containing over 1,000 pieces, free. Boosey's "Ballad Singer" is the new Half-Dime Series of the best Songs. Sent free every where on specimen number mailed for Five Cents.—Ed. Broadway, N. Y.

MAPLE LEAVES, enlarged and improved. 16 pp. The best, the most popular, and the cheapest Magazine published. It will be sent from now to the end of 1870 for 50 cents. Send in your subscriptions without delay.

D. A. ROORBACH, 169 Nassau St., New York.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair or beard to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1. For sale by Merchants & Druggists generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

LIVINGSTON'S PATENT

BRACED WEB SAW.

PATENT OBOUND.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and is more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON SAW MANUFACTURING CO., 59 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

CIRCULATION 86,000 COPIES!

The greatest success is attending the publication of

BALLOU'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE

of any periodical in the world. Each number contains Five Hundred Pages of the choicest Stories, Poems, and Engravings, or TWELVE HUNDRED PAGES every year for $1 50. Any one thirsty for genuine fun at large or either of the four-dollar Magazines, at about one-third their price.

☞ Now is the Time to Subscribe. ☜

TERMS—$1 50 a year; 7 copies, $9; 13 copies, $15.

☞ Send stamp for specimen copy and prospectus to ELLIOTT, THOMES, & TALBOT, Publishers, Boston, Mass.

WATERS'

NEW SCALE PIANOS.

With Iron Frame, Overstrung Bass and Agraffe Bridge.

Melodeons and Cabinet Organs.

The best manufactured, warranted for 6 years.

Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs,—Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New 7-octave Pianos, $178 and upward. New Cabinet Organs, $46 and upward. Second-hand Pianos, $50 and upward. Monthly installments received. Warerooms, 481 Broadway, N. Y. Circulars sent by mail.

FOWLE'S PILE AND HUMOR CURE

The greatest and only medicine in the world that is Warranted a Perfect Cure for all kinds of PILES, Leprosy, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, Eczema, and all Diseases of the Skin and Blood. Internal and external use. Entirely vegetable. Sold by druggists. Travel all dealers to return money, and charge it back to me. No Pains for over 30 years. E. D. FOWLE, Chemist, Boston. Sold every where. Send for Circulars.

HOLIDAY JOURNAL FOR 1870.

Containing a Fairy Story for Christmas, Plays, Puzzles, and Wonders. 16 large pages, Illustrated. Sent FREE on receipt of 10 cents for postage.

ADAMS & CO., 39 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about the Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen sheet of Cards, Borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 53 Murray Street, New York.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machines. The best machine in the world. Stitch alike on both sides. Fully warranted for five years. Circular free. For further particulars, address

THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

WANTED—AGENTS—To sell the American Combination Pocket Knife. Price $2.5. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings per minute. Liberal Inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNIT-TING MACHINE CO., Bath, Maine, or 323 Broadway, N. Y.

$50,000 worth of Furniture Coverings, purchased at recent auctions, for sale at 50 cents on the dollar. Send stamp for circular.
G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
No. 667 Broadway, near Amity St.

$200 to $300 PER MONTH made by any man to sell the Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine. Address R. S. BRADFORD, Boston, Mass.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR

PRIEST and NUN.

Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 1305 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without drugs. Circulars free. Address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

GAME FOWLS.—Cooper's Work on Game Fowls, large octavo, new edition, revised. Every gentleman should have it. Sent by mail, prepaid, for $5. Address Dr. J. W. COOPER, West Chester, Pa.

A WATCH FREE—sixes gratis to every live man who A will act as agent in a new, light, honorable business paying $30 a day. No gift enterprise, no humbug, no money in advance. R. MONROE & CO., Bridgeport, Ct.

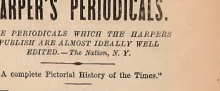
SALESMEN.—Wanted, a few reliable, energetic salesmen, to sell by sample standard goods. Address R. H. RICHARDS & CO.,
No. 1 Bank Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

$25 A DAY.—33 new articles for Agents. Samples free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."



HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and commentary upon the events of the times. It will treat of every topic, Political, Historical, Literary, and Scientific, which is of current interest. In November will be commenced the new novel by MAY AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers will be furnished with the numbers containing the commencement of the story to the close of 1870 for $4 00.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for 18c.—N. Y. Evening Post.

HARPER'S BAZAR is a Journal for the Home. It is especially devoted to all subjects pertaining to Domestic and Social Life. It furnishes its Lady Readers in Dress and Ornament; describes in-door and out-door Amusements; contains Stories, Essays, and Poems—every thing in brief, calculated to make an American Home attractive.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Number for November completes the Thirteenth Volume of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. While no change is contemplated in the general character of the Magazine, the Conductors will not fail to avail themselves of such judicious additions as may add to its general interest or permanent value. Special and increased attention will be given to the departments of Popular Science and Industrial Arts. Papers on these subjects will be specially invited. It is proposed that the various Editorial Departments shall give a complete resume of the events of the month, and comment upon topics relating to social life and manners. Steel Portraits will occasionally be presented. Each part of the Monthly Record will note all important political events. The Drawer will present the facetiæ and anecdotes of the time.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains fully as much matter per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in the English language. Thus the single space at the disposal of the Conductors will enable them to furnish fully of all that is interesting in the world.

The Publishers feel themselves warranted in asking and anticipating for the future a continuance of the favor which has been accorded to their enterprises in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS FOR HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either THE MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR, will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, unless yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes the number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

When WEEKLY or the WEEKLY and BAZAR are sent with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to receive it with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

Subscribers to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of the Publishers is preferable to Bills. Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be recovered without loss to the sender.

Back Numbers may be supplied at any time. In ordering the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

☞ New Subscribers to either of Harper's Periodicals can furnished from the present time to the close of 1870 for Four Dollars.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $105; Quarter Page, $55.—each insertion. Less than a square, $1 00 per line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 00 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars furnished free. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

$3000 A YEAR guaranteed to Agents. Address J. ADEARN, 9 F. O. Avenue, Baltimore, Md.

"WE FIGHTS MIT SIGEL."

A NEW DISCOVERY!!

PHALON'S

"VITALIA;"

OR,

Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaculent matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the directions being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!

AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,

CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,

517 Broadway, N. Y.

STEREOPTICONS

AND

MAGIC LANTERNS,

and over 5000 Views. Catalogues sent free.
W. MITCHELL M'ALLISTER,
728 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

THE SECRET OF BEAUTY lies in the use of HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM for the complexion. Roughness, Redness, Blotches, Sunburn, Freckles, and Tan disappear where it is applied, and a beautiful complexion of pure, satin-like texture is obtained. The prettiest features are made to glow with beautiful bloom and youthful beauty.

Remember, HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM is the thing that produces these effects, and any lady can secure it for 75 cents at any of our stores.

To preserve and dress the Hair use LYON'S KATHAIRON.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO,

FOR CLEANING AND POLISHING.

SAPOLIO will make Tins resemble Silver.
Use only SAPOLIO to clean White Paint.
From Marble SAPOLIO removes all Stains.
For polishing Knives SAPOLIO is unsurpassed.
For cleaning Brass Stair-Rods SAPOLIO has no equal.
If you would have clean windows, use SAPOLIO.
Sample cake sent by mail on receipt of Depot, 211 Washington St., New York.
Established 1509.

Particular attention is called to our SOAPS for family use.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the sleeping-room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. An open door or window without a failure proves that it is perfect, reliable, and satisfactory. Thousands who are using it testify to its merits, as will be seen by a pamphlet obtainable at the office. The public are cautioned against infringements, either in using or vending. The law will be applied to all such cases. E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N. Y.

Dr. JNO. V. BURTON'S

TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO in a strictly complied with. Operates upon and soothes the blood, invigorates the nervous, removes great nourishment to the system, and leaves the mouth in a healthy condition. Full directions for using. Will direct the heartiest food, makes sleep refreshing, and establishes robust health. Descriptive and abscess for sixteen cents. Price Fifty cents per box, post free. An interesting treatise on the injurious effects of tobacco, with Dr. BURTON'S testimonials, references, etc., 1000 pages. Secrets worth a fortune. Address

DR. J. V. BURTON, Jersey City, N. J.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Caution.—Beware of using imitations.

[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

ALL WANTING FARMS.—Good soil, mild climate, and healthy. 24 miles south of Philadelphia. Price $25 per Acre. The place is growing rapidly. Can treat over other place in the U. S. Thousands are settling. Address
CHARLES E. LANDIS, Vineland, New Jersey.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circular and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMPSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. NIXON, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BEATMAN & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; H. D. MUNSON, Zanesville, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; MRS. C. BUHR, Pittsburgh, Pa.; L. D. PETTIBONE, Scranton, Pa.; CLEVES & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. P. HAWKINS, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; J. H. HOUGHTALING, Dansville, N. Y.; H. S. MAGOUN, Rochester, N. Y.; H. UTLEY, Buffalo, N. Y.; REMINGTON & HOWE, Syracuse, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; COREY BROS., Providence, R. I.; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.; MATTHIAS GRAY, Sue Francisco, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C. W.; E. PETERS & BRO., St. John, N. B.

DR. CUFFORD'S COD LIVER DRAGEES

SENT POSTPAID ON RECEIPT OF PRICE.

SUGAR-COATED PILLS OF COD-LIVER EXTRACT.

CURES COUGHS, COLDS, CONSUMPTION, &c.

NOT OBJECTIONABLE TO the MOST DELICATE STOMACH.

PRICES.—Box of 40 Drages, equal to one and a half pints of oil, 75 cents; box of 120 Drages, $1 75; box of 240 Drages, $2 00.

Physicians having cases where cod-liver oil is indicated, will obtain better results by the use of the DRAGEES than with cod-liver oil.

For full particulars, containing medical societies' reports, physicians' certificates, &c., &c., send for pamphlet to WARD, SOUTHERLAND, & CO., Wholesale Agents, 139 William Street, New York.

HATTER, FURRIER,

and Importer of English Hats for Gentlemen's wear.

Ladies' Riding Hats, entirely New.

Ladies' Fine Furs in every variety.

DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
717 BROADWAY,
New York Hotel.

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES

AT

UNION ADAMS & CO.

For Ladies.

Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Merino Hosiery,
Kid and Castor Gloves.

For Misses.

Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Patent Union Dresses,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Cashmere Hosiery,
Roman and Fancy Sashes.

No. 637 Broadway.

UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER

THE ONLY WRINGER which has the PATENT STOP, to prevent the cogs from entirely separating.

"It really merits all the good that can be said of it."—Mood's Rural Ne-Yorker.

"The Universal 'the Best.'"—Amer. Agriculturist.

Sold by dealers generally. H. C. BROWNING, General Agent, 32 Cortlandt St., New York.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.

MANUFACTURERS OF

IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,

WITH

PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY, can not be Excelled.

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,

All goods bearing our trade-mark,

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"

ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED;

and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, CONN.
SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N. Y.

SMITH'S COUGH CAREMELS.

Excellent for the Throat & Lungs. Sold by all Druggists.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
46 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

Two Months

FREE! FREE!!

The Most Popular Juvenile Magazine in America.

THE

LITTLE CORPORAL.

Entirely Original and First class.

All new subscribers for THE LITTLE CORPORAL for the new year, whose names and money are sent in before the last of November, will receive the November and December Nos. of 1869 FREE!

THE LITTLE CORPORAL has a larger circulation than any other Juvenile Magazine in the world, and is better worth the price than any other magazine published.

Because of its immense circulation, we are enabled to furnish it at the low price of ONE DOLLAR A YEAR. Single number, 13 cents, or free to any one who will try to raise a club. Beautiful premiums for clubs.

Subscribe NOW. Back numbers can always be sent. Address

ALFRED L. SEWELL & CO., PUBLISHERS, CHICAGO, ILL.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $100 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.; BOSTON, MASS., OR ST. LOUIS, MO.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and reliable practical sewing machine now offered.

AGENTS WANTED.—AGENTS WANTED, $75 to $200 per month, male and female, to sell the celebrated and original Common Sense Family Sewing Machine, improved and perfected; it will hem, fell, stitch, tuck, bind, braid and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. For simplicity and durability, it has no rival. Do not buy from any parties selling machines under the same name or ours, unless having a Certificate of Agency signed by us, as they are worthless Cast-Iron Machines.

For Circulars and Terms, apply or address, C. DOWERS & CO., 420 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PATENTS

INVENTORS who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Twenty-three Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the World. Charges less than any other reliable agency.

A Pamphlet, containing full instructions to Inventors, is sent free. Address MUNN & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh importation by every steamer. Fine Snuff Boxes, Fancy Goods, Swiss Carved Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. ☞ J. P. FALLER & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N. Y.

CATALOGUES TEN CENTS EACH.
ASTHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

AGENTS WANTED for Willson's School and Family Charts.

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl Street, N. Y.

"OLD FOGGY" His head is a pencil. Use the Novelty Pencil-Holders, and avoid losing pencils.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 672.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE LINCOLN STATUE, PROSPECT PARK, BROOKLYN.

THE bronze statue of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, was unveiled October 21, and dedicated with imposing ceremonies. Prospect Park is one of the most beautiful in the world; and it has this advantage over Central Park, that it overlooks a large expanse of water. It is creditable to the patriotism of the citizens of Brooklyn that the first monument erected in their Park is one dedicated to the memory of the Saviour of his Country.

The statue is nine feet in height, and is mounted upon a massive pedestal of granite. Mr. LINCOLN is represented as pointing to the Constitution of the United States, which he holds in his left hand. His head is uncovered, and a cloak thrown back from the breast hangs gracefully over his shoulders. This statue is the result of dollar subscriptions; it was executed by the sculptor MR. H. K. BROWN.

A large number of citizens were present. Within the inclosure about the statue were officers of the army and navy, and just outside the Twenty-third regiment formed a glittering line along the slope. MR. A. A. LOW, the presiding officer, delivered a brief but eloquent address. Then the statue was unveiled. MR. J. P. WALLACH, in behalf of the War Fund Committee, formally presented the statue to the Park Commissioners. MR. J. S. T. STRAHAN replied in behalf of the Commissioners. He said that three sites had been chosen for statues, and that he trusted the two yet unoccupied would be filled by statues of WASHINGTON and JACKSON. The oration of the day—an eloquent and impressive one—was delivered by Rev. DR. STORRS, of Brooklyn. Letters were read from President GRANT and Governor HOFFMAN.

THE SECRET OF THE AURORA.

MEN of science have long felt that a strange secret lay hidden in the brilliant folds of the aurora. The magic arch, with its pointed streamers, shifting silently but swiftly across the heavens, pulsating mysteriously as though illuminated by the fitfully changing glow of some concealed furnace, and rendered surpassingly beautiful by the brilliancy of its colors, had always had strange charms for men of thoughtful mind. And gradually a series of laborious researches had revealed the laws which associate this beautiful apparition with disturbances affecting the economy of our whole earth, and not indirectly connected with the habitudes of the solar system itself. But recently a discovery has been made which is even more remarkable than any which had before rewarded the labors of physicists—a discovery at once instructive and perplexing, revealing a bond of union between the aurora and a phenomenon hitherto thought to be quite different in character, but leaving us still to learn what the exact nature of that bond of union may be.

THE LINCOLN MONUMENT IN PROSPECT PARK, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.—(SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.)

We had occasion recently to point out that a sudden disturbance in the sun, in 1859, had been presently followed by intense magnetic action, the whole electric system of the earth quivering, so to speak, under the influence of the solar forces educed by the disturbance. And we mentioned that among the signs of this magnetic action brilliant displays of the auroral streamers had been witnessed in both hemispheres on the night following the solar disturbance. This circumstance touches us the true character of the aurora as strikingly as any which astronomers and physicists had patiently been gathering together during the past half century. We learn at once that a relation subsists between the aurora, terrestrial magnetism, and the central luminary of our scheme.

And even if we were to pause here, we should have learned enough to indicate the significance and importance of the aurora. Our earth, we may be sure, is not the only recipient of that mystic influence which rouses into activity the phenomena we term magnetic. Over the whole realm which it rules the central orb sends forth the strange electric impulses. When our skies are illuminated by the magic streamers, we may be sure that those of Venus and of Mars, of Jupiter and of Saturn, nay, even the skies of those unseen orbs which travel far out in space beyond the paths of Uranus and Neptune, are lit up with auroral displays. When once it has been shown that we owe our auroras to solar action, we recognize the cosmical character of the display, and that, in a sense, the terrestrial magnetism on which it depends is a bond of affinity between our earth and its sister orbs.

But while we were thus taught the true significance of the aurora, we were left in doubt as to the way in which the solar action aroused the electric luminosity in the upper regions of our air. We could not even tell at what elevation the light was suspended above our earth. The most eminent physicists differed in their views as to the possibility of learning when the magic streamers really wave when we see them most distinctly. While ARAGO had held that to attempt to measure the height of the aurora was as futile as to attempt to measure the height of a rainbow, Sir John Herschel considered that precisely the same laws of measurement might be applied to the aurora as to any object raised high above the earth.

One point, however, was well determined. The auroral lights are undoubtedly to be ascribed to electric action taking place at a very considerable height, where the air is very rare indeed. It became, therefore, a question whether any thing could be learned by analyzing the auroral light as to the condition of that particular part of our atmosphere in which the electric action takes place.

Spectroscopic analysis, that strange and powerful mode of research which has revealed so many unlooked-for facts, was accordingly applied to the light of a brilliant aurora. The result was rather surprising. Instead of a rainbow-colored stream of light, such as would have appeared if the aurora were due to the existence of particles excited to luminosity by electric action, a single line of colored light appeared. This indicated that the light is due to the incandescence of some gas through which the electric discharges in upper air take place.

But this was not the circumstance which attracted surprise. Rather, this was to have been looked for. It was the position of the line which astonished our physicists. If the gas had been one which chemists are acquainted with, the bright line would have occupied the position proper to that gas, and would at once have indicated its nature. But there is no known element whose spectrum has a bright line where this one appeared. The observation has been repeated over and over again, by Angstrom, by Otto Struve, and recently by Mr. Flammer, always with the same result—we can not tell what the substance may be to whose incandescence or luminosity the aurora owes its brilliancy.

But a most remarkable discovery has been effected. Angström has found that the mysterious line of the auroral spectrum exists in the spectrum of another object which had been thought to be wholly different in character. Ever since its discovery by Cassini, the zodiacal light has been an object of interest to astronomers. Gradually a theory had been formed respecting it, which had been sanctioned by the authority of such men as Humboldt and Sir John Herschel. It was held that this appearance is due to the mical bodies revolving around the sun within the orbit of our earth.

This theory had never been tested by spectroscopic analysis. Indeed, the zodiacal light shines so faintly that it was hardly hoped that its spectrum could be rendered visible. But if we can see in the spectrum of the aurora! In other words, the light of the zodiacal gleam and that of the auroral streamers are due to the same sort of electric discharge taking place in the same medium.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1869.

☞ In November will be commenced "MAN AND WIFE," a new Serial Story, splendidly Illustrated, by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone"). New Subscribers will be supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement of the Story to the end of 1870 for $4 00.

AFTER THE AUTUMN ELECTIONS.

NOW that the New York election is over, there is a singular calm in the political world. In the last week of the canvass there was very little excitement in the State; and it was remarkable, as Mr. GREELEY observed in one of his speeches, that, while the chief Republican orators confined themselves to a fair discussion of the great principles upon which the party is planted, the Democratic speakers were evidently at a loss to know how to urge their claim to public confidence.

Indeed, it was a ludicrous situation for them. They wanted to denounce corruption, and the gentlemen chosen for the work were the masters of the Tammany Ring, assisted by Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It was an edifying spectacle, that of the Mayor, the District Attorney, and the Corporation Attorney launching invectives against extravagance and demanding purity in politics. Or it was necessary to expand the claim to confidence upon the character of the candidates; and thereupon the supporters of Judge MCCUNN and of Mr. WILLIAM M. TWEED denounced that there were some Republican candidates whose reputation was clouded. Indeed the World, which could not conscientiously laud the Republican journals but spring for not protesting against the appointment of General SICKLES by the President, was curiously silent about those whom it had previously characterized by name as corruptionists of the Ring and authors of shameless and cunning frauds. Thus nothing might be wanting to complete the comedy of the Democratic canvass, Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, the gentleman who formerly wept that he was not able to send rifles to Mr. ROBERT TOOMBS, to be used against the Yankees, arrived from Europe just in time to weep afresh over the melancholy fact that the President's brother-in-law was implicated in the late gold scandal.

The effort to make any single State issue prominent failed. It was strenuously declared that the Republican ticket was framed to suit both the friends and the foes of lager beer. But, as a fact, the ticket exactly represented the position of the party upon the subject. The party does not make it an issue. It embraces prohibitionists like Mr. GREELEY and non-prohibitionists like General SIGEL; and both classes agree, with the vast majority of men, that it is not a subject to be dealt with by the party. So, also, Mr. GREELEY is in favor of selling the canals as the wise policy for the State, and an attempt was made to excite hostility to him upon this ground, as if the Comptroller could dispose of the canals at his pleasure. There was, however, really very little spirit in the canvass, as the registration showed; nor is there likely to be any great political interest or excitement until the meeting of Congress and the first message of President GRANT.

There will be certain topics of especial importance for his consideration in that paper. Of these the Cuban question and the Alabama question are perhaps the chief. The formal work of reconstruction will have been substantially closed. The general financial policy will be expounded by the Secretary of the Treasury. But we shall have some foreshadowing of the probable course of the Government toward Cuba; and such is the quiet good sense of the Administration that it will probably not commit itself, except, when circumstances or "accomplished facts" authorize the recognition of belligerency or independence, they will be recognized, and not before. Such a firm is the confidence of the party and the country in the sagacity and probity of the Administration, that Congress is not very likely to interfere with its policy. If General BANKS, during his European vacation, has carefully informed himself of the situation at home, or returns in time to resume his seat, he will probably, conscious that the public sentiment of the country, wishing well to any people honestly fighting for independence, does not demand that the United States take an active part in the Cuban revolution. As for the English question, it is most probable that the tone of the President's message will imply that the little Alabama claim is to be settled.

Of course it was during these first few months of the new Administration, under the pressure of the great reaction which naturally followed the great triumph of last year, that the Democratic party hoped to prove at the autumn polls that the country was utterly discontented with the President and his general policy. This expectation has been wholly baffled. The Republican line is unbroken. The elections have shown that the people, who last overcame by their faith in General GRANT and the principles he represents, trust him with undiminished confidence. The Democracy have lost the battle which is often apt to seal the fate of the day. They must reflect in time, that, if they hope to persuade the people of this country to give them power again, they must not attempt to do it by the Tammany Ring and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD to denounce corruption, nor by electing Judge MCCUNN to the judicial bench. They were beaten in 1868 because they came back in the same old party, with the same old spirit and the same old leaders. As long as this is evident they will continue to be beaten.

THE FENIAN AMNESTY.

As we write, Mr. GLADSTONE's letter to the Town Council of Dublin has not reached us; and we must, therefore, confine ourselves to a few reasons for refusing the Fenian amnesty. At this distance, and with our information, it would seem that the Government of Great Britain has very unwisely; and Mr. GLAY's assertion, that Mr. GLADSTONE's personal wish was for an amnesty, will be readily believed. The London Times is defending the Government, says that rebellion was formerly regarded in England as a transcendent crime, and that it is now considered more frequent with ruinous consequences to the country than ordinary crimes. Might it not fairly be asked, then, whether a Government, so particularly sensitive to the public welfare, ought not to be a little less hasty in the recognition of the belligerent rights of rebellion against a friendly nation, and rebellion for the worst of purposes?

It is not, however, surprising that, remembering 1715 and '45, and the endless Irish insurrection, the British tradition should be a horror of rebellion, and unreasonably deals with facts and principles; and is it not very doubtful whether the rigors that have always followed the suppression of risings by England either did or could tend to prevent them so surely as a more merciful policy? People in England may, as the Times says, choose to consider rebellion the greatest crime. But crime in the moral sense it will never be felt to be, unless its ends are base or its means intentionally cruel. The Irish people, as Punch justly says, is not a mere Sir Roger de Coverley or Squire Western, and who is familiar with the long tragedy of Ireland, will ever regard the rising of any part of the people as criminal in the same sense as the PANTIN murder. Hopeless and stupid and fatal it may be, but not wicked and dastardly.

In dealing with ignorant or deluded fanatics, if the English choose to take that view, who venture their lives in hope of an Irish republic, what should the Government do? If aggravated, individual, and premeditated cruelty in any case is proved, the laws would probably naturally be left to deal with such a case as assassination. But if there be a general spirit of disaffection in Ireland—not ill-founded, as every Englishman knows—and if the country is guilty or wrongly, as we consider England its bitter enemy, when a ministry is raised to power upon the cry of justice to Ireland, and begins by an act of justice which every Irishman can appreciate—if that act were immediately followed by one of mercy, would it not be truly said in Ireland that at last there was a Government which Ireland ought to trust; and, vast as Irish ignorance and hate of England are, would not the wiser and better Irishmen be strengthened by such a course as nothing else could strengthen them?

Certainly we, who have subdued a more appalling rebellion than England ever encountered, yet who have not executed nor imprisoned a rebel, have the right to wonder whether England does not feel strong enough to be magnanimous, or is not sagacious enough to know the policy of clemency.

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.

THE late meeting of the American Social Science Association in the city of New York was very significant as well as interesting. The audiences, indeed, were not very large, but the reports of the proceedings in the newspapers were ample and accurate; and the essays were by gentlemen most of whom were especially competent to treat the topics selected, and treated them with a care and ability which made the papers of permanent value. There is a great deal of special study and research upon subjects embraced by the plan of the Association for which there is no method of expression so admirable as that furnished by these meetings. The papers are then published in pamphlets, magazines, or volumes, would be very likely to be neglected. They are generally too great and compact, and sometimes too scientific, to be accessible to the general lecturer; and the invaluable result of investigation in the most important directions might long appeal in vain for public attention, if it were not for the plan and form of the Social Science Association. It invites special students to prepare carefully the substance of their research and thought, and offers them an audience which any man might be proud to address, and a full report under circumstances sure to arrest public attention and affect public opinion.

The President of the Association, Mr. SAMUEL ELIOT, of Boston, in his most admirable opening address, described the simple structure of Social Science. It is not social science, because it devotes itself to promoting the well-being of society by a careful study of facts and intelligent application of principles. It is not political science, or public action, founded not in emotion only but in knowledge, and would as carefully consider the means as the end. Indeed, the Association was drawn to a focus for the common benefit those scattered rays of light and heat which, concentrated, become the greatest force of civilization.

The organization of the Association is very simple. There are a President, Secretary, and Treasurer, and four Department Committees of Education, Finance, Health, and Jurisprudence. The chairmen of these committees and the officers first-named compose the Executive Committee, which has charge of the general or financial management, the places and details of meetings, publications, etc. But the Department Committees are the important elements of the organization. They consist mainly of experts—gentlemen who have devoted themselves to the special study of subjects embraced in the department, and every question proposed to the Association is referred to a proper committee to decide if it be a subject for the Association usefully to enter upon. There are also two local committees, one in New York, and one in Albany; and there will soon be one in Philadelphia, and another in New Haven. These serve as centres of action. The expenses of the Association are limited to the fees for but one salaried officer. Besides public meetings for the purpose of hearing carefully prepared papers, the Association has a room in which are constantly kept open at the Albany meeting last winter, and it proposes to publish certain manuals of an immediate practical value, such as a resumé of the laws relating to public health at the University of Berlin, to help students in this country, and again a manual for immigrants, full of the information they most desire to have before they leave their leaving Europe. In a word, the Association is an organization to utilize, for the common good, private and individual thought and experience.

Its work is well begun. The character of the persons interested, and of the proceedings thus far, promises an influence as profound as the scope of the plan is wide and wise. The Association blows no trumpets and grinds no axes. It moves modestly and noiselessly; and it appeals to the common sense and the common heart for support of all who believe that human progress, if inspired by faith in God and love to man, is to be secured by a careful investigation of all moral and material laws.

THE MISSISSIPPI TRAGEDY.

THE recent steamboat disaster upon the Mississippi was so appalling that there seems nothing to be said. The pitiful story is read with horror, there is a vague exclamation of helpless indignation, a feeling that there is nothing to be done, and a hope in the reader's mind that he may not be the victim of the next tragedy, and this is the end of it. Of course there is a stern demand for investigation, and possibly a jury denounces culpable carelessness and holds somebody responsible. But in a country where culpable carelessness murders scores of victims every year we have yet to hear of any punishment whatever. If a railroad train is thrown from a precipice, and suspicion points to the negligence or ignorance of the engineer or of any other responsible officer of the train, he may quietly withdraw from the country until the excitement subsides; but whoever heard of an adequate penalty inflicted?

It is not possible to avoid all accidents, but it is possible to do something to prevent them. The want of more stringent laws in regard to responsibility and care upon the part of steamboat and railroad companies is a woeful instance of the good-natured indifference or reluctance of the American to insist upon his individual rights, and a feeling that the disregard of safety is justified by the supposed political economy. Regard for his individual rights of a certain kind, indeed, the American does not lack; but he certainly asserts his public rights of personal safety and convenience much less strenuously than those who have not his political liberty. The first thing that he may justly demand of every company that undertakes to transport him is proper provision for care of life and limb. But upon how many steamers, large and small, by what rivers and lakes, is such provision made? Where is the hose, the supply of water-filled buckets, the life preservers, in case of extremity? He is not to be expected to look and find that they are wanting, for to be serviceable they must be in full sight. When the alarm of fire is given, for instance, half of the panic would be avoided if the sight of the means of escape and safety. But how many passengers who do not see the conveniences which may at any moment be needed ever complain of the want of them? In a manner they condone in advance the negligence which may cost them their lives. It is not agreeable, indeed, and it is disagreeable to take the trouble to make complaints. Moreover, a man is sure to be derided as an old Betty who does it. Very well. We want all elect. If it is worse to be called an old Betty than to risk the burning or drowning of his children, a man will probably save himself from that dreadful imputation by saying and doing nothing.

As for the laws regulating the transportation of passengers, they belong to the public order, and, like all laws, are to be enforced by experience. What, for instance, it is a public conviction that the managers of railways and steamboats are so anxious to make money that they will not be admonished of the solution between safety and profit, it is time for the public to act. There is no reason why the public should consent to be burned or drowned, in order that, at some time stupid people will learn or heartless people wince. Let the law do what it can to secure what private interest and duty will not secure. But it protects the citizen against the thief who willfully steals, let it also guard him from the manager who carelessly kills.

But there is still more radical remedy—that upon which all hope of particular improvement and of wise laws ultimately rests, and that is a more thorough sense of mortality. While success is popularly accepted as the only criterion of conduct, and even of character, we merely teach those to whom we look for our lives to take care of our dividends. A railroad company can afford to use poor rails, for instance, and cheap material of every kind, and to economize in proper care, if it has to pay only a certain amount of damages yearly for slaughtering and maiming passengers. If we insist upon bringing every thing to that issue, people will learn to better our institutions. Here was a steamer upon the Mississippi piled with hay, and the passengers smoking and playing cards around it. A spark, a dropped cigar, a candle tipped over, and the boat is presently in flames. There was time to throw canvas or tarpaulin over the fire, to wet down the hay, to run the boat to the shore, a hundred yards off, with boats or life-preservers, had there been these conveniences, and an organized crew duly managed. But, upon the whole, it is doubtful if the company loses enough to produce the slightest change in the method of management. The responsibility of the steamboat interest is in our own hands. It is the public, not the companies, that are really responsible.

THE WOMAN'S PARLIAMENT.

THE "Woman Question" continues to present itself in many different aspects. Thus within the last month, there has been a Massachusetts Working Women's Convention in Boston; a Woman's Parliament in New York; a call for a convention to found a National Woman's Suffrage Association, and a Convention in Hartford of what is popularly called the Women's Rights party. At the latter, which was very fully attended, the usual argument for the enfranchisement of women was powerfully presented by Mr. BEECHER. The Woman's Parliament which met in New York was, however, very anxious not to be confounded with the party which Mr. BEECHER represents. The organizing Committee of it published a statement of their purposes. "The proposed object of this organization," they say, "is the association of women among themselves for the development of their own economical, educational, and moral interests, and by this means to accomplish woman's work in woman's way. It disclaims all connection with the Woman's Rights party. We have a sincere respect for the ladies who are engaged in this movement, and a sincere sympathy with their hopes and aims; but we must say that they seem to misunderstand their own position, when they disclaim all connection with the Woman's Rights party, but they propose to do woman's work in woman's way. Now this is exactly what the Woman's Rights party propose to do. They insist, and most justly, that as man's way is every honorable way for which nature has given him intelligence and desire, so woman's way is precisely the same. They declare—and we do not believe that the most resolute member of the Woman's Parliament would care to dispute it—that as man's way could not possibly be known if women alone should be allowed to define it, but can be ascertained only by perfect freedom of choice, so woman's way can not be known but from the interpretation of men only, but only by the same liberty of choice. If, indeed, the ladies of the Executive Committee assert that they can serve men, and that they know what is woman's way, we certainly shall not contradict them; but merely remind them that whatever our individual opinions may be, they are not final in political laws; and that it is an immutable law that the proper sphere of human activity is determined only by free choice.

The Council resolves that the Parliament proposes to make a profound study of the evils of society, with the view of curing or ameliorating them; and then it lacks no means of calling society to act, it will appeal to the governing power already in existence. This is always the privilege of a disfranchised class. The peasants in France, with the ballot, might do the work existing governing power to relieve them. But the question for a Parliament of American Women to answer is, Why, being members of the political society, with no less vital interest in its welfare than men, with an equal intelligence and capacity with men, and with the knowledge that no actual governing power is ever fully just to those who have no share of its authority—why, under such circumstances, they propose to acquiesce in a usurpation of the governing power which they are not found in?

If they really wish to affect the evils of society in which their own sex so deeply shares, why not insist upon their equal voice in the regulation of society? Why should any citizen of this country be content to be the political equivalent instead of the political equal of another?

English statesmen declare it "the good judgment and kind feeling" of the existing governing class to regulate that most vital subject to women—the franchise. But does the Executive Committee of the Woman's Parliament doubt that if the English laws regulating marriage had been made by both parties to marriage, they would have been wiser and more humane than they were and are? Lord BROUGHAM denounced them as a shame to civilization; and it seems hard to remain a happy body of intelligent American women that the legislation of a class is always partial and selfish. The purposes of the Woman's Parliament are unquestionably excellent. But a more excellent purpose is the equal liberty of every member of society. With that gained all other reforms are made easier. When, therefore, the Parliament takes pains to separate itself from that movement, it labors to alienate the sympathy of those who would naturally be its best friends. It hopes to escape the odium of the "Woman's Rights party," but it can not do it. Those who condemn that party will condemn this in a less degree. In the eyes of such critics the offense lies in a woman's not confining herself to the "domestic sphere;" and the presiding officer of an executive committee of a Woman's Parliament is only less obnoxious to the sentiment which this committee would propitiate than the President of a "Woman's Rights" Convention.

A GLANCE AT THE FINANCES.

SOME of the features of our financial condition just now are worthy of particular attention. Although our imports continue to exceed our exports, gold, the medium to pay the balance against us, has steadily fallen. On the 1st of November it was quoted at 128, which is the lowest quotation since the spring of 1866, when it fell to 126. The present fall in price is supposed by some to indicate a return toward specie payments. Is this idea correct?

While we write the Treasury Department is engaged in paying off the November interest, amounting to about twenty-five and a half millions in gold, on a portion of the Five-Twenty bonds; but although the coupons, to a large extent, are held here on foreign account, instructions were given in many cases to reinvest the proceeds in the same class of securities. If the interest paid to foreign agents had gone abroad, gold would have increased in firmness; but as the reinvestment called for more bonds it gave some firmness to them. The London and New York markets, influenced by telegraphic announcements, instantaneously sympathized with each other.

Mr. BOUTWELL's management in purchasing over sixty millions of the public debt mainly to go into the Sinking Fund, and in anticipating the November interest, has improved the credit of the Government in foreign countries, and no doubt induced those reinvestments, which are favored not only by the languid condition of trade in England and on the Continent—whereby capital is liberated—but also to some extent by political uneasiness in England and France, and by the constant stream of valuable immigration to this country. The feature is noticed by capitalists abroad with increasing interest.

It is undoubtedly desirable that our credit—as we have in view a four or four and a half per cent. investment in lieu of our bonds at five and six per cent.—shall continue in Europe; although it will not be possible to make such a change until our present securities advance to a considerable premium in gold; but the question ought to be maturely considered whether the transfer of our bonds from American to European capitalists, to be held abroad as a permanent debt, is done with advantage to this country.

The amount of our public debt now held in Europe is variously estimated at from seven hundred to one thousand millions of dollars, and the floating debt represented in what are called "options" in Wall Street, and in other forms of indebtedness, is supposed to be nearly a hundred millions. Bonds and stock of corporations and others are also held extensively in Europe; and it is thought that our annual interest in gold must annually be paid by us—over and above what is brought in by immigrants—to meet interest, dividends, and balances due abroad.

The major part of this foreign indebtedness has arisen since the creation of our public debt; and, although it is common to say that we have received little or no gold, it must be admitted that a very large portion of it has arisen from the extravagance of portions of the United States.

The manufacturing industry of Europe, since the explosion in England in 1866, has been largely in excess of the demands of trade, and much of the surplus of cotton, woolen, and manufactures has been sent to us. Part of it has been consigned to commission-houses for sale in our markets, and in the returns for these consignments have probably exceeded the profits, to this extent the foreigner is the loser.

Our importations for the year ending June 30, 1869, were $435,958,055, and we gained in gold, which stood at an average premium of, say, 35. In this import there was $19,654,776 gold. Our exports for the year were the amount of $413,869,182, which included $42,915,966 in gold. The balance is in currency. But $300,561,284 of our imports and $276,975,659 of our exports were brought in and sent to foreign bottoms. A charge of from twenty to thirty millions of dollars for freight on imports arises from this source. Our exports were valued at $25,130,167 in gold. By adding the premium of 35 per cent. to the imports, and making allowance for the fact that a portion of our exports and all of our imports are in gold, it will be seen that a heavy balance against us arises upon the trade for the year ending June 30, 1869. The improved credit of the United States in Europe unquestionably enables us to go on in this dangerous policy, by which they become holders of a permanent debt upon this country, and we hold only a portion of the surplus of goods. The more we improve our credit abroad the larger are our imports. The fall in gold has taken place notwithstanding that our premium revolution remains undiminished, and that we continue to be imprudent in our purchases from foreign countries.

It will be borne in mind that Congress repealed the act which authorized contraction of the currency in a way to indicate very decisive objections to that policy. Secretary BOUTWELL has, however, purchased a small amount of the three per cent. certificates, it is probable that this was done for the convenience of some bank that was in the temporary receipt of them, and that he meditates no transactions looking to contraction as long as the tone of Congress on that head remains unchanged. The fact that the Secretary intends to remove to over thirty millions of dollars, and the balance in his hands is being diminished, it is scarcely to be supposed will make any change in the course of trade, based upon financial affairs between this and the opening of the next session. But although we have just commenced to send forward our splendid crop of cotton, and although the demand for breadstuffs will be large, it will appear, from the statement of what we have annually to pay for interest, dividends, and balances due abroad, that our large purchases in Europe, due to the improved credit of our bonds, remove us further and further from specie payments.

In parts of Lancashire a further reduction of five per cent. on the wages of cotton operatives has been ordered. There is a considerable impression that the balances on English account invested in Wall Street for the moment in "options" will be collected, or that bonds will be sent back from England, inasmuch as trade in England and on the Continent is not sufficiently active to induce a recall of surplus capital. These circumstances favor still larger imports, and it may be additional investments in our bonds, although the rates of interest in Germany and Holland have improved. The fall in gold has also been encouraged by the considerable demand in the market for currency to go to the West, and particularly to the South. But as our large shipments, which for the year ending June 30, 1869, amounted in cotton to the value of $185,693,093, and in breadstuffs and provisions to the value of about $85,000,000, were, with our other exports, overbalanced by our extraordinary imports, we should seem to be good reason for the apprehension that our folly this year will not be less conspicuous than it was then. To all we commend strict economy as the only safeguard to meet the contingency, which may come suddenly, when the foreigner will ask us to settle.

NOTES.

MR. EHNINGER, whose admirable large photographs of "Sheridan's Ride" and "The Defence Memorial" are to be seen at Mobile Bay are warmly praised a few months since, has now reproduced them, at 58 East Eighteenth Street, in a cheap and handy form, with the latter work—"Taking the Reins," a drawing of General GRANT seated with MR. ROBERT BONNER in the wagon and driving "Dexter." MR. BONNER testifies that it is the most natural representation of a horse in action that he has ever seen, and its fidelity, spirit, and interest of all these works, and their cheapness, should make them prominent among the desirable holiday gifts.

A STORY is echoing through the press, which is said to have been told by a lady to MR. VERPLANCK at Albany, who stated that DR. LIEBER had told him that he happened to go into some German theatre in the city of New York where the audience is exclusively spoken, and found that he could not make himself understood in pure High-German by those present who used to the corrupt lingo of the quarter. The story has occasioned some severe criticism of the Doctor, who, however, it appears, is guiltless of any such remark, which probably MR. VERPLANCK has merely attributed to the wrong person. Yet, undoubtedly, DR. LIEBER would be willing to be held as authority for the general remark that both in Germany as well as in this country a man, knowing High-German only, would be totally unintelligible to Germans who speak one of the strongest dialects; but the latter, without exception, understand the former.

Almost all the books that the people in Germany read—as the reading, the sermons and the lectures in High-German. There are many familiar incidents of this ignorance of the patois; such as that of a high officer in a charitable society who was unable upon important subjects to understand certain Alsatian widows who had been upon the street. DR. LIEBER himself undoubtless found that when he was a student making pedestrian journeys in Germany he was always understood by those whom he frequented, could not understand when they were talking among themselves, especially in Mecklenburg, Pomerania, and Bohemia. Every German is familiar with such facts.

VICTOR M. RICE, who died recently after a short illness, was for some years Superintendent of Public Instruction in this State. His interest in the common schools was most sincere, and his efforts were constant to elevate it. He had certain reforms at heart, some of which he effected, and for his knowledge on the general subject was very large. His last report upon library police two years ago was a survey of the present condition of the best libraries in Europe, and is a valuable document full of information not readily accessible elsewhere. MR. RICE was also a highly accomplished scholar; but his office demanded an organizing and administrative faculty, rather than scholarship, which he possessed instead in the general subject, and these he had. His faith in common school education as the bulwark of popular rights was unquestionable. The active and freedom of all the public schools of the State is very greatly due to his exertions, and no man deserves more credit than he for the article of the Constitution which guarantees that freedom. MR. RICE was a natural politician—a man of ready conversation, of ardent social manners, and will be kindly remembered by those who knew him.

FRANCE is evidently uneasy. LOUIS NAPOLEON seems unwilling to prove beyond doubt his own fidelity to the new system that he has proposed, or is it impossible for the author of the coup d'état to escape suspicion in the public mind? The splendid crop of cotton, and although the demand for breadstuffs will be large, it will appear, from the statement of what we have annually to pay for interest, dividends, and balances due abroad, that our large purchases in Europe, due to the improved credit of our bonds, remove us further and further from specie payments.

In parts of Lancashire a further reduction of five per cent. on the wages of cotton operatives has been ordered. There is a considerable impression that the balances on English account invested in Wall Street for the moment in "options" will be collected, or that bonds will be sent back from England, inasmuch as trade in England and on the Continent is not sufficiently active to induce a recall of surplus capital. These circumstances favor still larger imports, and it may be additional investments in our bonds, although the rates of interest in Germany and Holland have improved. The fall in gold has also been encouraged by the considerable demand in the market for currency to go to the West, and particularly to the South. But as our large shipments, which for the year ending June 30, 1869, amounted in cotton to the value of $185,693,093, and in breadstuffs and provisions to the value of about $85,000,000, were, with our other exports, overbalanced by our extraordinary imports, we should seem to be good reason for the apprehension that our folly this year will not be less conspicuous than it was then. To all we commend strict economy as the only safeguard to meet the contingency, which may come suddenly, when the foreigner will ask us to settle.

NOTES.

MR. EHNINGER, whose admirable large photographs of "Sheridan's Ride" and "The Defence Memorial" are to be seen at Mobile Bay are warmly praised a few months since, has now reproduced them, at 58 East Eighteenth Street, in a cheap and handy form, with the latter work—"Taking the Reins," a drawing of General GRANT seated with MR. ROBERT BONNER in the wagon and driving "Dexter." MR. BONNER testifies that it is the most natural representation of a horse in action that he has ever seen, and its fidelity, spirit, and interest of all these works, and their cheapness, should make them prominent among the desirable holiday gifts.

A STORY is echoing through the press, which is said to have been told by a lady to MR. VERPLANCK at Albany, who stated that DR. LIEBER had told him that he happened to go into some German theatre in the city of New York where the audience is exclusively spoken, and found that he could not make himself understood in pure High-German by those present who used to the corrupt lingo of the quarter. The story has occasioned some severe criticism of the Doctor, who, however, it appears, is guiltless of any such remark, which probably MR. VERPLANCK has merely attributed to the wrong person. Yet, undoubtedly, DR. LIEBER would be willing to be held as authority for the general remark that both in Germany as well as in this country a man, knowing High-German only, would be totally unintelligible to Germans who speak one of the strongest dialects; but the latter, without exception, understand the former.

Almost all the books that the people in Germany read—as the reading, the sermons and the lectures in High-German. There are many familiar incidents of this ignorance of the patois; such as that of a high officer in a charitable society who was unable upon important subjects to understand certain Alsatian widows who had been upon the street. DR. LIEBER himself undoubtless found that when he was a student making pedestrian journeys in Germany he was always understood by those whom he frequented, could not understand when they were talking among themselves, especially in Mecklenburg, Pomerania, and Bohemia. Every German is familiar with such facts.

VICTOR M. RICE, who died recently after a short illness, was for some years Superintendent of Public Instruction in this State. His interest in the common schools was most sincere, and his efforts were constant to elevate it. He had certain reforms at heart, some of which he effected, and for his knowledge on the general subject was very large. His last report upon library police two years ago was a survey of the present condition of the best libraries in Europe, and is a valuable document full of information not readily accessible elsewhere. MR. RICE was also a highly accomplished scholar; but his office demanded an organizing and administrative faculty, rather than scholarship, which he possessed instead in the general subject, and these he had. His faith in common school education as the bulwark of popular rights was unquestionable. The active and freedom of all the public schools of the State is very greatly due to his exertions, and no man deserves more credit than he for the article of the Constitution which guarantees that freedom. MR. RICE was a natural politician—a man of ready conversation, of ardent social manners, and will be kindly remembered by those who knew him.

FRANCE is evidently uneasy. LOUIS NAPOLEON seems unwilling to prove beyond doubt his own fidelity to the new system that he has proposed, or is it impossible for the author of the coup d'état to escape suspicion in the public mind? The splendid career of the great sagacity to LOUIS NAPOLEON is constantly aroused by his propositions, and is surely chilled by his performances, and the surprise was substantially constitutional government; at least, if it were not that it was nothing. For we are to understand, the last the beginning he hesitates. It was said of the famous President of one of our colleges that he insisted it should cease to be a mere school: he was tired of being a pedagogue. So the whole system was changed; but the good Doctor forgot to change himself, and remained a schoolmaster. LOUIS NAPOLEON changes many things —but he does not change himself, and that makes all the other changes doubtful. He must be master of movements. One of his journeys was gested, probably by "inspiration," that the country should be called to vote upon the succession of the Prince Imperial. It would be an extraordinary step, and of course illogical. But his own position being illogical, the Emperor might prolong his empire for many years by such a measure. It undoubtedly he has not the sagacity, nor the nerve, to adopt it. If he should take to-morrow disorder would be almost sure to follow.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

DURING the first six months of President GRANT'S administration he receipts from customs duties were $56,000,000 more than those for the corresponding portion of the last year.

The President has appointed George H. Butler, of New York, postmaster at New Orleans, and Edward M. Gaffney, to be Consul-General for British North America, to reside at Quebec.

The Boston Post estimates that the Labor Reform party will poll 100,000 votes in Massachusetts.

A terrible accident occurred on the Mississippi River above Alton, on the night of October 26. The steamer Stonewall, on its way down the river from St. Louis, took on at a wooding-place within a few hundred yards of the shore, where she was grounded on a sand-bar and burnt to the water's edge. Out of from 250 to 300 persons on board nearly 200 were either burned to death or drowned. There were only one boat, and that was unprovided with oars. A proper quantity of life-preservers would have prevented the enormous loss of life. The fire originated from the engine-room, and was quite by accident.

Papers were read before the Social Science Association of New York, on the afternoon and evening of October 27, by Frederick Kapp, on Immigration; by Professor FRANCIS LIEBER, of Columbia College, on Vaccination; by Charles P. Adams, Jun., on Presidential Elections; by Andrew W. Curtis, on the Duties of the Civil Service; and by James A. Garfield, on the Currency and Gold.

The Message of Governor Campbell to the first legislative assembly of Wyoming contains some interesting facts about this new Territory. The act creating the Territorial government was passed July 25, 1868. The election for the First Assembly and a delegate to Congress was held on the 1st of September last. There have been three raids by the Sioux Indians within the Territory during the present year, in which forty-five white men have been killed. Wyoming Territory contains 92,000 square miles. Little is known of its mineral advantages, and a lack of rain and of trees is complained of. Coal is very plentiful, and the mining resources are inculcable. Coal takes the place of wood as fuel. The Union Pacific Road have been very encouraging thus far. Curiously enough, all settlers are from the Eastern States, principally Detroit, Michigan, for improvement under contract, and a settler must have lived in the State for six assembly.

The National Intelligencer and Express, of Washington, has become the property of Senator Sprague, of Rhode Island.

Miss IDA LEWIS, the Newport heroine, is said to be engaged to marry a young school boy.

On October 26 there was a grand steeple-chase at Jerome Park. The race was won by X. Beckwith's bay horse "Gunsmoke, Jun."

Mr. ROBERT BONNER is the large purse at the Rensselaer Park Meeting at Troy, October 29, beating Mr. HENRY WILKES'S "Lantern" in three heats. Troy Times, 8:32, 2:35, 2:36.

It is estimated by Supervisor Pressley, of Virginia, that the revenue from tobacco in that State this year will be more than the internal revenue from all other source last year.

The Protestant Synod of Virginia met at Richmond October 28.

Mr. HOLDEN has been received at the Coast Survey Office of a navy marked earthquake wave having been observed at the Hawaiian Islands on the 13th of August, ult., at five o'clock P.M. From this the conclusion is that the great earthquake in the southern part of the Pacific Ocean may be inferred, of which there was felt such severe shocks in Peru, Chili, the earthquake at Simoda in 1854, and the one which occurred in 1837, a space of last year, were also recorded in the same way. These waves travel across the Pacific Ocean at an average rate of about 400 miles an hour, depending on the depth of water along the line of their course. From the observations at and the occasions to which reference is made, the average depth of that ocean has been found to be about 2000 fathoms.

Brigham Young has suspended Mr. Stenhouse, the editor of the Salt Lake Telegraph, and all the editors and contributors to the Utah Mormon.

The preliminary report of the Department of Agriculture for the state of the crops makes the startling declaration that the actual reduction in value the past season, through "drought, grasshoppers, locusts and scorching" of farm crops, has been not less than $200,000,000.

In California there are 3000 Chinamen out of employment.

FOREIGN NEWS.

PARIS underwent the second fright of October without any difficulty. There were no riots, and the Figaro was the only coup d'état. Marshal Bazaine had been put at the head of the Imperial Guard, and the Emperor had said "to use the cannon without mercy," if the necessity arose.

The Spanish Cortes appears to be divided upon the choice of a King. The Duke of GENOA and the Duke of MONTPENSIER are the most prominent candidates. The Republicans have formed the largest number of votes. The merchants had sent in a petition in favor of Republicanism. The Duke of MONTPENSIER is in his forty-sixth year. He is the fifth and youngest son of the late King Louis PHILIPPE, and husband of the only sister of Isabella, ex-Queen of Spain. The Duke of GENOA is a nephew of the King of Italy, being the son of VICTOR EMANUEL'S brother FERDINAND, Duke of Genoa, who was born in Florence, 1884, is in his sixteenth year. His tender age, however, is a regency necessary, as Isabella's son is his heir.

The Queen of the United States, establishing unrestricted liberty of religion in the colonies of Cuba and Porto Rico, was received with the greatest joy, and has gone into effect as the law of the land. The Spanish Cortes accordingly liberal in its terms. It declares that Spain can not remain removed from the progressive movement of the age, and declares further that this consideration is the more powerful for the reason that religious liberty is near a consistent when liberty of religion is recognized by law. One clause of the constitution declares that no person can be debarred from holding office under the Government by reason of his religious belief.

The First Scotch Presbyterian church, St. Andrew's, in Scotland, was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 23. It was one of the finest edifices in Canada.

The Earl of Derby, Chancellor of Oxford, and Earl of Derby as Chancellor of Oxford University.

Professor GOLDWIN SMITH, formerly of Oxford, died October 28, aged 44 years.

The discoverer and author, Austin Henry Layard, has been appointed Minister to Spain from England.

Jeanne Bernoux is the Ida Lewis of Dieppe. She has saved the lives of fifteen sailors, and wears five medals and the cross of the Legion of Honor.

It is said that a bust of the Protestant philanthropist, Dr. KRAPF, is to be placed in the Vatican.

M. De Lesseps, the originator and engineer of the Suez Canal, is to be united in a young lady twenty two years of age shortly after the inauguration of his great work. The bride is a niece of the Empress Eugenie, and the match is said to be most pleasing.

THE REV. JOHN CUMMING, D.D.

DR. CUMMING.

THE REV. JOHN CUMMING, D.D., F.R.S.E., minister of the Scotch Church in Crown Court, Covent Garden, London, the eminently popular preacher and author of numerous works on divinity of a controversial character and expository of prophecy, was born in Aberdeenshire, of a Highland family, on November 10, 1810. Dr. CUMMING came to London in 1833, since which time he has been preaching to a very large congregation, including the leading Scotch families in London. On the platform he is distinguished for his decided and untiring opposition to the errors of the Papacy. Dr. CUMMING had the distinction of preaching before her Majesty at Balmoral, and the sermon was afterward published under the title of "Salvation." His publications are too numerous to be separately mentioned in this place. Among the most popular are "Apocalyptic Sketches, Lectures on the Book of Revelation," "Daily Life," "Voices of the Night," "Voices of the Day," etc. More recently, Dr. CUMMING published "The Great Tribulation," a volume of upward of 500 pages, treating of the prophetic descriptions of the coming of Christ and end of the world, which has had a sale of upward of 13,000; and a companion volume, published in 1861, called "Redemption Draweth Nigh," has already exceeded 7000. He has since published "The Destiny of Nations," or the future of Europe as delineated in the Bible. Dr. CUMMING belongs to the Established Church of Scotland, and opposed alike to the principle and policy of those who felt it their duty to secede in 1843, and form a separate communion in that part of the island.

The latest phase in Dr. CUMMING'S career is his correspondence with Dr. MANNING (through the latter) with the Pope in reference to the Œcumenical Council and the claim Dr. CUMMING made to be heard there in vindication of his opinions as a Protestant. As is already known, the answer returned by his Holiness was to the effect that Dr. CUMMING would be welcome at the forthcoming council, but that he must appear there, if at all, in the character of a penitent and a convert. Of course, the Rev. Doctor declines these conditions; and consequently is little likely to make his appearance at Rome.

BURNING OF THE STEEPLE OF THE OLD NORTH DUTCH CHURCH, NEW YORK. [SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

THE OLD NORTH DUTCH CHURCH.

ONE of the saddest of the results of the destructive fire in Fulton Street, this city, on the morning of October 27, was the destruction of the steeple of the Old North Dutch Church, at the corner of Fulton and William streets. This steeple was one of the few relics of the early history of New York city. Nearly all the old landmarks contemporaneous with it have been obliterated. A reporter in one of our morning journals thus commemorates the departed steeple: "What has it seen? Some communicative bird would say, perhaps, this: 'That the steeple was built when PETER STUYVESANT came, under orders from the States General, to be the Governor of their province of New Netherlands; that in those stirring days Holland had just been acknowledged as an independent nation; that war with England was going on, and that VAN TROMP, the plucky Dutch admiral, was blustering around the British coast, carrying a broom at his mast-head, with which he proposed to sweep the Channel; that he had several fierce fights with BLAKE, the English admiral, and in the last one he was killed, the English triumphed, and peace followed; that the old steeple knew this, and knew PETER STUYVESANT, the wooden-legged Governor, who resigned by treaty the sword the British-ers could not take, and retired in lofty indignation to his splendid farm, where he growled out the remainder of a useless life in cursing the fate that had Anglicized his good Dutch city. When hard-headed PETER was gathered to his fathers the steeple was left entirely alone. It saw the gradual demoralization of its adopted city by the intrusion of barbarians from England and Scotland and Ireland, and—worse than all—from Yankee land; it saw the fugitive Huguenot and his colder brother, the Puritan, pass under its shadow on their weary way to or from witch-burning New Haven; it saw the undisciplined troops of WASHINGTON flying across the island from the wild hills of Brooklyn; it saw that same WASHINGTON, seven years after, ride down the Old Bowerie more like a demi-god than a man; it saw the bonfires that proclaimed peace and independence, the fire-works that hailed the inauguration of the man whom Providence left childless that his country might call him father."

MOWING WITH THE CAMEL IN THE NEW YORK CENTRAL PARK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.]

In the old church there have been daily noon prayer-meeting since September 23, 1857. These meetings are still continued; even while the fire-engines were working—amidst the dripping of water and the bustle of a crowd of curious spectators—a prayer-meeting was held on the noon of the 27th.

The North Dutch Church was built by the Consistory of the Reformed Dutch Church, since familiarly known as the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church—a religious organization coeval with the first colonial settlement by the Hollanders, in the first part of the seventeenth century. The corner-stone of the North Church was laid in 1767—the same year that the old Brick Presbyterian Church was opened. The expense of the edifice, when opened in 1769, was estimated at £12,000. The first regular pastor was the Rev. Dr. JOHN H. LIVINGSTON. During the occupation of this city by the British in the Revolutionary War the North Church was used as a hospital, and for storage. A new and beautiful pulpit, which had just been placed in the church, was carried away by the British, and placed in an English country church. The church was reopened in 1784. Dr. LIVINGSTON resigned his pastoral charge in 1810.

In 1836 there were in the ministry of the Collegiate Dutch Reformed Church in this city DRS. JOHN KNOX, WM. C. BROWNLEE, THOMAS DE WITT, THOMAS E. VERMILYE, and TALBOT W. CHAMBERS.

Among the collegiate churches in the lower part of the city, the Old North Church has maintained its original site for the longest period. A large warehouse many years ago took the place of the Old South Church; and in 1842 the Old Middle Church was transformed into the City Post-office.

CANVAS-BACK DUCK ON CHESAPEAKE BAY.

WE have in this country as many as thirty different varieties of duck. The season for hunting this game is at its height in November and December. To the sportsman the shores of Chesapeake Bay afford peculiar facilities for duck-shooting. Our illustration on this page shows a number of ducks feeding on the wild celery plant in the vicinity of this bay. The shores and inlets of Chesapeake Bay have been portioned off in sections, and either bought or leased by numerous Ducking Clubs, for the more convenient pursuit of their favorite sport. The canvas-back duck is probably the best known of our water-fowl. Early in October it begins to arrive from its northern breeding-grounds, and soon swarms in flocks of countless thousands all along the coast. The Delaware and Susquehannah rivers, Long Island Sound, and Chesapeake Bay seem to be the favorite resorts of this delicious fowl; and although they are annually slaughtered by means of all the devices which human ingenuity can suggest, the above-named places, during the entire season, are fairly alive with them.

CANVAS-BACK DUCK ON CHESAPEAKE BAY.

The presence of this game in such numbers in these waters may be accounted for by the fact that the favorite food of the wild duck—the vallisneria, or wild celery—grows abundantly in these localities. The usual manner of obtaining the food is by diving, and as the root is the only part of the plant that is devoured, a large flock will leave abundant relics of its prowess in the gastronomic line behind it. The blades of the celery, according to WILSON, are often found strewn over the entire surface of the water, or blown into wind-rows, reminding one of a newmown field.

The almost constant companion of the canvas-back is the fine, though somewhat mischievous, duck known as the American widgeon—Anas Americana—as thorough a rascal as was ever created, a perfect parasite in the true sense of that term—living almost entirely off of the exertions of others. Like the canvas-back, the widgeon is extremely fond of the roots of the vallisneria, but, being no diver, does not possess the means of obtaining them, except by the exercise of its strategic powers. It is extremely amusing to watch the manipulations of the thief; quietly edging itself near to a selected victim, it presently waits until that unsuspecting creature disappears in quest of its food. A violent commotion now goes on under the water; it is the struggle of the duck with the plant; finally the luckless canvas-back emerges, blinded, momentarily, by the water; the widgeon "gibbles" quickly forward, snatches the morsel, and is off ere the dupe has got the water out of its eyes. These interrupted dreams of gastronomic bliss are the causes of much contention between the two parties; but, leaving this minor point of difference out of sight, they are very good friends.

Another, but a far more congenial companion than the last, is the "red head," a duck very nearly allied to the pochard of England. Fortunately for our friend the canvas-back, this bird is an excellent diver, and consequently is not obliged to resort to the harmless little stratagems of the widgeon. It is the inferior of its contemner, both in excellence of flesh, game spirit, and gentleness of appearance. This bird is not unfrequently palmed off on unsuspecting gentry from the "canal districts" as the true table canvas-back; and these deluded creatures will protest that it is worth a "half load of spreog chicken," devoured with great gusto, occasionally varying the performance by smacking of the lips and rolling of the eyes.

The enormous prices which are offered for canvas-back birds are becoming the cause of their rapid extermination.

The principal, and we may say cowardly, manner in which the canvas-backs are usually obtained is certainly, to say the least, shameful. No true sportsman will descend to such a contemptible subterfuge of murder to which these delightful birds, and all of our waterfowl with them, are subjected; nay, we will go further and say that no true sportsman will descend to the use of decoys, and by so doing degrade himself to the level of the pot-hunter. The game should always be allowed a chance for life; it should be shot in a scientific and sportsmanlike manner, by means, in a word, of its life difference to it in which manner it loses its life; but the point is, that but few more can handle water-fowl in a scientific (so to speak) manner, and by this means the destruction is stopped. Decoys, blinds, disguises, and ambushes should become an abomination in the eyes of our sporting men.

There are many stratagems practiced, by means of which the gunner is brought within range of his game. A method much practiced on the Delaware, during the winter months, consists under the head of that class of operations technically designated as "disguises." It consists of decking out the boat with white substances so as to resemble it to a large cake of ice. The birds will allow this to float very near to them; at least, close enough to allow the working of the singular craft to spread death and devastation among them.

Another and very common method of approaching, as practiced on Chesapeake Bay, is that of sailing on the ducks. A light, strong sail-boat is procured, in which the gunner places himself, and allows the boat, seemingly without consciousness of doing so, to drift out upon a flock. He can usually approach within fifteen or twenty yards, which is near enough for his purpose.

The decoy method, which is well known, is the poorest excuse of any of these. There is no skill required in the manipulation of the images. An infant could kill enough with them in one day to last a week.

It is customary among the sportsmen of Chesapeake Bay to provide themselves with certain dogs, which, by grotesque actions, decoy the birds within range of the hunter, who is hidden in the bushes. Some glaring object, as a red handkerchief, is fastened around the body of the canine, and he is then placed in full view of a flock. They notice the strange, and, to them, unaccountable antics of the dog, and their curiosity overcomes them. They draw timidly near to the place of death, and the souls of a large proportion of their number hie to the "happy feeding-grounds," which, no doubt, according to their traditions, is stocked with the valisneria roots, and is free from all interlopers, such as the widgeon.

THE FAITHLESS FAIR.
A LOVE BALLAD.

I.

Oh! Francis was a nice young man,
He was his parents' joy;
And pleasant twas to see how they Did banker on their Cojoy.

II.

Now he was born in troublous times,
When kings could ne'er agree;
There was no friendship on the land,
Though French ships on the sea.

III.

His little ears soon heard about
War's stern alarums;
He early joined the infant-ty—
A little child-in-arms!

IV.

He soon grew up, his chin grew down,
When, grievous to relate,
He found he had no property,
Though come to man's estate!

V.

About this time his parents died,
And Francis made his moan;
They gave him nothing when they left,
Though he was left a-lone!

VI.

Now Francis loved a pretty maid,
And Sarah was her name;
And in her tender heart this spark
Had kindled up a flame.

VII.

Now Sarah saw he looked distressed—
His face was done brown
And as she said, "Oh, tell me all;
My Francis, pray be frank!"

VIII.

"Oh, Sarah, all my money's gone,
'Tis that which me dejects;
And certain men, without a cause,
Have seized on my effects!

IX.

"A sailor's life were death to me,
Salt beef alone to eat;
And so I'll join the army, but I'm taken to the Fleet!

X.

"And don't be jealous, though I wed
For Susan, as you know;
She usually has me in-a-long!
And that was long a-go.

XI.

"There's William, once your suitor, love,
And others, say you will
To Love's accounts now give a check,
And never meet a Bill!"

XII.

"Oh, Francis, listen ere you list,
One favor don't refuse;
Don't think of Susan, for, you know,
A Frank's worth twenty Sons!"

XIII.

Well, then, they tried a change of hair,
He pressed a golden curl,
She sobbed, and whispered low, "Good-by!"
And he exclaimed, "Good girl!"

XIV.

He took leave of his grandmother,
And wiped away each tear,
And said, "I Don't grandmother, dear granny,
I shall be a grena-dier!"

* * * * * * *

XV.

When Francis left her for the wars,
Of suitors she'd a score,
And sighing youths thronged Sarah's doors,
All coming to a-door.

XVI.

And William sued; his parts of speech
She ought to have declined,
But thought she shouldn't mind the change,
And so she changed her mind!

XVII.

And at the altar, faithless maid,
She altered all her vows,
And gave her hand, with all her heart,
To William, as his spouse.

XVIII.

The Parson asked, "Does any say
She may not be this man's?"
A hollow voice said, "I forbid
The blessing and the bans!

XIX.

"Oh, Sarah, Sarah, you did vow
You true to me would stick;
Though I was dead your conduct false
Has stung me to the quick!

XX.

"The Frenchmen's bullets pierced me through,
A dozen in the fight;
I guarded them, and oh! they made
A riddle of me quite!

XXI.

"And afterward they buried me
All underneath the sod;
My spirit homeward roamed as soon
As it could roam abroad.

XXII.

"Oh, grievous fault! I find you're false;
Now listen to my vow:
Your troth you'd plight, you'll find you're in
A pretty plight, in troth!

XXIII.

"Henceforth your ghost, like mine, shall walk,
And roam around at night;
No longer sprightly, you shall be
A melancholy sprite."

XXIV.

He said no more, all looked around,
But nobody was there,
And on the altar-steps they stood,
And all were "on the stare!"

XXV.

All terrified, they gazed around,
And tried in vain, meanwhile,
To bring the feckle Sarah to,
All with oil volatile!!

XXVI.

Alas, alas! 'twas all in vain,
The Doctor shook his head,
And said the erring Sarah was
As any herring dead.

XXVII.

And after, in the cold church-yard,
They laid her in the ground;
Her tomb, lest idle folks should scoff,
With railings fenced around.

XXVIII.

And still they say that she is seen,
Each night throughout the year,
A-walking in the ayisle, though
She's lying in the bier!!

MORAL.

A little moral you may glean
From all that you have heard:
Where's your vow, there's your weak-ness.
Mind—ALWAYS KEEP YOUR WORD!

R. F.

OTTILIA'S PILGRIMAGE.
By JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

OTTILIA WESTFELDT was a Swedish girl who might, indeed, have been fairly taken as a feminine symbol of Sweden and the fair-haired North. I think if an artist were to seek for a type or emblem of Swedish womanhood he could hardly find a purer and more charming representative of it than this tender young girl. She had smooth golden hair, not of the tawny tow which has grown to be so great a favorite just now; but so smooth and yellow that it really looked like dead gold-leaf on each side of her white forehead. Her face had a clear, decided outline, with features regular, but somewhat large; and her eyes were deeply blue, a genuine and unmistakable blue. She finds it hard to think of a Madonna in a northern climate; but if there could be such a thing conceivable, Ottilia might have passed as a fair embodiment of a Scandinavian Madonna. She lived in Stockholm with her father, and had now no mother, brother, or sister. Her father had married when young, and was still so far removed from any appearance of age, and was so constant a companion of his daughter, that people said he might have passed for her elder brother; and he was always pleased to hear this said, and rather proud of it.

Ottilia's father had one or two marked peculiarities. He was, for one thing, an ardent republican. Not that he had any objection to the government of Sweden or to the descendant of Bernadotte—Oscar the First—who sat on the throne during the early school and prime of Christina Westfeldt; or to Charles the Fifteenth, who succeeded him; but that he was a sincere and impassioned admirer of republicanism. Being a history of republicanism he was naturally a devoted admirer of the United States. At all times and in every civilized country, since the days when Washington, Lafayette, and Koscinsko fought side by side, there can be found a group, or groups, of worshipful thinking men, to whom the republic of America has always shone like the polar star of freedom. For there are two distinct classes of republicans in monarchical, and more especially in despotic, countries. The one class has been always surprised by the glitter, the lyrical splendor, the lofty, vague aspirations, the majestic, unsubstantial pageant of human brotherhood which belong to what I may call, for want of a better phrase, French republicanism. The other have always found their ideal in the solid, unpretending, almost commonplace truth and reality of the American republic. I wonder if all Americans are aware of the fact that in every European state, however small, there are, and for generations always have been, men bound together, often unconsciously, in the bonds of a fellowship almost like that of freemasonry—the brotherhood of devotion to the American republic.

Christian WESTFELDT was one of these, and his daughter Ottilia imbibed all his sentiments, and reproduced them with even a more passionate and romantic enthusiasm than them. Indeed her father and herself were intimate friends of the good and true Fredrika Bremer, that symbol in literature and life of the simple, beneficent womanhood of the North; and Ottilia, brought up almost at the feet of Miss Bremer, had learned to look on the many pious and good people in America as if she had seen and known them.

Ottilia led a singularly calm and happy life up to her eighteenth year. Indeed existence seemed to lie before her smooth and calm as a quiet inland lake. Her father's modest means sufficed to keep them becomingly in the unpretentious, intelligent, cultured, social circle to which they belonged. She was soon to be married to one whom she dearly loved—a gallant, brave young Swede, who had been educated in one of the military academies, and was to have been an officer of engineers, but had given up a military career at the express desire of Ottilia and her father, and was now becoming a successful man in railway and other engineering of a civil kind. Nothing whatever occurred which even threatened a danger to the happiness of these tranquil lovers until the early part of the year 1861.

Do you remember that the passage in one of Macaulay's essays in which he describes the wide-spread, almost universal discord and slaughter caused by the reckless ambition of Frederick the Great, and declares that red men on the shores of Ontario, who had never heard of Frederick's name, scalped and tortured each other because of his quarrel? Not quite so remarkable, yet still remarkable, is the fact that the political dissensions of Jefferson Davis and his colleagues shattered in a moment the whole earthly scheme of a happy, tranquil little group living in a picturesque suburb of the capital of Sweden.

The secession war blazed out, and Ottilia and her father saw their hopes banished idle apparently about to be broken. They felt the news as they might have felt a Russian or French invasion of Sweden. It was an evening of early spring that Eric Swenson, the lover, stood with Ottilia and Westfeldt in a room as yet only lighted by the moon and the glittering stars, and spoke of the treasonable conspiracy against the American Union; and there was one thought, yet unspoken, in the breast of each. For a few, a very few months, and Ottilia and Eric were to be married. Eric looked at her—was about to speak out his thoughts, then hesitated and shrank from it. Their eyes met. Then it was Ottilia who spoke:

"Can we do nothing, any of us," she said, impetuously, "for the great republic?"

"I can do something," cried Eric. "Until you spoke I hardly dared to offer—"

"I can do something," the elder man broke in. "I have honored and loved the republic all my life. Thank Heaven I am not too old or too weak to fight in her cause to-day. She has given me the luxury of such a nationality. It is right we should all try to do something for her. Ottilia, you shall marry Eric at once; he will be one of us; and I will go out to America and fight for the Union."

"Never!" cried Eric. "I will go. You must stay and take care of Ottilia. I could do some good there. I could turn my training as a military engineer to some account, for the first time. I feel that something worth doing, and make Ottilia proud of me."

"You foolish boy, don't you think Ottilia would rather have you with her than in danger?"

"Let us ask her. Let Ottilia decide!"

"Agreed, my boy. Ottilia shall decide."

"Oh no, dear father; no, dear Eric. Don't ask me to decide! Oh, I wish I had not spoken! I am not capable of what I have said. How could I possibly part with either of you? How could I bear to see our happiness broken up? I am a great coward. I wish I could be myself up to it; but how could I give up my father and my Eric?"

Indeed, Ottilia's sudden burst of chivalric energy had for the moment almost collapsed. She dreaded the thought of parting, really parting, from her father or her lover; and her eyes were filled with tears and her limbs trembled.

But the father and the lover persevered. One or other would go; and each would be more and more vehemently his own claims. Both combined in pressing a decision upon Ottilia.

"Come, Ottilia, my child," said her father at last, in an urgent and decisive tone, "we expect a little firmness and a little sacrifice from you. Feel that the cause calls to them to fight, a good cause to which we feel in our hearts that one at least ought to be dedicated. This is the true test of all for them, and all men who wish to be free every where over the world. Truly American citizens will be dedicated. But that is not the question; our duty is not the less clear. She could probably have done without Rochambeau and Jean Valjean. Now, Ottilia, you decide, Ottilia—and remember Eric is to be your husband."

"Yes, decide, Ottilia!" cried the young man; "and remember that my rival in this dispute is your father."

Then a heart beat fiercely and her eyes grew dim, and for a moment she could not see or speak. But, if she must choose, her decision was clear. She made one or two efforts to speak and failed; then at last collected all her strength and sense, and said:

"Dear, dear father, you must not go. Eric, my own love, I send you."

Eric sprang forward and caught her in his arms. For the effort had overtaxed her, and she was falling in a faint.

Before a week was out Eric had sailed from Bremen. A brave little handful of sturdy young Swedes went with him, all eager to offer their services in the cause of human freedom and of the American Union. Eric, who had been many times in England on engineering projects, and spoke English fluently, occupied himself a good deal during the voyage in teaching his companions a little of the language. He hoped by means of it to make himself useful in America to raise a distinct Swedish regiment, which should make its mark on the battle-fields of the republic.

He was to have written to Ottilia ever so often; and he did write many letters full of love and high spirits and hope. Then there came a long blank. She expected, poor girl, every day to find the papers full of some wonderful exploit performed by her young hero; but the stories of battles brought no record of his deeds or his name. The last letter she received from him was written on the eve of the great fight at Antietam. Ottilia and her father followed on the map every movement of the war. She knew more of its scenes and its progress than many a New York girl did. Indeed, her whole soul was in it.

So the days, and weeks, and months wore on, and Ottilia never heard of her lover. She and her father hardly dared to speak the doubts and fears that tortured them. Westfeldt wrote to the Swedish consul in New York, who made careful inquiries, but could find no trace of Eric's movements or even of his existence after Antietam. He had served in the German regiment, and his name was returned with those of the missing. The only scrap of comfort was, that the list of the killed or the wounded had no name like his.

"I ought to have gone," said Westfeldt to himself very sadly one day. "I ought not to have left it to her decision"—he was gazing at the pale face of his daughter—"I ought not to have allowed him to go. She would have got over the loss of me, and been happy with her husband. Him she can never forget. Her life is ruined from its very spring-time."

He thought for a few moments, and then he went over to his daughter, and took her hand in his.

"Ottilia, my child, let us go in search of him."

A flush of light that seemed almost joyous came in her deep blue eyes. She pressed her father's hand rapturously, and cried, "Oh, father, dear father, let us go! Let us start at this place at once. We shall find him—I know we shall."

Their preparations were not very troublesome, and they began to leave Stockholm on their love pilgrimage in a few days. But Fate sharply interposed, and dealt them both a heavy, sudden blow.

Westfeldt, who had always seemed in noble health, was seized with convulsive spasms one day, and appeared to be stricken with something like paralysis. His condition apparently baffled the doctors, and he became steadily worse and worse. The very morning of the day when he and his daughter were to have left Stockholm for their voyage he suddenly called her to him, clutched her hand, murmured convulsively, "Oh, Ottilia, my daughter! O God, watch over her!" and then sank back—and Ottilia was alone in the world.

Her grief, his burial, her utter prostration from the excitement of fresh agony—all these kept her long in Stockholm. Then her friends endeavored to retain her with them, and dissuade her from carrying out alone the enterprise she had resolved on with her father. The American war was by this time obviously drawing to a close. Even the London Times was beginning to be less confident about the utter failure of Grant and the disastrous retreat of Sherman. One of the young Swedes who had been with and served with Eric actually came back to Stockholm wounded and wasted; and he reported that Eric had long been given up by each of his comparriots as still survived. There seemed little use, indeed, in Ottilia's quest; yet go to America and seek for her lost lover she would, at last, to escape the advice and the importunity of her friends, she literally broke away from Stockholm; fled, without giving any one notice, or saying a word of farewell, to Bremen; and thence sailed away across the Atlantic, more lonely and less hopeful than the wife of Cumeralzmar, in the "Arabian Nights," when she starts on her brave, sad pilgrimage, to find the husband who had so mysteriously disappeared from her side.

When Ottilia arrived in New York the war was all over, and President Lincoln lay dead. The city was this poor, solitary Swedish girl, who spoke but little English, to do in this strange, vast city —in this almost limitless land—where she had come to find an obscure young man who had dropped out of the sight of the living world years ago? She took an odd, girlish, romantic course. She sought out an American poet and scholar whom Frederika Bremer had known well, and she flung herself down before him, and told him her story. He listened with interest, compassion, admiration; he offered her a shelter with his family; and he threw all his energy and influence into the effort to find her lover. Some trace of Eric was found at last. He had beyond doubt been taken prisoner, and confined in the fearful Libby Prison. He had even been there until a comparatively recent period. But whether his wasted bones filled one of the nameless nameless graves of the prison; whether he was among the living skeletons it had redeemed from bondage; whether he was one of the few men who had succeeded, under extraordinary difficulties, in making their escape, it seemed impossible now to know. Ottilia's new friend and protector did all he could to get further tidings, but in vain. The trail of the missing man was lost, utterly lost, amidst the smoke and dust and blood of the war's last convulsions.

"Stay with us; let this be your home—live with my wife and daughters, and be one of our family," said Ottilia's friend to her in tender, paternal tones one evening when all hope seemed to have gone of the restoration of her lover. The poet and his wife, and the young Swedish girl, stood together outside the porch of a beautiful country house, and on a lawn which sloped gently to the banks of a noble river.

"Oh, you are generous and kind—who ever was so generous?"

"Nay! as an American I owe you much. You sacrificed all for our cause; do we not owe you at least a home?"

"But, dear friends, I can not stay. I feel that I ought to go back to where my father is buried, and where my Eric, if he be alive—and oh, I still believe he is alive—will surely one day come to seek for me."

"But you have written home—you have told your friends—do they know where you are?"

"Alas! no. I have written to nobody; I have not had the heart to say any thing. I have been absorbed only in the one thought. I fear I spoil your happy home with my sadness and my anxiety."

"You shall not go back," said the poet's wife, throwing her arm affectionately round the girl's waist. "You can have no very close and dear friends in Stockholm, or you must have written to them; and we have, therefore, the first claim on you. Come, come, you must stay here. You shall be my daughter. I will never give you up to any one but Eric; for, dear Ottilia, I, too, believe you will see Eric once more."

Ottilia threw herself into her friend's arms and sobbed; but felt, for the first time since her father's death, a gleam of returning brightness.

While she was thus clasped in the protecting embrace of her friend, the poet, who stood looking on with moistened eyes, was interrupted by a servant, who brought a message for him. The man was in the disguise of a fashionably autographic hunter; and it would be a dreadful mistake to send the heavenly messenger away unseen." So this time he waited in the library, and scrabbled a little, shrugged his shoulders, and, finally, told the servant he would see the unknown and nameless intruder.

Ottilia and the poet's wife did not observe his going—only saw after a while that he was gone. Presently he came back, looking strangely excited:

"My dear," he said to his wife, "the angels have sent a visitor at last. Come to her! Take her away and whispered something to her—whereon she started and almost broke into a scream, and glanced reluctantly at the door.

The husband and wife walked up and down a term or two on the lawn, and talked in low tones. Then they approached Ottilia.

"Dear Ottilia," said the poet, in a grave, sweet voice, "you have borne much sorrow and anxiety and disappointment. Is your spirit strong and brave enough to bear with tidings of joy?"

Ottilia clasped her hands, and a wild cry broke from her lips:

"Oh, my dear friend, tell me, tell at once! Have you news of Eric? Is Eric living?"

"Eric is living. Eric is here!"

Ottilia made a rapid movement as if she would rush to meet her lover, then her knees trembled, her strength gave way, and she fainted. When she recovered consciousness Eric, brown, worn of face, and bearded, held her in his arms.

And, so her long quest and her long sorrow were over, and her lover lived and had found her again. His story was easily told. He had languished in Confederate prisons—chiefly Richmond, where he never had a chance of writing to her or sending her a message. Just toward the close of the war he had escaped from prison, and made his way, after immense difficulties, to the North, where he sailed for Europe in a slow, old, lumbering vessel, which gave him a passage cheaply. Having got nearly half way across the Atlantic they were driven back to New Brunswick, and thence he sailed again, and at last reached Stockholm only to find that Ottilia had long left it, and gone to him in the United States. No one in Stockholm knew any thing of her whereabouts. He raised what money he could and returned to New York. The very first day of his arrival he heard some vague story of the Swedish girl living under the shelter of the venerable poet and scholar, and he lost no time in seeking the poet in his country home. He could hardly put his question into coherent words when, half distracted with the conflicting tortures of hope and doubt, he stood in the poet's presence.

There is nothing more to be said, except that Ottilia and Eric are married, and are settled in the United States; that the poet and his family hold them always in the closest and closest friendship; and that there is far more of truth in this little story than its readers perhaps would at first be inclined to suppose.

SEA-SICKNESS.

THE immediate cause of sea-sickness is an undue amount of blood in the nervous centres down the back. This being true, the malady will be avoided by every thing that prevents congestion; and when it exists it will be cured by lessening the amount of blood in those centres. In doing either the one or the other, the internal and sympathetic nervous systems must be included in the remedial measure, for both are concerned in the production of the disease. To cure sea-sickness, then, if these opinions are correct, nothing more is necessary than to reduce the temperature of the nerve-centres. Dr. Alexander Hood, Dr. Chapman, an English physician, is best done by the application of ice in an India rubber bag along the spine. The remedy is perhaps a desperate one; and in some states of atmospheric temperature the thought of such an application will have a chilling influence upon the expectant traveler; but, instead of its having a cold, depressing, uncomfortable effect upon the patient, it is really a pleasant, agreeable application, giving quickly a sensation of warmth where most needed, and acting with a soothing influence upon the disturbed system. To those who, compare the condition of a traveler who has accepted the remedy with that of one who has not. The sick passenger sits helpless, retching and vomiting on a winter's day, with the spray dashing over him—cold, faint, depressed and ready to die. The man with a column of ice on his back moves from place to place with a healthy brain and stomach, suffering no more inconvenience than is brought about by the difficulty of supporting his centre of gravity. The comfort or discomfort felt by a traveler in the use of ice as a preventive to sea-sickness is more in the mode of application than in the nature of the specific. If the India rubber ice-bag be kept in the centre of the back, and in contact with the spine, without extending far on either side from the spinal column, the bag is worn without inconvenience. It is not even necessary, in all cases, to wear it next the skin. A far more important consideration is the application of it when employed as a remedy in other nervous disorders, that the required effect may be obtained in the greatest degree, and with the least loss of time.

CURIOUS MECHANISM OF THE THYSANURA.

AT a late meeting of the British Association Sir J. Lubbock read a paper on the singular anatomy of the thysanura, an insect of extreme delicacy of organization, which has an apparatus for locomotion totally unlike any other known to entomologists. They have six legs, but no wings. The tail is provided with two long appendages which are bent forward under the body, forming a spring, by means of which the creature is enabled to leap with such force as to go twelve inches at such jump. The power is not in the action of muscles in the tail itself, but actually in a latent elastic spring. Minute muscles draw it forward and under an actual latch, where it is confined like the blade of a pocket-knife, and, by the will of the insect, the spring throws the little being rapidly forward, foot after foot, in pursuit of game or to escape from enemies.

A spring constructed and acting on a different principle, but equally surprising under anatomically studied, exists in the mechanism of a kangaroo's tail. As the animal rises up on its long hind-legs, the tail, by a powerful instrument for throwing the body onward with a bound. When put to their speed they vault with surprising energy, so that they often outrun a swift horse. Every principle known in the domain of the mechanic arts is merely a humble imitation of what nature has always exhibited in animal structures.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE following curiously-mixed poetical effusion was written by an inmate of the Lunatic Asylum at Utica, and is certainly a curious specimen:

Gayly the tiger tuned his guitar,
Trembling his fingers with feathers and tar;
Sweetly he sneezed at her, sourly he sighed:
"Lady fair, will you be my bride?"
She for the elephant coolly had pined,
Fairly in love, as the vowel she hadn't dined;
Carried up a photograph close to her heart,
Wrapped up in flannels, bank-notes, and plum tart.
At midnight the rivals met to the whale,
And feeding for love of the grasshopper's tail;
The elephant stood on his trunk to take breath,
And the tiger coolly bagged him to death.
Then with a cabbage-stalk boldly he wrote:
"Cousins, all come, and feast on the tail of my coat;
See thy own crocodile a-whistling for thee."
He groaned, and died, and gargle—a cold corpse was he.

A Frenchman for twenty years loved a lady, and never missed passing his evenings at her house. She became a widow, and said:

"I wish you joy," cried his friend; "you have married the woman you ——."

"I have no longer offered."

"Alas!" said the poor Frenchman, grievously dejected, "and where should I spend my evenings?"

Once upon a time, before the negro had acquired any claims to a pecuniary value, an old colored Divine who was holding forth to an audience of his own race on the watchful care and goodness of God's providence, and endeavoring to impress upon his hearers the value of a Christian darkey in the eyes of Heaven, illustrated the point thus:

"My Brethren, though you can buy seven apple-vows for a farthing, de almighty hain't a book to put down what every nigger is worth. No, my brethren, de Lord Almighty take so much care of de sparrow dat He counts only seventeen to a farthin', but you'd pose he do for you, a real bobtail copper? Why, you made when there's dead folks in de house, an' I hate to borrow."

A bagdem was to be exhumed from a neighboring fleet off North Carolina in 1856, and notice was to be given to the fleet by signal. The book contained no symbols for "baptism," and the order was signalled thus: "There will be religious drying on shore at 2 P.M."

KNOW YOU?

Know you the hour when Phœbus steals
From where Aurora blushing lies,
And mounts the heaven on glowing wheels,
And gilds the gray of dawning skies?

Know you the time when the birds begin
To carol to the rising sun—
When from the woods their joonad din
Proclaims the reign of night is done?

Know you the moment when the dew
Exhales in silvery sighs from blooms
Whence it steps the wakening hues
Till Phœbus the rapt earth illumes?

Know you the moment, time, and hour
Of daybreak? Well, you do, anyway.
Well, that's the time I feel a power
Of slumbers in "the sleeping sway."

A little boy had his first pocket-knife, and for several days used it himself, and extended the privilege of the occasional use of the treasure to his little playmates. One evening he was kneeling at his mother's knee, saying his customary prayer, which he closed in these words: "And please, God, give little Jimmy Bailey a knife of his own, so he won't want to borrow mine all the time."

An old lady, recently, in some court before which she was brought as a witness, when asked to take off her bonnet, obstinately refused to do so, saying, "There is no law to compel a woman to take off her bonnet." "Oh!" replied the presiding judge, "you only do as I tell you to do, and I will take the responsibility of the consequences."

A new arrival at Sweetwater, Wyoming, was waited upon by a gentleman as soon as he had registered his name at the hotel, with the offer of the position of deputy-sheriff. On inquiring why he was so much favored, he learned that the last incumbent was shot the night before, and his predecessor on the day preceding. "How long does a deputy-sheriff live in these parts?" "Oh, about twenty-four hours." The stranger declined the appointment.

"In Mrs. Blinking at home?" asked Mr. Saunders of the Irish girl who answered the ring at the door. "Yes, sir, I've rebe'ed, Sir." "Is she engaged?" "Ah, is it engaged, you say? Faix an' I can't tell you, Sir, but she kissed Mr. Vincent last evening as if she had never seen the like av him, and it's engaged I have they are, Sir."

A young lady was alighting from an omnibus, when a ribbon fell from her bonnet to the floor of the vehicle.

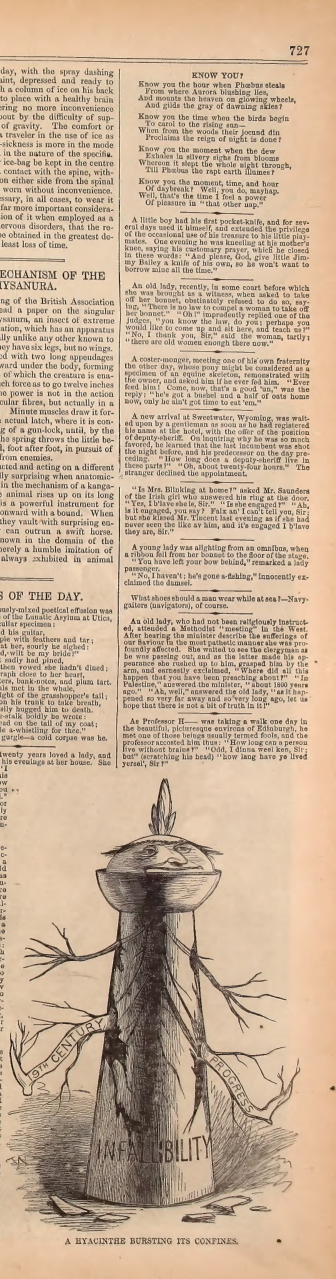
"You have left your bow behind," remarked a lady passenger.

"No, I haven't; he's gone a-fishing," innocently exclaimed the damsel.

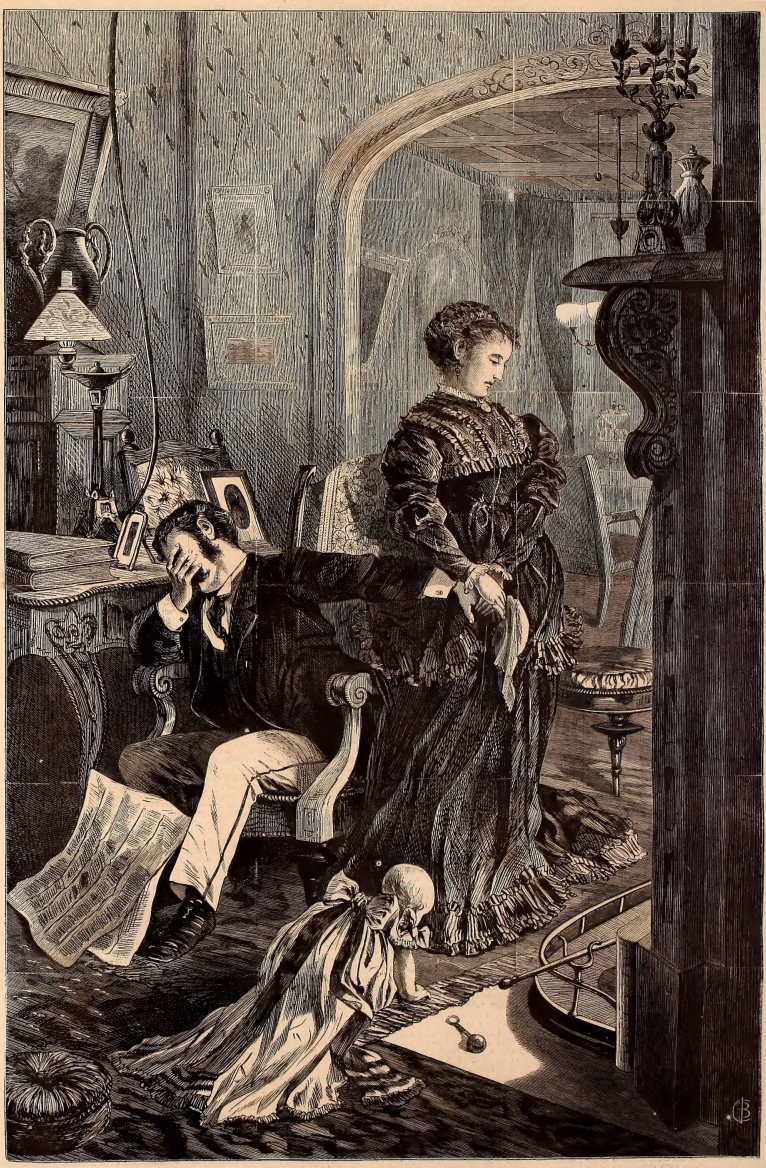
What shoes should a man wear while at sea?—Navy-gaiters (navigators), of course.

A old lady, who had not been religiously instructed, attended a Methodist "meeting" in the West. After hearing the minister describe the sufferings of our Saviour in the most pathetic manner she was profoundly affected. She waited to see the clergyman as he was getting out, and in the most pitiful tone his appearance she rushed up to him, grasped him by the arm, and earnestly exclaimed, "Where did all this happen that you have been preaching about?" "In Palestine," answered the minister, "about 1800 years ago." "Ah, well," answered the old lady, "as it happened so very far away and so very long ago, let us hope that there is not a bit of truth in it!"

As Professor H—— was taking a walk one day in the beautiful, picturesque environs of Edinburgh, he met one of those beings usually termed fools, and the professor accosted him thus: "How long can a person live without brains?" Cold, I dinna weel ken, Sir," (scratching his head) "how lang have ye lived yersel, Sir?"



AN INVALID GOING SOUTH FOR THE WINTER—SCENE ON BOARD A SOUTHERN-BOUND STEAMER FROM NEW YORK.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]



"RUINED."—DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.—[SEE PAGE 732.]

THE SONG OF THE MILL.

WHEN summer airs are fresh and sweet,
And clover blossoms new,
And birds rejoice, and young lambs bleat,
And skies are clear and blue:

How merrily the mill goes round,
How merrily goes the mill,
As the hopper clacks with a cheery sound,
And echoes o'er the hill!

When age sits shivering by the fire,
And wintry winds are white,
And youth doth chill his warm desire,
And frosty north-winds bite:

Still merrily the mill goes round,
And merrily goes the mill,
As the hopper clacks with a cheery sound,
And rings across the hill.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book II.

CHAPTER IV.

ZILLAH'S STORY.

The widow's reflections as she thought over her interview with Mr. Frost were bitter enough.

Her situation was that of one who, in endeavoring to reach a wished-for goal, has chosen the apparently great path over a morass, rather than the tedious, stupy way, which, although painful, would have been safe. Now the treacherous bog yonked beneath her faltering feet. But it was vain to look back. She must proceed. To go forward with a steady eye, at once firm and light was, in the last only chance of safety. And it was but a chance.

Years ago, when Zillah Lockwood was a young woman and a newly-married wife, Sidney Frost had—through the knowledge of certain passages in her life which he had gained accidentally—come to have a secret power and influence over her.

He had used his knowledge at first to protect her against the persecutions of a ruffian, and in so doing he had acted disinterestedly.

Afterward he was tempted by circumstances to avail himself of the power he held over Zillah Lockwood in order to help himself forward in the world.

The case stood thus:

Robert Lockwood and Sidney Frost were early and intimate friends. When the former married Miss Zillah Fenton—a governess in the family of a rich merchant, named Blythe, who liked pictures, and thought the society of the painters of pictures—Frost had still been cordially welcomed at his friend's house.

Miss Fenton was an orphan, without a relation in the world. Her early life had been passed in Paris; and Mrs. Blythe said she had reason to believe that her father, Captain Fenton, had been a needy adventurer of disreputable character. But against the young lady no one had a word to say.

At first the young couple were entirely happy. To the day of his death Robert Lockwood adored his wife. He believed in her with the most absolute trust. He admired her talents. He was guided by her advice.

But when, within a few months of their marriage, Zillah became melancholy, nervous, and silent, Robert was painfully puzzled to account for the change in her.

She declared herself to be quite well; but her husband insisted on her seeing a doctor after doctor, in the hope of discovering some cure for the unaccountable depression of spirits under which she was suffering.

It was all in vain, however. Robert was in despair; and seriously contemplated sacrificing his prospects and daily-rising reputation as an artist, in order to take his wife abroad for total change of air and scene.

A mere chance, connected with his professional business, gave Sidney Frost a clew to the cause of the mysterious malady under which his friend's wife was pining. The clew was furnished by a few words dropped by a man of very vile character, a professional black-leg, who had come to London for a time to escape the too vigilant attention of the Parisian police, and from whose clutches Mr. Frost was endeavoring to extricate a foolish young scape-grace, the son of one of his clients.

His professional and natural acuteness enabled Sidney to make a shrewd guess at the real state of the case. He surprised Zillah one day, when her husband was absent at his studio, into a confession that she knew this man. And after a little gentle cross-examination, the trembling woman burst into tears and revealed the whole story.

Zillah's motherless youth had been passed in Paris, in the home of a father for whom it was impossible for her to feel either affection or respect. His associates were members of his own character, or young scions of rich or noble houses, who frequented Fenton's shabby, tawdry little salon for the purpose of enjoying the excitement of high play.

Amidst such surroundings Zillah grew to be sixteen; little more than a child in years, but a woman in one sad and sordid phase of world's lore. Her notion of right and wrong was solely derived from her own untutored instincts. These were, in the main, good and pure. But she was ignorant, absolutely ignorant—and she fell.

Coarse appeals to vanity or greed would have been powerless on Zillah. But the poor child was unable to resist the impulses of an undisciplined heart. She scarcely even conceived that it behoved her to resist them.

She believed the passionate protestations of love—protestations not wholly insincere when uttered—of a noble gentleman whom she looked up to as the ideal of every thing splendid and heroic.

The story was trite. Its denouement was trite also, save in one particular. This one exceptional circumstance was the unexpected and abruptly unreasonable despair of Zillah when she perceived that her god was an idol of clay—that he had ceased to love her; and when he informed her, with a good deal of well-bred dexterity, that he was about to make a marriage de convenance at the urgent solicitation of his noble family, he was quite amazed at the girl's violence. He was willing to behave handsomely. But when Zillah waved away in horror from his offers of money, like one who suddenly sees the flat, cruel head of a snake rear itself from a rose-or he has been caressing, M. le Vicomte was really shocked. In what Fool's Paradise had the girl been living, to give herself such a shock at her sire's arrival in the vieux Fenton? One diable! His knowledge began to look on himself as a victim, and to pity himself accordingly, which state of mind had the desirable effect of quenching the pity for her, which the girl's pale, passionate face and streaming eyes had aroused to a quite uncomfortable degree.

Then came a second blow. Captain Fenton was willing to receive his daughter back again, but on conditions against which the girl's whole nature rose up in revolt. He had discovered that his daughter was attached to a man who was not assist him in that devil's recruiting service, which he still carried on zealously, but with very fluctuating success.

In brief, to return to her father's home would be to plunge into a black gulf of shame. Zillah told herself that one hour of misery had been endured not what became of her; but from her father and her father's associates she shrank with an shuddering, invincible aversion.

Then the extraordinary reserve force of courage and endurance with which nature had endowed the girl made itself felt. She was eighteen years old, alone in Paris, and almost penniless. But she struggled like a strong swimmer buffeting the rolling waves. She resolved to live; and to live honestly. She starved rather than sell herself. She lived on bread and water, and worked with a vigorous industry that, as it were, invigorated her.

Then one watching on the shore stretched out to her a hand, not a warm, comforting human clasp, but—a staff to her aid. A dry, hard stick was held to her, and she caught at it. It was something to cling to. A woman who knew her history engaged Zillah to attend on her children, and to teach them English.

For five years the poor girl was a drudge whose physical fatigues and privations were the lightest and most frequent part of her sufferings. But she pursued her solitary way inflexibly. In teaching she learned. She worked with amazing industry to improve herself. She succeeded, and she succeeded. Her blameless life and unwearying activity had softened even her mistress's cold heart toward her; and when Mrs. Fenton left her employment this woman gave her such recommendations as procured for her a situation in England.

From that time her worldly prospects seemed clear and tranquil.

After a year or two she had known Robert Lockwood, and the world was changed for her.

"I loved him so!" said Zillah, sobbing, to Sidney Frost. "I had a child. I should never love any human being more, and that men were all false, sensual, and selfish. But he came to me like God's sunshine after the long, black winter. I felt young again, I who had deemed myself old at five-and-twenty. I ought to have told him all my miserable story. But many a struggle with my conscience about it. But—but—Robert honored me so highly. I was to be the exalted ideal of what a woman ought to be. I was to reward. I dared not risk losing him. I had been so unhappy, so friendless. Only a man but a woman can understand what I had suffered. And here was a glimpse of Paradise. Was it to speak the word which would drive me for ever, back into the desolate cold to die? I could not do it. I thought 'when we are married, when he has learned to believe in me, to trust in for him, and to trust me as his faithful wife, I will kneel down and hide my face on his knees, and tell him.' But as I learned to know him better, I found what a fatal mistake I had made in delaying my confession. You know Robert. He says that he could never again trust any one who had once deceived him. The first time he said so a knife went into my heart. Oh, if I had but told him at first, he might have pitied, and forgiven, and loved me! for, God knows, I was more sinned against than sinning. I was but seventeen. Think of it! Sixteen years old! Well, this concealment bore bitter fruit. My child has been dead these years; but recently one of his old associates, the man you have been speaking of, came to London, found me out, and came to me with threats, entreaties, bribes, all his kind are, either flush of money or a beggar. My horror at sight of him; my dread lest Robert, who was at the studio, should return and find him, showed him, I suppose, what hold he had upon me. From soliciting alms, he came to demanding money like a highwayman. I gave him what I could. Since then he has persecuted me, until life is almost unendurable. I see Robert's anxiety; I am tormented for him. But I dare not tell the truth. This wretch threatens me, if I do not comply with his demands, that he will tell my proud English husband all the history of my youth. You, who know something of the man, can conjecture in what a hideous light he would put the facts he has to relate. If Robert were to spurn me and despise me, I should die. Oh, I am afraid! It is so horrible to be afraid!"

Sidney listened sympathetically. He was (as is not uncommon) better than his creed, which was already a somewhat cynical one. He pitied and encouraged Mrs. Lockwood; promised to rid her of the scoundrel forever; and adroitly said a word or two to the effect that she had done not trouble her husband with so annoying and contemptible a matter.

"I know Robert very well," said he; "and I am sure he would not rest until he had thrashed our French friend soundly. Now a kicking more or less in this life would not matter to him at all. It would put Robert in the wrong too, and distress you. I undertake to punish the miscreant much more effectually."

How he managed to get rid of her tormentor Zillah never certainly knew; but the man dropped out of her life never to reappear in it.

Sidney Frost was actuated chiefly by motives of kindness toward the Lockwoods. Whatever the woman's past might have been, she made his friend a good wife. Robert idolized her. He was happy in his unfaltering faith in her. But he would not have been able to be happy had his faith once been shaken. That was the nature of the man. Frost would serve both husband and wife, and secure their own comfort.

Added to all these considerations, there was another incentive influencing his conduct—his professional interest—with which he was contemplated balking a rascal's schemes—a zest quite as far removed from any considerations of the sweet right and the eagerness of a fox-hunter is removed from moral indignation against the thievish propensities of the fox.

Frost was a man who loved the happiest Zillah had ever known or was fated to know. She was the joyful mother of a son. Her husband's fame and fortune rose day by day. Sidney Frost never reminded her of the secret they shared except by a look or word, which, indeed, had grown almost to regard the days of her misery and degradation as something unreal, like the remembrance of a bad dream.

But a change was at hand.

Robert Lockwood fell ill. His was not a rapid, alarming illness. It was slowly wasting away, as it seemed. A short time before his health began to fail he had yielded to the urgent solicitations of his friends, and Sidney Frost had consented to the latter a large sum of money—the savings of his life—to be invested in certain speculations which they guaranteed to be highly flourishing; and, as has been previously stated, Sidney, in accepting the trust, honestly meant to fulfill it with a single-minded view to his friend's advantage.

Then came temptation: a combination of circumstances, which, in a large man to complete the amount necessary for the purchase of a share in a flourishing legal business. On his obtaining the share he required his marriage with a woman whom he passionately loved. He lived the greater portion of Lockwood's money for this purpose. He meant to have the transaction to himself thus: "Robert shall find this a better investment than any I proposed to him. The business is as safe as the Bank of England. With an infusion of skill and energy such as I can bring to it, wealth, great wealth, is absolutely certain. It cannot fail. My property at handsomer interest than he could easily obtain in any other way!"

All the while he was desperately ashamed and troubled in his inmost heart.

Zillah had been told by her husband of his having confided money to Frost. She had almost as undoubting faith in their friend as Robert had. But she asked, "You have a formal acknowledgment, dear, of the money lent?"

"He wrote me some kind of receipt, or I O U. I don't think it is what you call a 'formal acknowledgment,' little wife. But from Sidney it is sufficient."

"You will keep it carefully, dear Robert?"

"Oh yes, I suppose so."

"Because you know if Mr. Frost were to—to die?"

Zillah's quick intelligence discovered that something was wrong with Sidney after he had undertaken her husband's trust. He kept away from the house. Robert had been in town. He was going to be married. He had obtained his long-coveted partnership. A suspicion of the truth dawned into her mind. She endeavored to take him off his guard by adroit questions. But her woman's cunning was no match for Sidney Frost.

He confronted the matter boldly and with outward composure. He made no inward preparation or modification to be abashed before this woman who had been so humbly grateful at his feet. He told Zillah her self-control had been admirable.

"It is not exactly the investment I had proposed, but it will be, in the end, a far better one than any other for you all. I have not mentioned my changes of plan to Robert. He is not well enough to be bothered about business. He is the best-hearted, dearest fellow in the world; but you know that it is sometimes necessary to withhold facts for his own good."

At the word the hot blood rushed to Zillah's face, and her temples throbbed painfully. She understood perfectly the kind of bungle that was being made. She reflected that her first deception was now bearing its legitimate fruit.

She was helpless. She carefully locked Mr. Frost's informal receipt into her writing-desk, and submitted in silence.

When Robert grew better," she said to herself, "I will summon resolution to tell him every thing. I will!"

But Robert never got better; and within a few months he was laid in his grave.

CHAPTER V.

A MORNING CALL.

Mr. Frost drove home to Bayswater after business hours, on the day on which Mrs. Lockwood had visited him, very weary in body and sick at heart.

Mrs. Frost had the most stylish of tiny broughams, drawn by a pawing steed, whose action gave one the idea that it had been taught to dance on the Italian plan. Like a bear.

Mr. Frost used a street cab when he drove at all. Very often he returned home on foot. On this special afternoon he was thoroughly tired. He had been into the City, into offices wherein his partner would have been much amazed to see him, and in addresses of which that partner had not the faintest suspicion.

As the cab jingled and wobbled along the busy streets toward Bayswater, Mr. Frost leaned his head back against the frowzy cushion and closed his eyes. But he could not deaden his hot brain. That was always, at present, fearfully active. He ground his teeth when he thought of Zillah Lockwood. And yet he pitied her.

"If I could ruin my blood into guineas she should have her own," said he, mentally.

But if Mr. Frost could have coined his blood into guineas—in one sense he did coin flesh, and blood, and health, and life into lacre—it is probable that still Mrs. Lockwood would not have had her own. For Mrs. Frost had an insatiable appetite for guineas, and would have received any amount of them with the greedy immobility of a gaping-mouthed Indian idol.

She was an idol that had cost her husband dear, and yet he still continued to worship her and did not suspect her! Like the poor savage of the south, who alternately rails at, and grovels before, his Wooden Madonna.

George's Frost was a magnificently beautiful woman. Her face and figure were noble and majestic. Her manners graceful, dignified, queenly.

Mrs. Frost looks every inch a duchess," some one said, admiringly. But Mrs. Frost had once stood for two hours beside a wax bust in a real duchess at a picture show, and after that she told her husband, with a superb, languid smile, that she should decline to be likened to a duchess any more.

"A little, skinny, painted, flaxen-haired creature in a short waist, and with the most atrocious bonnet that ever was perched on a human head," said Mrs. Frost, disdainfully. "I am not at all like a duchess, if she is a fair specimen of the genus!"

But nevertheless Mrs. Frost was pleased to be likened to a duchess.

Mr. Frost did not reach his home until a few minutes before seven. Seven o'clock was his dinner hour.

"Dinner ready?' he asked of the man who opened the door to him.

"Waiting for master, Sir. Shall I tell the cook to send it up at once?"

"Where is your mistress?"

"My mistress is dressing, Sir. She had an early dinner at three o'clock."

Mr. Frost walked into the dining-room, bidding the man tell his mistress directly. He threw himself into a chair, and sat still, with a gloomy face. The complex lines in his forehead were twisted and knotted tightly together.

He had got half-way through his solitary repast, eating little, but drinking a good deal, in a feverish way, when the door opened, and his wife came into the room.

She was in full evening costume. A rich silk dress, of the brownish-golden hue of ripe wheat, enhanced the clear paleness of her skin. The dress was simple in fashion, as became a matron of large figure of its wearer. Its only ornament was a trimming of white lace round the sleeves and bosom. But the lace was splendid and of the costliest. In her dark wavy hair she had placed a branch of crimson pomegranate flowers, and on one marble-white arm she wore a broad thick band of gold with a magnificent opal set in the midst of it.

"Why, Sidney, love, Sidney!" she said, not looking at him though, but walking straight toward a large mirror over the mantle-piece. She threw one hand over her back to her husband, contemplating her own image very calmly.

He raised his eyes and stealthily looked at her in the mirror.

"Where are you going?' he asked, surlily.

"You told me nothing about going out this evening."

"Oh yes, I did; but I might as well have omitted it. You never remember. I am going to the Academy. Kitt sings delightfully, and the Maxwells made me promise not to fail them.

Mr. Frost sat looking at his beautiful wife with a strange expression of mingled discontent and admiration.

Suddenly his face changed. "Turn round," he said, sharply. She obeyed leisurely.

"Let me look. Is it possible? Yes; you have—you have—taken that bracelet, despite all I said to you!"

"Why do you when the man showed it to me that I must have it. It is the finest single opal I ever saw."

Mr. Frost dashed his hand down on the table with an oath. "By Heaven, it is not Mat," he cried. "It is incredible! Georgina, I wonder, upon my soul I do, that you can have the heart to go out in this way!"

Mrs. Frost looked down at him with a slow Juno-like turn of the throat.

"Don't be silly, Sidney. What is the use of your getting into passions? Nothing would go either with this dress or my black velvet but opals. And what matches the ear-drops is the set."

"And how, pray, do you imagine I am to pay for this jewelry?"

Mrs. Frost shrugged her shoulders.

"How should I know? How you are to pay for it is your business, not mine! When you married me I suppose you were aware of the responsibilities you were undertaking! Oh, is the carriage below? Tell him to drive first to Lady Maxwell's, Edward. And—ask my maid for the ermine cloak to put into the carriage in case I should want it coming home."

He walked angrily up and down the room after she was gone; beneking out now and again into bitterest sentences and ejaculations.

"I will not stand it; I will not. Heavens and earth! To think of her coolly taking that opal, whose follow it would be difficult to find in London, as though it were a glass bead! She cares no more for me than for the stone pavement she will tramp foot on! I am a money-machine. That's all! But it shall come to an end. I can not live so. I will not. Why should I grind my very soul out for a woman with no vestige of heart or feeling? I'll send her to live in the country. I'll sell her wardrobe by auction. Millions wouldn't suffice for her extravagance. I have told her that I don't know which way to turn for money—and people think me a rich man! Why, only this very week they say my wife decked out in finery worth a king's ransom. Good Heavens, that opal! To-morrow I will take the jewel after it back. She shall not keep it. It is too monstrous."

The next day Mrs. Frost, who occasionally made small concessions that cost her nothing, when it became apparent that she had roused her husband's indignation so far, offered to drive with him to Bedford Square and call on Mrs. Lovegrove.

As they drove along eastward—Mrs. Frost looking very lovely in a morning toilet, for the perfection of whose freshness and simplicity she had paid many a fashionable artiste dearly—Mrs. Lovegrove had ever expended on her finest gown—Mr. Frost lectured his wife as to the necessity of comporting herself with civility toward the Lovegroves.

"I'm sure I don't know how to conciliate Mrs. Lovegrove," said the fair Georgina, with, perhaps, by rigging myself out from top to toe in Tottenham Court Road, and arriving at her door in the dirtiest hackney-cab to be found. I really would have borrowed Davis's bonnet and shawl to come in, if I had thought of it; only, to be sure, Davis is three times more monied nearer the fashion than the Lovegrove women!"

Davis was Mrs. Frost's cook.

Mr. Frost went into his office, saying that he would open his letters and go up to pay his respects to Mrs. Lovegrove by-and-by. His wife was ushered into the drawing-room, and waited while her card was carried to the mistress of the house.

Mrs. Lovegrove's drawing-room was hot. The sun shone full in through the windows, and there was a large fire in the grate. There was a stuffy fragrance in the room from two enormous jars of pot-pourri which stood one on each side of a gilt cabinet. On the cabinet were ranged eleven china figures called her nick-knacks; namely, a huge dish of wax fruit under a glass cover; some Dresden figures; a Chinese mandarin in white chalet in card-board; two or three cups of eggshell porcelain; a statuette in the so-called Parian ware, representing a Spanish lady dressed entirely in lace flounces, and with a foot about the same length as her nose; and a blue satin box evidently for bon-bons.

The furniture was drab, with red satin stripes in it. The curtains were the same. The carpet was also drab, with splashy cabbage-roses all over it. On the mantle-piece stood a French clock, flanked on either side by a cut-glass lustre whose pendants primes jingled and shook whenever a foot crossed the floor. There was a grand piano in the room, dark and shining. There was also a harp muffled up in green baize. On the round centre-table, covered by a red velvet cloth, were disposed with geometrical accuracy several books. The middle of the table was occupied by a silver card-basket full of visiting-cards, on the top of which was conspicuously displayed a large, glaring, setting forth that Sir Thomas Dobbs and Lady Dobbs requested the honor of Mrs. and the Misses Lovegrove's company at a ball at Dobbs Castle two months hence.

Mrs. Frost waited. The house was very still. She sprang up once from a chair and looked at the two photograph albums. A third was a little volume of poetry containing verses in celebration of the marriage of Mary, which the Poetess herself looked on exclusively from an ecclesiastical point of view, and styled the "Month of Mary." There was likewise a keepsake, bound in red velvet.

Mrs. Frost waited. She had ensconced herself in a comfortable corner of the couch. It was hot, and the smell of it was like Mat. Frost fell into a doze, and woke with a sensation of being looked at.

Mrs. Lovegrove stood opposite to her.

Mrs. Lovegrove had a pale, smooth face, with a pale, smooth, and very high forehead. Her features were not uncomely. Her eyes must have been pretty in youth; well-shaped, and of a soft dove-gray. Her teeth were still sound and white. Her nose pointed a little, and her upper lip was too long for beauty. It gave one the idea, when her mouth was closed, of being stretched too tightly, in the effort to cover the long, prominent teeth.

Mrs. Lovegrove was lean and flat-chested. She wore a lead-colored merino gown, and a small cap with lead-colored satin ribbons. She affected drabs, and browns, and leaden or iron grays in her own attire. She said they were so chaste.

"How do you do, Mrs. Frost? I am so shocked to have kept you waiting. Your visit was such unexpected and rare favors that if I could have come instantly I would."

Mrs. Lovegrove spoke in a very low voice, and with polished distinctness.

"I almost fell asleep, I think," said Mrs. Frost, with much nonchalance.

"I am very sorry—"

"You were not in my gentleness, replied Mrs. Lovegrove, in her genteel and most distinct accents.

Mrs. Frost did not at all like to be told that she had been snoring. But as this is an accusation against which we are all helpless, save that in the nature of things we can not be conscious whether we have moved or not, she did not attempt to reverse it.

"Don't you think you keep your room rather—stuffy?" she said, wrinkling up her handsome nose.

"Stuffy? If I apprehend your meaning, I think not. You see, you live in one of those very lofty and airy houses which are built in the early weather-proof. No doubt you find some compensating advantage in doing so. But I confess that for myself I prefer a well-built, old-fashioned mansion. How is Mr. Frost?"

"Quite well, I believe. He said he was coming to wait upon me, I think."

"Is he quite well? Now is he? I am rejoiced to hear it. Mr. Lovegrove has been remarking that he looking pegged of late. We live in high-pressure times. The friction on a railway, for instance, is so much more tremendous than it used to be. Mr. Lovegrove's cough. And yet it may be doubted—Is any thing the matter?"

"No; I don't think you want to sneeze. How very pungent the stuff in those jars is! You could put snuff in it, I think."

"Snuff! My dear Mrs. Frost—!"

"I feel as though I had some grains of snuff in my nose."

"My pot-pourri is prepared after a recipe that was always used down at our family place."

"Ah!" said Mrs. Frost, yawning. "I dare say it is very nice when one gets a little—seasoned to it."

Then Mrs. Lovegrove led the conversation into her own ground. She discoursed of ritualism, of stoles, tapers, and censers. After these subjects came the British Constitution, collectively and individually. Thence, she slid easily to the immense number of invitations her girls had received this season. Then, from the ball-room bouche to the last, she spoke of their dear young friend, Miss Desmond, Lady Tallis-Gale's niece, and herself connected with some of our most ancient families.

"I am no leveler," said Mrs. Lovegrove, in a kind of self-deprecatory way (in which Mrs. Frost did say, "If I did but choose it, I could lay existing institutions as flat as a bowling-green!"), "No. I approve and reverence the distinctions of rank and birth. You may tell me that these are inborn prejudices—"

"Not at all," drawled Mrs. Frost, checking, but not concealing, a yawn.

"Well, I will not deny that there may be some tinge of self-prejudice. But when we lived at our family place papa always impressed on us that we were to consider the laboring persons who were above us in rank as we exacted from our inferiors. Papa was a staunch Tory of the old school, Mrs. Frost, and arrogated to birth. He used to say—Ah, here is Mr. Frost. How do you do, Mr. Frost? We were speaking—or, at least, I was speaking—of the old think your wife knows her—of our dear Miss Desmond. You can not think how the girls have taken to her. She is not lovely but as much as we could wish, though. For her attendance on Lady Tallis is most unremitting. But we feel we must keep her as a—as the say on Augustinus—!"

Well, do you know, I scarcely know how to describe the impression she never got! But I will do Augustine."

Mr. Frost smiled very graciously, and seemed much interested.

"We are going to have—I won't call it a party—a little social gathering, to which we have persuaded Miss Desmond to consent to sing at. Saint Cecilia's—that is, the newly-married couple have asked us. The Perrins, en route for Italy.

A little girl of five years old was exhibited as an "infant prodigy" not long ago in a large music-hall in England. She was but she was precocious only with several languages, could represent three hundred characters, and had a considerable number of poetical quotations. The poor victim was forced through her performances to the admiration of a numerous audience of fashionable people, who, probably, never thought to what cruelty they were thus accessory. Similar exhibitions were made in Spain and Germany. The forcing system to which many children, not "prodigies," are sacrificed, is a great and growing evil. To crush premature intellect with knowledge for show at examinations, for the sake of competition and for pride or sake, is both folly and wickedness.

An English journal states that after the death of Byron, at Mesolonghi, in 1832, his body was embalmed and sent to England, but the heart was begged and obtained by the Greeks, who inclosed it in a silver case. Four years later, after the protracted siege of Mesolonghi, a daughter of the heart was born to them, cut a way with great sacrifice of life through the Turkish lines; but the heart was lost in crossing the marshes.

A trip around the world can now be made in eighty days, though little pleasure could be experienced in such a hasty tour. A year is certainly little time enough to devote to such a journey. It is recommended that the traveler plan to be in Central and Southern China in November, India in December and January, Egypt in February, and Palestine and Syria in March and April, which will bring him to Europe, to travel northward up the Danube, or further east and Italy, with advancing seasons. By a diligent study of route, the trip can be made with ease and comfort, and enough seen to give one comprehensive idea of the other side of the globe. A low estimate of the probable amount required for fares, reckoned at gold rates, is $1500. Throughout the whole journey there are only a hundred and forty miles (the distance between Allahabad and Bombay) in which steam can not be used in assisting the transport; but a railway is being rapidly constructed which will connect these places, and then, truly, steam will have put a girdle round the earth.

The "Spider" is a novel invention recently patented, and will prove a useful addition to the toilet. Its object is to cleanse the ear pleasantly and safely, without the use of the hard instruments hitherto employed for that purpose. It is especially adapted to the nursery, and will be found useful in the social affairs.

A clergyman's daughter has recently obtained the royal license to publish a weekly newspaper in Norfolk, Sweden. She names it Miss Frederika Hains. The Swedish editress "can not only write her article, but set it up and work it off; and is, in fact, the practical director of the entire operation. She learned printing from a certain Miss Sidergvist, who is now in business as a printer in Stockholm, under the married name of Frau Fludh." Miss Sidergvist once edited and published a brace of papers in Arboga. Removing to Stockholm, Miss S. set up a printing-office, the present Frau Fludh, every sous of which was a woman. In addition to these, there are said to be others in Sweden carried on exclusively by females—one in Hudiksval and one in Carlstadland.

Armand de Pontmartin—whose real name is Dpon, only this was not euphonious enough for his purposes—is French journalist of singular ability and originality. The French wives persuade, in spite of remonstrance, but he was fond of spending money, and he never left his pocket. Seeing an article he had written was accepted by a prominent journal. He was an article on the Deluge, and it so much attracted the editor that he printed it at once, merely to see what the public would say. The public were amazed, and the editor revised and enlarged the article and sent for Dpon and asked him whether he was in the habit of looking at every thing else from the point of view of the Deluge. Dpon at once answered that to the best of his belief the views he took of the Deluge were those which of nearly all men other things in life, and he produced an article on the art of government. The editor took possession of the Deluge article, and it was even more astonishing than the paper on the Deluge, and from that day young Dpon's fate was secured and he styled an Armand de Beaupré, took rank in Paris as "un original." When Armand de Beaupré is at a loss for a subject he tells his readers he must spend himself an evening, where he lives, who are his friends, and how. Sometimes he writes at the office of his paper in a state of excitement verging on fury. He has been overcharged by a cabman, annoyed by the tailor, or worried by his mother-in-law. Then he sits with his eye dancing, and writes an article in which he pours forth his feelings in a fine horror into the soul of the offender. The editor nods approvingly at the article. Perhaps he would rather have had something else, but he knows the French public, and is quite aware that an article directed against a landowner, and wounding the feelings of a journalist, will always please them better than a paper on the differential calculus or the international monetary convention.

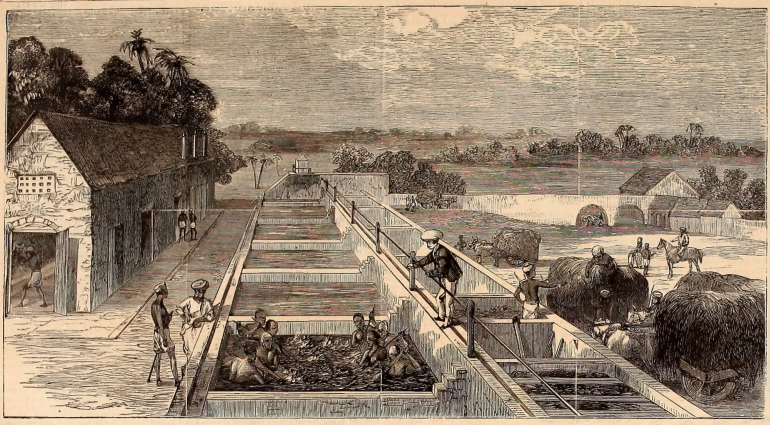
Sixteen hundred and thirty-five soldiers have been admitted to the Royal Victoria Hospital within the last six years, and of this total one-fifth died of disease of the heart. It is believed that this prevalence of heart disease is caused by the fashion of accoutrement, and that it is increasing. A new system of recruiting soldiers would prevent this sacrifice of life.

Lovers of coffee will not thank a French chemist, who for discovered that he believes that the caffeine of coffee is twice as poisonous as the theine of tea. Nevertheless, they will only increase their moderate pupils. Well, gradually most every thing we eat or drink will be discovered to be more or less poisonous, and black tea will only be a choice between evils.

Sir Samuel Baker, the well-known Egyptian explorer, writes from Egypt that his flotilla of steamers and boats is now waiting "at the Nile junction for Khartoum; that he has eight hundred camels waiting to convey the iron steamers and boats from England across the Desert to their destination, where they will be put together and employed in the navigation of the White Nyanza and other lakes. And that his own route will be from Suez to Souakim, thence across the Desert to Berber, and thence by the river to the rendezvous at Khartoum. Trading in some places, terrifying in others, and exploring wherever it can, Sir Samuel will be a most interesting pill of promise for the Royal Geographical Society, if only for the Khedive of Egypt.

Some of the latest applications of electricity are worth budgeting, as instances of our readiness to take a willing horse to death. We shall have literally, if not figuratively, ridden electricity to death when we apply it to destroy life; and the suggestion of the Russian army to kill only bees with bullets charged with gas and beast. Instead of the barbarous system of hanging offenders, a humane philosopher proposes that we should put them in an electrical chair, powerful enough to kill without pain. There is no denying the fitness of the punishment to the crime, and the fact is the law will not take human life by lightning, it might compel cattle slaying thereby; a butcher said would be far more effective, and far less cruel, tools than the pole-ax or the sticking-knife. The angler would consider his occupation gone if he did not work an electric line and a torpor-producing bait; yet the whaler has a notion that he can catch his monsters with an analogous plan. From experiments upon lesser fish, it is anticipated that a whale would be despatched by one shock as certain as from a modern battery carried in a boat, with the aid of a harpoon with double points connected with the battery conducting wires. The harpoon, upon striking the whale, would complete a circuit through its two points, and electrify the fish to torpor point, thus rendering his capture easy: at least, so the inventor says.

A disaffected wife has just eloped from Saratoga. She left the following epistle for her husband's consolation, which is indeed a literary model, to say the least: "Don't grieve; you have not earned as much money as you ought to and when I ask you for it I always say you must get any—body by dearest for this time."



INDIGO MANUFACTURE IN TIRHOOT, LOWER BENGAL.

INDIGO CULTURE IN BENGAL.

DURING the last three years the planters in the districts of Tirhoot and Champaran have experienced much inconvenience, and often great loss, as well as trouble, from the disaffection of the "ryots," or native peasantry. There are frequent disputes about the terms of the agreements made between these people and the capitalists who advance the money for the sowing of indigo. This question in Bengal is almost as difficult as the land-tenure question in Ireland. The manufacture of indigo, or nahsi, as it is called in the vernacular, commences about the first week in July, when the indigo is cut and carted into the factory. It is then steeped in vats from twelve to sixteen hours, the time which is calculated to be sufficient to extract the virtue of the plant. The water in which the plant has been steeped is next let off into a lower or "beating vat," where it is left to settle. The vat is now beaten off by eight or ten men, as shown in the illustration. The process of "beating off" (by which the grain is separated from the water) having been completed, the vat is left a sufficient time for the grain to sink to the bottom, when the water is gradually drawn off. The indigo settled at the bottom of the vat is transported to the "boiling-house," whence it is poured on to what is called the "table," where it is well strained; it is carried thence and placed in presses of about six feet square. All moisture having been extracted, the indigo is cut into square cakes and placed on shelves to dry, and at the end of the season it is packed and sent down to Calcutta for sale. The life of a resident indigo planter or manager is full of toil and anxiety, and he is frequently obliged to appeal to the magistrates to enforce the ryots' contracts.

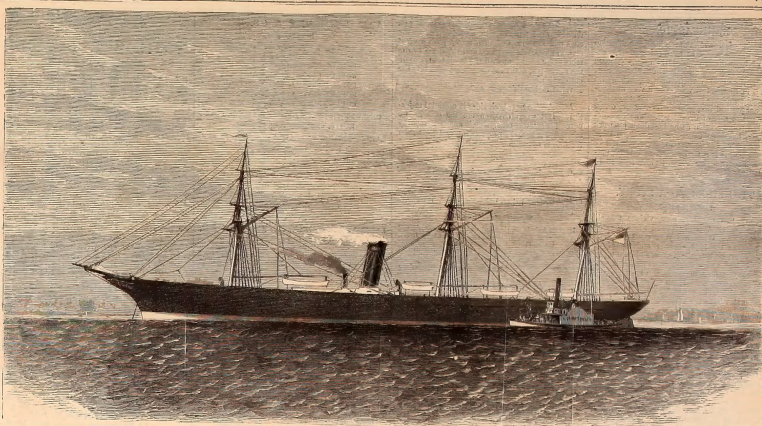
SMOKERS ON THE HIMALAYAS.

VARIOUS are the instruments that have been devised for smoking tobacco: some of them plain, others expensive and elaborate. But perhaps the most novel and curious method of enjoying the narcotic plant is that illustrated in our engraving on this page. This method is in vogue among travelers on the high table-land of Thibet and in the Himalaya Mountains. M. R. VON SCHLAGINTWEIT, the famous German traveler, gives the following description: "The inhabitants of the lower plains, when traveling in the mountains, have a peculiar mode of smoking. They can not indulge in this kind of luxury in their own homes, but have to postpone it till they come to the regions where a solid and compact glacier may be found. Then they proceed to dig or cut a hole three-fourths of an inch deep in the solid block, and at a distance of a few inches other holes one inch deep around, so that the largest hole is in the centre, and connect these by introducing a piece of iron wire underneath the ice, forming in this way so many funnels communicating with the hole in the centre. This is filled with tobacco and covered with ignited coals, and the smokers, lying down on blankets to keep off the cold, adapt their mouths to the various holes. In a short time they send forth enormous clouds of smoke, which, arriving ice cold, is charged with all the narcotic substance of the plant. The solidity of the glacier is such that only very little is melted, just enough to furnish a certain amount of humidity to the burning tobacco." M. SCHLAGINTWEIT assures us that all other modes of smoking are not worth mentioning in comparison with this, and that no instrument of any kind, invented to refine and enjoy the tobacco-smoke, can supply the place of the primitive but ingenious method adopted by the Penjab and Thibet natives.

"RUINED!"

THE drawing by MR. C. G. BUSH, from which our illustration on page 729 has been engraved, is a very pathetic illustration of the effect of extravagance or of speculation. How many such scenes as our artist has depicted were enacted just after the recent bursting of Wall Street bubbles! It is reported that the terrible disappointment experienced by daring gold brokers on the 24th of September has driven five or six of them to the insane asylum; but how many who were not made mad were driven to despair! How many, with their families, were utterly and irretrievably "ruined!"

SMOKERS ON THE HIMALAYAS.



THE NEW STEAMSHIP "CITY OF BRUSSELS."—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

THE "CITY OF BRUSSELS."

JAMES KENNEDY, COMMANDER.

THIS magnificent new iron steamship belongs to the Inman line. It is truly said of her that "she beats the Canadian," if we take her last trip as a test of her powers. She arrived in this port on the morning of October 23, her voyage across the Atlantic having occupied eight days and twelve hours, including three stoppages, caused by disarrangement of machinery.

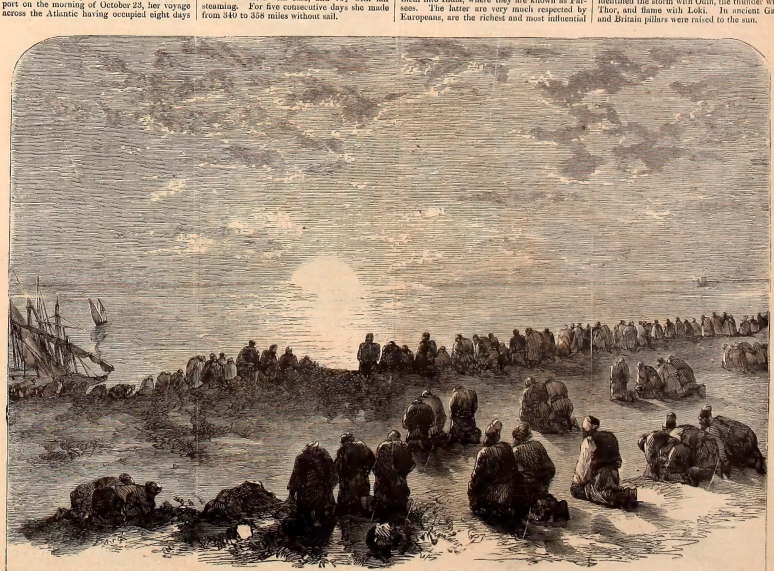
The City of Brussels was built on the Clyde, in Scotland. Her length is 406 feet; length of keel, 375 feet; beam, 40½ feet; and depth of hold, 28 feet. Her engines are of 600 horse-power, and her registered tonnage is 3000. She can comfortably provide for nearly one thousand passengers.

This steamship is fitted up in superb style. Her cabin is of oak, elaborately finished, and inlaid with gold; the seats are cushioned with plush, and the floor is carpeted with the finest of Brussels. The ladies' cabin is finished and furnished in a style even more superb. She makes 15 knots with ease, and 16½ with fair steaming. For five consecutive days she made from 340 to 358 miles without sail.

GUEBRES WORSHIPING THE SUN.

OUR illustration on this page recalls one of the earliest forms of nature-worship—one, however, which is still maintained among the Guebres of Persia and the Parsees of India. The term Guebre was applied by the Mohammedan conquerors of Persia to the disciples of ZOROASTER in that country. The Guebres now number about 100,000, dwelling chiefly in the city of Yezd and the province of Kerman. They are ignorant but industrious, and they bear a high character for virtue in comparison with other Persians. The persecutions which they suffered after the Mohammedan conquest drove a large number of them into India, where they are known as Parsees. The latter are very much respected by Europeans, are the richest and most influential of citizens in Bombay, and form about 115,000 of the population of Bombay and Colabba Islands. They do not worship idols, but revere the sun (and fire, as its symbol) as an emblem of the glory of the one Supreme Deity. They often build their temples over subterranean fires, one of their holiest spots being at Baku, on the shores of the Caspian Sea, where for ages, without interruption, flames have issued from calcareous rocks. The Parsees place their dead upon a latticed frame-work on the top of lofty towers. The birds of the air devour the corpses, and the bones fall underneath through the grating.

Every form of polytheism had its origin in nature-worship. Thus the ancient Norsemen identified the storm with ODIN, the thunder with Thor, and flame with Loki. In ancient Gaul and Britain pillars were raised to the sun.



GUEBRES PAYING HOMAGE TO THE SETTING SUN.

BENEFACTIONS.

The benefactor always retains some affection for the person whom he has benefited. No extent of ingratitude succeeds in utterly effacing this kindly feeling on the part of the benefactor.

Now, no doubt, a Swift or a Rochefoucauld would, in his cynical way, give a very unpleasant reading of this patent fact. But, in reality, it is a beautiful arrangement of Nature, or, as we ought to say, of Providence. The benefactor must, just in proportion as he has done his work lovingly, has his "exceeding great reward" in an increase of benignness; for there can not be a doubt that it is a far happier, and, if we may say so, a more divine thing, to love than to be loved.

TWO SIDES TO A STORY.

I.—OUR SIDE.

"WHY you naughty, ugly, vicious thing!" screamed nurse, "you've pulled the dishes all off the table. What will your mummer say? There—take that! [a shake]; and that!! [a slap]. Now, go away! You are always up to some mischief, and not as high as the table yet. I'll teach you how to meddle. But come—come. Don't cry so. Hush up or I'll tell your mummer. Here she comes. Sh—!

"Susan! what's the matter? Charlie, dear! what have you done? Come to me. There, don't cry; it's all over now. Susan, how did he do it?"

"Yes, mum, he did it; he's always up to some mischief; and it isn't my fault the best china is broke and the silver-coffee-pot hurled in just like a handbox that has been set on; and the coffee all over the floor, with the salt and sugar and the cream, what he's always, and I a watchin' of him all the time and never took my eyes off him, and then the minute my back was turned, he came and hitched the table-cloth, and off it comes, and all your nice set with it, and six pieces broke, and all done a purpose; and he's always a making of trouble when we don't know what he's about, nor can't guess, for he's as sly as a fox, and I knew he would, for I just took him away from there, and back he scrabbles again as fast as he could go, for he don't know no better, and he ought to be whipped and give him something to cry for, for I've told him not to touch the table a hundred times, and I'm glad of it, and I don't care if he is hurt, and—"

"Why, Susan! Susan!"

"And I don't, mum; and he might have been burned in such a minute ago, for I just took the chafing-dish off, and then what would have become of your new carpet? He will have his hand in every thing that's a going, and if there's nothing a going he'll set it a going, and he can't let it alone for the life of him, and he's just like his father, always trying experiments, and wondering how things would be if they was a little different from what they is, and trying of it on, and making a muss like his father has in the laboratory, what I don't like to see nor smell of nor any body else, and nothing but mischief comes of it, and I a picking up after him all day long like a chip of the old block as he is; and it's a great pity, too, for there as boys the clothes and clothes and things, only it's none of my business, and I don't care, only my new dress is all greased with the cream; but never mind me while he's a crying, for he did it right afore my very face and eyes, quick as a flash the minute I told him to come away."

"There, my dear—Charlie, my dear—hush! don't cry, you'll make me cry, too. Wipe your tears. Let me wipe them, and let me look into your eyes and see how it was."

"Look into my eye, mum—fiddle-sticks!—look into your coffee-pot and your china and my dress and your carpet. Look into his eyes! He did it a purpose, for he did. Look on the other way, and give him a spanking, say I!"

"Susan, be quiet. You are angry. Go down stairs."

Exit Susan, purple with rage.

II.—THEIR SIDE.

"Now, Charlie, look up. You have done some mischief."

So Charlie's eyes looked up, half tearful, half funny—inquisitive, but shy and sorrowful—and this is what his mother read in them.

Yes, mamma, I did it. But did I do it? I didn't know I could do such things. What a terrible crash! I looked up by the chair, and I walked as straight as I could over to that great high table. I didn't tumble down once. The table was covered with bright things which made my eyes like stars. I could not see what was on it because it is so high. Once I sat way up on top of a chair and saw things, and saw you put them in my mouth with papa and you. And papa took my finger and wet it in my mouth, and took it to something, and put it to my lips in my mouth again, and I eat my finger and it was sweet and good. So I wanted to see something; but my eyes only come up to the edge of the table. I stood on tip-toe, and I took hold of the dress of the table, just as I take hold of your dress when I want my dear mamma to take me up in her arms; but the table didn't take me up. So I pulled, and I pull on your dress when you don't attend; and the dress of the table began to grow longer, and come off. I thought that was funny, so I pulled again, and it came off some more; and then I saw the things all began to come toward me and look at me over the edge of the table. They did not fly away as the pigeons do when we go near them, but they came right toward me. This is such a queer world. I don't understand. So I pulled again, and all the knives and forks came tumbling down on the floor, just as you shovel me low to make my blocks tumble down again and again. Then Susan said, "There now—you do that again, if you dare!" So I pulled again, and down came the cups and saucers, and then Susan gave a great scream and frightened me, and the dress of the table came all off, and the table came with out of the coffee-pot, and I sat down backward into the butter-dish.

What makes things do so?

Moral—To hear both sides is essential to justice. But with children, except the culprits we never hear "the other side," unless Sympathy searches for it and interprets it; and even then the half is not told.

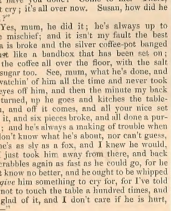
"THE UNLOVED WIFE," a very beautiful love story, from the pen of HELEN CORWIN FISHER, has just been commenced in that excellent literary paper, the NEW YORK WEEKLY. —[Com.]

Ir your hair is coming out or turning gray, do not despair over it any longer, as you can so easily avert. AYER'S HAIR VIGOR will remove the cause of your grief by restoring your hair to its natural color, and therewith your good looks and good nature.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HOME AGAIN.—Many of our citizens will be pleased to know that Dr. R. C. Foster, the well-known Electro-Thermochemist, is again in this city, and can now be consulted at his old Office, 49 Bond St., for nervous debility, loss of hair, unnatural redness of the nose, pimples, black worms, moth patches, freckles, tetters, and sores. No charge for consultation. Send for an interrogatory circular.

$7 SEWING MACHINE, combining durability, fine neatness, and beauty. An elegant Holiday Gift to a Lady. Simple and easy to operate. A Book of Instruction sent with each Machine. Orders promptly filled. No extra charge for delivery. Address STAR SEWING MACHINE CO., 111 Broadway, New York. Liberal discount to Agents.



We are now prepared to fill orders for our new low-priced double-reed Organ, "St. Paul."

The case is solid walnut, paneled, molded, and carved; has a finished solid-black walnut panel-top boards, and Knee Swell, and is more beautiful in design and finish than any instrument in the world for size. And we guarantee that the qualities and power of tone will be superior to any new reed organ of other makers. The instrument has two full Five-Octave sets of reeds, and contains six stops, viz.:

PRINCIPAL BASS,
DIAPASON BASS,
TREMOLO or VOX HUMANA,
PRINCIPAL TREBLE,
DIAPASON TREBLE,
DIVIDED SWELL.

Our Patent Graduated Swell is founded on the same as in our higher-priced instruments. The price is fixed at only $125, delivered on board cars at our factory. Orders will be recorded in regular succession, and filled each in its turn.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.
S. T. GORDON, Agent, New York.
JAMES BELLAK, Agent, Philadelphia.
Also the principal Music Dealers in each City and Town in the United States and British Provinces.

PATENT STEM-WINDING WATCHES.
COIN-SILVER HUNTING CASES, $31; EXTRA FINE, $38.
SOLID GOLD
Hunting-Case Full-Jeweled Lever Watches, $45, $48; EXTRA, $92.
Ladies' Size, $36; Extra, $40; Enameled, $46.
EXTRA, $40; Engraved, $46.
HUNTING CASES, $14; Extra Quality, $16.
AMERICAN MOVEMENTS.
Every variety. LEVERS, LEPINES, and RECORDS.
And Watches of every description, in fine Gold and Silver Cases, at Importers' Rates.
Goods sent by Express, to be paid for only after they have been received, examined, and accepted.
S. H. MOORE & CO.,
Nos. 52 & 54 John St., N. Y.
Full Descriptive Price-Lists sent free.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S
Establishment for the sale of
HOUSE FURNISHING
Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at 1172 Broadway, cor. 26th Street.
Also, Rubber Hydrant Hose, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Work of their own manufacture. Old household articles requiring Replating done on short notice. They are also prepared to contract for Roll Work and Speaking Tubes to Hotels and Private Dwellings.

THE MYSTERIOUS PUZZLE. A Great Remedy for Dyspepsia.
WALTER HOLT, 102 Nassau St., N. Y. Box 2338.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

A. T. STEWART & CO. have made
A GREAT REDUCTION IN PRICES
of
POPLIN SUITS to $10; value $14.
POPLIN SUITS to $14; value $20.
POPLIN SUITS to $18; value $22.
POPLIN SUITS to $20; value $25.
POPLIN SUITS to $25; value $30.
CHILDREN'S PLAID DELAINE AND POPLIN SUITS, at equally reduced prices.
LADIES' PRINTED DELAINE MORNING ROBES, $12 and upward.
POPLIN AND CASHMERE ROBES equally cheap.
Also, a Great Reduction in VELVET, CLOTH, AND ASTRAKHAN CLOAKS, LADIES' UNDERCLOTHING, and CHILDREN'S APPAREL,
with
LADIES' CHEMISES, SHIRTS, AND DRAWERS, $1 each and upward.
BROADWAY, FOURTH AVE., and TENTH ST.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
have opened
Invoices of New and Desirable
—NECKTIES AND SASHES,—
Embracing Choice and Recherche Designs never before exhibited.
Also, a full assortment of all qualities of
MILLINERY AND DRESS-TRIMMING RIBBONS,
At Popular Prices.
BROADWAY, FOURTH AVE., and TENTH ST.

The Companion is an eight-page weekly paper—practical in its character, wide-awake, and entertertaining.

It gives a great variety of reading, interesting alike to young and old—and has for contributors such writers as

Rev. Edward E. Hale, Harriet Beecher Stowe,
Mrs. Louisa Chandler Moulton, "Sophie May,"
Miss E. Stuart Phelps, Mrs. Helen O. Weeks, together with many other well-known and popular authors.

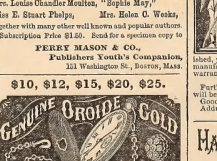
Subscription Price $1.50. Send for a specimen copy to

FERRY MASON & CO.,
Publishers Youth's Companion,
151 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

$10, $12, $15, $20, $25.



Watches and Imitation Brazilian and Australian Diamond Jewelry. Roller Gold Chains, $3 to $10 each. Call or send for Price-List.
JOSEPH POGGAS,
No. 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

AGENT: WANTED for our new work: sells fast. To all classes, without regard to politics, religion, or occupation. Now Ready

A new Handy-Book of Family Medicine. By GEORGE M. BEARD, A.M., M.D., late Professor in the University of the City of New York. This is new work, written up to date. Quackery, Humbug, and Old-Fogy Doctors opposed. Send for 16-page circular.
B. B. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 654 Broadway, N. Y.; TREAT & LILLEY, 117 So. Clark St., Chicago, Ill.

THE WONDER OF THE AGE!
THE GIANT recently unearthed near this city—Height, 10 Feet 2 Inches. Is it petrified, or a work of art? Pamphlet containing full information, also picture of the Wonder, mailed free for 25 cents. Agents supplied. Address
MASTERS & LEE, Drawer 65, Syracuse, N. Y.

$200 to $300 PER MONTH made by any man or woman with Rubber Sponging and Weather Strips for Doors and Windows. Instructions and Price-List of Materials furnished. ROLL BRASSFIELD, Boston, Mass.

Just Published.
NOVEMBER NUMBER
OF HITCHCOCK'S NEW
MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS:

CARLOTTA PATTI.....Portrait and Biography.
CARADORI ALLAN..... " "
STORY OF ZOROASTER.....By Andrew Ramsay.
THE FAIR AGE.....Editorial.
READ MUDGE WELL..... "
POPULAR MUSIC AT POPULAR PRICES..... "
GREATNESS..... " "
HOME, SWEET HOME.....By Waverly.
MCDONALD CLARKE..... " "
ART NOTES.....Special Contributor.
MUSICALS..... " "
DRAMATIC..... " "
POETICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.....Original.

MUSICAL.

DEAR HEARTH AND HOME.....By J. R. Thomas.
MY DARLING ONE, FOR THEE.....J. G. Meader.
MEADER'S PRAYER..... " "
"YOU GET" "YOU BET".....C. M. Currier.

Read what Moore's Zeural New-Yorker says:

"HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.—If the excellent taste which characterizes this first number of a new musical periodical is but a prelude of what is to come, then all publishers may rest assured of success. Handsomely illustrated, beautifully printed, and well edited, these fortnightly pages of literature will be interesting to lovers of music—such as biographies of MALIBRAN, CARADORI ALLAN, Musicians' Wives, and instrumental music, are very attractive and valuable."

This Magazine is sold by booksellers and newsdealers generally, and mailed to subscribers
at $3 per Year.
Specimen copies sent, postpaid, on receipt of 25 cents.
BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
24 Beekman Street, New York.

FURNITURE.
WARREN WARD & CO.,
Nos. 75 and 77 Spring St., corner Crosby.
ESTABLISHED 1808.
Wholesale and retail manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, and SPRING BEDS, &c., &c., suitable for city and country residences.
ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

LACE CURTAINS, Styles for 1870,—Made after our own designs, and not copied by no other house in America. Nottingham Lace Curtains, over one hundred different patterns, many of them now first introduced in this market.
Curtain Materials and Fashionable Coverings of Brocatelle, Rep, Terry, Damask, &c. Curtains and Lambrequins made to order. Manufacturers of Shawls, Cords, Gimps, Fringes, and Trimmings. Window Shades of all sizes on hand or made to order. Wholesale or retail. G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
No. 467 Broadway, between Howard and Grand Sts.
N. B.—FURNITURE STORE at No. 661 Broadway.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely in color from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived, and the subject of acute public attention of scientific men. The metal not only called forth the eulogiums of the press on account of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.
The improvement is now well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.
Prices from $18 to $36.
Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, gratis, on demand.
Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., with charges.
Address JULIUS D. RUGLIN YUILLMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1870.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, " " 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, " " 4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year..... $10 00; or any two for $7 00.
Postage is prepaid by the publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, OR BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five subscribers at $4 00 each. An extra copy of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.
Postage.—The postage which the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 52 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly or yearly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 52 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.
In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, as in case the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the owner.
☞ New Subscribers to either of Harper's Periodicals furnished from the present time to the close of 1870 for Four Dollars.
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Pages, $2 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.
Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Mrs. Fisher's New Story.

THE

UNLOVED

WIFE,

BY

Mrs. Helen Corwin Fisher,

WILL BE COMMENCED

IN THE

NEW YORK WEEKLY,

NUMBER TWO!

READY ON

Tuesday, November 9.

For Sale by Every News Agent.

Specimen Numbers Sent Free.

STREET & SMITH,

55 Fulton St., N.Y.

THE

Shivering Season.

It is impossible to suppose that any human being can consider an attack of Fever and Ague a light visitation. And yet thousands act as if such a calamity was of no consequence; while thousands who are actually suffering from the distressing complaint neglect to adopt the certain means of cure. It ought to be known in every locality subject to this scourge, of which is infested with remittent fever, or any other epidemic produced by malaria, that

HOSTETTER'S

STOMACH BITTERS.

taken in advance or at the commencement of the unhealthy season, will fortify the system against the atmospheric poison which generates these distempers. This admirable invigorant—harmless, agreeable, and possessing rarer medicinal virtues than any other tonic at present known, will break up the paroxysms of Intermittent or remittent fever in from forty-eight hours to ten days. Such is the universal testimony from districts where periodical fevers have been combatted with this powerful vegetable Analeptic, and a thievish neighborhood wise men bar their doors and windows, yet strange to say, if the same neighborhood happens to be pervaded by aerial poisons, they seldom take the trouble to put their bodies in a state of defense against the malarious enemy. Shivering victims are deavoring in vain to warm your blue hands over the fire, or consensing with the fever that follows the chill, remember that is an absolute, speedy, and infallible specific for your distressing malady.

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!

NORTON'S REMEDY FOR CATARRH

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It consists of the alternate inhalation of two harmless liquids—they are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing and powerful curatives. Relief and comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in the course of time. It possesses through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at its fountain head—removes all the worst symptoms, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat, "cold in the head," sneezing, dizziness, loss of memory, dimness of vision, and restores the sense of taste and smell. It literally extinguishes the bottom-some malady in all its forms forever, and cures the most hopeless case known. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, office 11 Ann St., N. Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fulton, N. Y.

NASBY'S PAPER.

The Toledo Blade.

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns closely set, News from all parts of the World, Choice original and selected Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit and Humor; a Commercial Department, a Religious Department, a Young Folks' Department, and an Agricultural Department, all prepared expressly for the BLADE. It is the constant aim of the Proprietors to make the BLADE a truly National Newspaper—not a paper for the East, the West, the North, or the South, but for THE WHOLE COUNTRY.

PETROLEUM V. NASBY, P.M.

No humorous literature of the age has been more universally read and quoted than the letters of "PARSON NASBY." Aiming always at the correction of some evil, combining a profound philosophy and unanswerable arguments with the keenest wit and richest humor, the Confederate Roader Preacher has become famous wherever the English language is read. These letters are written exclusively for the BLADE, and will be continued regularly in its columns.

A NEW STORY.—MR. LOCKE (PETROLEUM V. NASBY), is now engaged on a new story, entitled "PAUL DENMAN; or, LOST AND SAVED," a Story of the Great Rebellion. This thrilling story will be published in the columns of the BLADE during the coming year, and of itself will be pronounced by every reader worth many times the subscription price of the paper.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten and upwards, $1 50 each, and an extra copy to every person getting up a Club.

PAY! PAY! PAY! We pay liberally, in Cash, all who assist us in extending the circulation of the BLADE.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent in every Post-Office in the United States. Send for our Special Circular to Agents.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Send for a copy, and if the name can be given us the address of a dozen or so of your friends, at as many different Post-Offices, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid. Address

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,

Toledo, Ohio.

FRENCH CLOCKS,

BRONZES,

FANCY GOODS,

MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,

Opera Glasses,

FINE WATCHES AND

JEWELRY,

PARIS AND VIENNA

NOVELTIES,

WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,

No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion, one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Maine.

FURNITURE.—New designs and new styles; low prices for first-class warranted goods. Original drawings and photographs sent free. Building dwellings with hard wood and furniture adapted to the style. Rooms and rooms, ready seasoned and steam-dried lumber used; none other will stand furnace heat. G. A. & H. BERGE,

661 Broadway, near Amity St.

N. B.—Certain and Furniture-Covering Store at No. 447 Broome.

KNOWS NO PARTY.

BUT GIVES THE NEWS OF ALL. READ IT.

NEW YORK OBSERVER.

$3 00 PER ANNUM.

SAMPLE COPIES SENT FREE.

SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

BOOSEY'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS. A Complete Catalogue sent gratis. Send free. Boosey's "Ballad Singer," the new Half-Dime Series of the Best Songs, Words and Music. Each specimen number mailed for Five Cents.—644 Broadway, N. Y.

MAPLE LEAVES, enlarged and improved. The best, the most popular, and the cheapest Magazine published. It will be sent from now to the end of 1870 for 50 cents. Send in your subscriptions without delay.

J. O. A. BUCHBACH, 102 Nassau St., New York.

"A GOOD BARGAIN!" "CHEAP READING".—A The October, November, and December Numbers, PICTORIAL BOOK OF ANECDOTE, HARPER'S —worth 90 cents—sent gratis to new subscribers who remit $3 for the volume for 1870, during October or November. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

FREE TO BOOK AGENTS.

We will send a handsome Prospectus of our New Illustrated Family Bible to any Book Agent, free of charge. Address NATIONAL PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

POCKET REVOLVERS. SIX Shooter. A neat, durable weapon: fourinch barrel. Price $3 by postpaid. Address S. G. AUSTIN, Essex, Mich.

$10, $20, $15, $25.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Oroide) These justly celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for true and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established, as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Horizontal Watches, $10, equal in appearance and for time to Gold Watches worth $100: Patent Jeweled Levers, $15, equal to $150 Gold ones: Full-Jeweled Levers, extra fine and superior finish, $20, equal to $200 Gold ones.

We have just commenced making a very fine American Watch, full jeweled, Patent Lever, chronometer balance, adjusted to heat, cold, and position, 5 patent dress winder, Chains, Collins Metal, $2 to $8. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

CALIFORNIA DIAMONDS.

We are now the sole importers of the California Diamonds. These are real stones of great brilliancy and hardness, and can not be distinguished from the genuine stones, even by good judges. They are particularly brilliant at night by artificial light, do not scratch or become dull by use, and retain their brilliancy for an indefinite time. The following are the prices:

Ladies' and Gents' Finger Rings, single stones,

one carat ..... $8 each

Gents' Pins, single stone, according to the size of the stone ..... $4 to $8

Ladies' Cluster Pins $7 50

Ladies' Cluster Earrings ..... $10 per pair.

TO CLUBS.—Where SIX watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free.

Goods sent by Express to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

S. W. GEERY,

IMPORTER,

Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,

Formerly J. & W. Geery. No. 73 Broadway,

Established in 1804. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been a special business of this house for years. My stock comprises some of the Oldest Liquors in the country.

Constantly on hand a large assortment of fine Cigars, appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

ROOT'S SCHOOL

FOR

THE CABINET ORGAN.

Containing Progressive Lessons, Studies, and Scales-Songs, Duets, Trios, and Quartets; Voluntaries, Interludes, and Alternative Basses, for the Parlor and Choir. A work of established popularity. Annual sale, 13,000.

By GEORGE F. ROOT.

Price $2 50. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston. CHARLES H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

WATERS'

NEW SCALE PIANOS.

With Iron Frame, Overstrung Scale and Agraffe Bridge.

Wholesale and Retail Warerooms, 481 Broadway.

The best manufactured. Warranted for 6 years. Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs. Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New 7-octave Pianos, $175 and upwards. Second-hand Pianos, $40 and upward. Monthly installments received. Warerooms, 481 Broadway, N.Y. HORACE WATERS.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, any person can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information, Newspaper Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of Type, Cuts, Borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 61 Murray Street, New York.

$50,000 worth of Furniture Covers, of the latest designs, manufactured to order, for sale at wholesale or retail, for less than gold cost. G. L. & J. S. BRETT & CO.,

Broadway, near Grand St.

AGENTS! AGENTS! AGENTS!

NOW I have it! Something New! Attractive! Valuable! Agents Wanted! Agents Wanted! What can Family wants! Something for Holidays! 100 more agents wanted at once. Quick sales! Large profits! A young lady makes $12 40 in one half day! Others can do the same! Sure! Honest premium gift enterprise! Send for my private circular. W. J. HOLLAND, Publisher, Springfield, Mass., or Chicago, Ill.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machines. The best machine in the world. Stitch alike on both sides. Fully warranted for five years. Circulars and terms free. Address

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR

PRIEST and NUN.

Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 1208 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WANTED AGENTS to sell the American Knitting Machine. Price $40. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine in use. Turned, knit, and 50,000 stitches per minute. Liberal inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair to a beautiful brown or black or Brown. Can be privately sent by mail for $1. For sale by Merchants & Druggists generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

A WATCH FREE.—given gratis to every live man who will act as agent in a new, light, honorable business, pays $30 a day. No gift enterprise, no humbug, no peddling dance. R. Maurice Kennedy & Co., Pittsburg, Pa.

BELLS! BELLS!! BELLS!!! FOR CHURCH, ACADEMY, FACTORY, &c., &c. Every Description. Bells at from $5 to $12. Large Bells within the reach of the poorest Church. Send for Circular.

W. L. & J. H. AUSTIN, Bells, Meriden, Conn.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS, Complete. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition, Complete in 8 vols., 12mo, Morocco Cloth, in Handsome Box. The set complete, in a neat case, $12 75.

ADAM BEDE.

THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.

FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER.

ROMOLA.

2.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By DR. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

3.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Kissing the Rod," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

4.

THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE, King of Naples and of Italy. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. Uniform with

ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES.

16mo, Cloth, $1 00 per volume.

CYRUS THE GREAT, DARIUS THE GREAT, XERXES, ALEXANDER THE GREAT, ROMULUS, HANNIBAL, PYRRHUS, JULIUS CÆSAR, CLEOPATRA, NERO, ALFRED THE GREAT, WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, RICHARD I., RICHARD II., RICHARD III., MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, QUEEN ELIZABETH, CHARLES I., CHARLES II., JOSEPHINE, MARIA ANTOINETTE, MADAME ROLAND, HENRY IV., PETER THE GREAT, FREDERICK THE GREAT, KING PHILIP, HERNANDO CORTEZ, MARGARET OF ANJOU, JOSEPH BONAPARTE.

6.

A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK; or, A County Family. A Novel. By the Author of "One of the Family," "Carlingford," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 882 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume. 1084 pages, large 8vo. Price in Cloth, gilt, $6 00; Sheep, $5 50; Full Roan, $8 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

8.

THE MINISTER'S WIFE. A Novel. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "Perpetual Curate," "Life of Edward Irving," "Brownlows," "Agnes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

9.

UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy: embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By THOMAS C. UPHAM, D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Bowdoin College. In Two Volumes. Vol. I.: Intellect. Vol. II.: Sensibilities and Will. 12mo, Cloth, $2 75 per volume.

10.

IN SILK ATTIRE. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "Love or Marriage?" 8vo, Paper, 60 cts.

11.

COUNTESS GISELA. A Novel. By E. MARLITT. Translated by A. Nahmer. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

12.

A GREEK GRAMMAR FOR BEGINNERS. By WILLIAM WATSON, Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages in the University of Georgia. 12mo, Cloth, $1 60.

13.

FOUND DEAD. A Novel. By the Author of "Carlingford's Year," "One of the Family," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

14.

FALSE COLORS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

15.

MOORE'S LETTERS AND JOURNALS OF LORD BYRON. The Letters and Journals of Lord Byron. With Notes of his Life. By THOMAS MOORE. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $4 00.

16.

CUICCIOLI'S LORD BYRON. My Recollections of Lord Byron, and of Part of the Literature of his Life. By the Countess GUICCIOLI. Translated by Hunter E. H. Jerningham. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 75.

17.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, $1 50.

18.

METAS FAUTH. A Novel. By the Author of "Sir Gibbie." 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

19.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:

New Edition, beautifully printed, with the Author's Latest Illustrations.

VANITY FAIR. 29 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 60 cts.

PENDENNIS. 179 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.

THE VIRGINIANS. 168 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE NEWCOMES. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. Portrait of Author and 64 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HENRY ESMOND and LOVEL THE WIDOWER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

20.

RHETORIC: a Text-Book, designed for Use in Schools and Colleges, and for Private Study. By DAVID B. HILL, LL.D., President of the Northwestern University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 60.

21.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

PEG WOFFINGTON, CHRISTIE JOHNSTONE, and other Stories. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

$25 A DAY.—35 new articles for Agents. $25 Samples free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

EVERY ONE send stamp for Circular of TIMES' Ink Recipes to R. G. WILLIAMS & Boston, Mass.

"THE EMPIRE IS PEACE!"

PARIS, Tuesday, Oct. 26, 6 P.M.

"The city has remained perfectly tranquil up to this hour. The threatened demonstration has not been made, and no disturbance whatever has occurred. The Emperor went out this afternoon in an open carriage, and drove through some of the principal streets."

The New Religious Weekly!

THE CHRISTIAN UNION.

A Weekly Unsectarian, Independent Journal, devoted to Religion, Morals, Reform, Foreign and Domestic News of the Church and the World, Literature, Science, Art, Agriculture, Trade, Finance, &c. &c.

And containing Household Stories, Walks with the Children, &c., &c. Enlivening contributions from

WELL-KNOWN AND EMINENT WRITERS,

TOGETHER WITH THE

EDITORIALS AND LECTURE-ROOM TALKS OF

HENRY WARD BEECHER,

A COMPLETE FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

This Journal will have for its highest aim the presentation of

ESSENTIAL CHRISTIAN TRUTH,

Advocating, in the spirit of love and liberty, the

FELLOWSHIP AND CO-OPERATION

OF CHRIST'S PEOPLE OF EVERY NAME.

ITS FORM:

SIXTEEN PAGES—Cut and Stitched, so convenient, both for use and preservation, as to be a great and special merit in its favor, apart from its superior literary attractions.

ITS CIRCULATION

MORE THAN DOUBLED

during the first month of Mr. Beecher's identification with its interests, and it is now making even more rapid strides forward. It is

THE COMING PAPER

FOR

CHRISTIAN FAMILIES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS!

ITS PRICE:

ONLY $2 50 PER YEAR,

Payable in advance;

and to all who subscribe now, for 1870, it will be sent for the remainder of the year FREE!

Sample copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp for postage.

J. B. FORD & CO., Publishers,

39 PARK ROW, N.Y.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the sleeping-room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. An electrician of nine years' skill, out a fallure proves that it is perfect, reliable, and satisfactory. Thousands who are using it testify to its merits, as will be seen by a pamphlet obtainable at the office. The public are cautioned against infringement either in using or vending. The law will be applied to all such cases. E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N.Y.

STEINWAY & SONS'

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT

PIANOS.

Recipients of the First Grand Gold Medal of Honor at the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867; the Grand Testimonial Medal of the Paris Société des Beaux Arts, in the same year; the Grand Honorary Gold Medal of Merit, with the Crown and Ribbon, from the King of Sweden and Norway, and the Academical Honors and Membership from the Royal Academies of Sciences and Arts at Berlin and Stockholm. And also of the First Prize Medal at the International Exhibition in London, 1862, together with thirty-five first-class Premiums in the United States.

Warerooms, Steinway Hall,

Nos. 109 and 111 East 14th Street, New York.

C. G. Gunther's Sons,

502—504 BROADWAY,

Offer a very Elegant Assortment of Novelties in

SEAL AND ASTRAKHAN SACQUES,

TURBANS,

Boas, Ties, &c.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

C. A. STEVENS & CO.,

40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

are offering

A choice selection of Diamonds, Pearls, Sapphires, and other Gems, mounted in the most artistic manner. Also, Fine Jewelry of every variety. Watches from the best American and European manufacturers.

Silver and Plated Ware, a choice selection constantly on hand.

Particular attention given to the Resetting of Diamonds, and the manufacture of Silver Ware for Testimonials and Weddings, from original designs.

AGENTS for the SALE OF WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO. of MARION, New Jersey. Send for Circular.

A First-Class Sewing Machine, worth $40,

GIVEN TO ANY PERSON

sending us forty subscribers for BRAINARD'S MUSICAL WORLD, at $1 00 each. A monthly magazine. Each number contains twenty pages of beautiful new music and interesting reading. Elegant premiums for clubs. Specimen copies, with a huge amount of choice music, send us receipt of ten cents.

S. BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, O.

CUFFROY'S COD LIVER DRAGEES

PERMEATIVE ESCULENT

PALATABLE

HEALTHY

NOT OBJECTIONABLE to the MOST DELICATE STOMACH.

PRICES.—Box of 60 Dragées, equal to one and a half pints of oil, 75 cents; box of 120 Dragées, $1 25; box of 240 Dragées, $2 00.

Physicians having cases where cod-liver oil is indicated, will obtain better results by the use of the Dragées than by any other form.

For full particulars, containing medical societies' reports, physicians' certificates, &c., &c., send for pamphlet to HOWARD, SOUTHERLAND, & CO., Wholesale Agents, 130 William Street, New York.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,

46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NYSON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMPSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KENNEDY BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; S. M. MERRIN, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. E. JACOBS, Sandusky, Ohio; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; H. D. MUSSON, Zanesville, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; C. BICHUR, Pittsburgh, Pa.; L. B. POWER, Scranton, Pa.; CLEGG & SON, Albany and Troy, N.Y.; J. F. HANFORD, Rochester, N.Y.; H. S. MAGUIR, Rochester, N.Y.; H. UTLEY, Buffalo, N.Y.; REDINGTON & HOWE, Syracuse, N.Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; COREY BROS., Providence, R.I.; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C.W.; E. PILKER & BRO., St. John, N.B.

THE latest novelty in Round Hats is the Tyrolean Felt Hat, for ladies, misses, and children. This coquettish little hat, of a wholly unique shape, has won unexampled popularity in England, and will be as eagerly adopted by American ladies. A large invoice, in various colors, has just been received by DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, 717 Broadway, who will be happy to show them to the readers of the Bazar and the trade in general. In lightness and elegance they are unsurpassed by any thing of the kind in market.—Harper's Bazar.

I. E. WALRAVEN,

No. 751 Broadway, N. Y.,

No. 719 Chestnut St., Phila.,

Importer of

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

LACE CURTAINS,

and LINENS.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and will not ravel, as it is locked apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

CAUTION.—Do not be induced upon by other parties pirating of worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

"PERFECTION"

Coffee-Pot.

(Patented June 1, 1869.)

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY,

DURABILITY,

and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,

SOLE MANUFACTURERS,

Wallingford, Conn.

Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N.Y.

Dr. JNO. V. BUETON'S

TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO in from one to three applications. Entirely vegetable in its nature, harmless, the strongest testimonials and assurances as a strengthening agent, as an excellent tonic and appetizer, enables the weakest to digest the heartiest food, makes sleep refreshing, and establishes robust health. Circulars and testimonials sent free. Thousands cured. Price Fifty cents per box, post free. An interesting treatise on the injurious effects of the use of Tobacco, and numerous testimonials, sent free to all applicants. Address

DR. T. E. ARNOTT, Jersey City, N.J.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.

[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

FISHERMEN!

TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,

☞ Send for Price-List. ☜ Baltimore, Md.

ALL WANTING FARMS.—Good soil, mild climate, Illinois Central Railroad. Address C. DELPHIN. Price $25 per Acre. The place is growing more attract than most any other place in the U. S. Thousands are settling. Address

CHARLES K. LANDIS, Vineland, New Jersey.

EDWARD SEARS'

ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,

Corner Nassau and Ann Streets, New York.

SENT POSTPAID ON RECEIPT OF PRICE.

SUGAR-COATED PILLS OF

COD-LIVER EXTRACT.

Cures COUGHS, COLDS, CONSUMPTION, &c.

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES

AT

UNION ADAMS & CO.

For Ladies.

Patent Merino Vests,

Patent Merino Drawers,

Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,

Fancy Merino Hosiery,

Kid ana Castor Gloves.

For Misses

Patent Merino Vests,

Patent Merino Drawers,

Patent Union Dresses,

Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,

Fancy Cashmere Hosiery,

Roman and Fancy Sashes

No. 637 Broadway.

PATENTS.—INVENTORS who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Twenty-three Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency.

A Pamphlet, containing full instructions to Inventors, is sent free. Address MUNN & CO.,

37 Park Row, New York.

AGENTS WANTED.—AGENTS WANTED, $75 to $200 per month, male and female, to sell the celebrated and original Cowdrey Lock-Stitch Sewing Machine, improved and perfected; it will hem, fell, stitch, tuck, bind, braid and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. For simplicity and durability, it has no rival. Do not here from any parties selling machines under the same name as ours, unless having a certificate of agency signed by us, as they are worthless Cast-Iron Machines.

For Circulars and Terms, apply to or address,

C. BOWERS & CO., 436 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS SOAP AND SAPOLIO

211 WASHINGTON STREET, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

have just published:

HARTWIG'S

Polar World.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postpaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $3 75.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each.

MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages

OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 32 pages.

MAGIC LANTERNS AND SLIDES, 126, 100 pp.

PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.

JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,

924 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

AGENTS.—ORIODE GOLD. AGENTS, $20 a day made easily. Oriode Gold Pen. Fountain Pen. Indestructible. Writes 2 years without a drop of ink. Sells like wildfire. 16-page Gold Sample box, 10 pens, for 75 cents postpaid; also other novelties. CITY NOVELTY CO., 404 Liberty St., Philadelphia, Pa.

STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS, and DISSOLVING VIEW APPARATUS, with the improved Calcium Light, for Public Exhibitions, Sunday Schools, &c. Large and elegant assortment, always attractive and pays well. Send for Catalogue.

T. H. MCALLISTER, Optician, 48 Nassau St., N.Y.

$10 PER DAY.—Wanted—Active, enterprising men, in every county in the United States, to sell an article required by every person. Useful, Attractive, Quick Sale. Business honorable and profitable. Address

S. J. BESTOR, Managing Agent, Hartford, Conn.

AGENTS WANTED for Willson's

School and Family Charts,

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. XIII.—No. 673.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

A POLITICAL DISCUSSION.

In the subjoined illustration our artist represents a characteristic group of freedmen in the streets of Richmond, engaged in the discussion of the political situation. It is by no means an unfamiliar scene. The colored men, knowing how intimately connected their race has been with the political conflicts of the last twenty years, with the origin of the rebellion, and with the problem of "reconstruction," naturally take a great interest in politics; and in some of the Southern States they hold the balance of power.

It will be seen, by a reference to our picture, that there is a difference of opinion. The woodsawyer, on the left, is doubtless a Conservative; his opponent, the white-washer, is a Republican; while the negro seated on the right is a silent auditor, ready to acquiesce in whichever opinion gains the mastery. The earnestness of the argument is shown in the countenances and in the attitude of the disputants and of their listener. The picture, considered simply as a work of art, has merits of a very high order. The action is natural, and each member of the group is given a distinct individuality. The treatment of the subject is not less happy than its selection.

THANKSGIVING.

Again the night-season of the natural year has come round to us—the time when, her fruits having been gathered up, the earth folds up and puts aside her green garments, and lays down to her winter's rest. At this time, when ripeness passes so quickly into decay, man snatches eagerly to secure for himself so much as he can of Nature's gifts. This work having been accomplished, he has leisure for reflection. He can now look upon the process, by which the dead earth gives us back manifold what we have lent her, as the yearly wonder of God. It is fitting that this should be the season of Thanksgiving. But not only the agriculturist finds this season an occasion of thanksgiving; the merchant and the manufacturer, also, have profited by the abundant harvests of the autumn. These are positive reasons for thanksgiving; but, besides these, we have to remember with gratitude that no great pestilence, no wasting famine, no destructive natural convulsion, no financial panic have visited us.

The illustrations which we publish this week on pages 744 and 745, apropos to this national festival, need no interpretation on our part. That on page 744 is a typical representation of the season and of the occasions for thanksgiving. The engraving on page 745, "Uncle Sam's Thanksgiving," represents the larger and more cosmopolitan features of the occasion.

SEMI-DETACHED WIVES.

A married man, after a time, appears to forget how much a woman, and especially a woman who is a lady, desires small attentions to the very last. He seems to believe, at any rate, that his wife does not care for them at his hands. Women do not forget the season of courtship; and it would not be too much to say that an ideal marriage should be a constant courtship, or else the romantic theory of marriage falls to the ground altogether. But supposing a man marries a fool, and doesn't discover the fact for some time. Then it is well worth his while to try and improve the fool into a tolerable companion; for even a foolish wife can make herself excessively unpleasant to the wisest and most philosophic of husbands; and in successful cases the women will be grateful for the teaching. The man who wants to win his wife to at least sense (or nonsense) enough to love him has often all his work before him, even after he has placed the marital ring on her finger. She may then only be a semi-detached wife. We can give no definite recipe for the curative process. Circumstances would demand a constant change of ingredients. The shrew should be tamed, if possible, by soft means; but she should be tamed. The indifferent woman, with her soul occupied only with thoughts of the millinery hung upon her body, should—but we can not advise on these points, and, besides, it is more than probable that the balance of incompatibility inclines to the side of the husband. Women should not be difficult to win when once wed, although, strange to say, it has happened to many a woman to live and bear children to a man without a stronger feeling for him than one of duty or of gratitude, perhaps, for social consequence. For the men who like their wives semi-detached there is nothing to be said; there is no accounting for tastes, and it is possible at least to conceive a gentleman of cool disposition resenting the familiarities of a wife as a claim for privileges not contemplated by him when entering upon the married state. They run a risk if their wives are young, as there is sure to be a revolt sooner or later.

A POLITICAL DISCUSSION.

THE SPIRIT OF THE SOIL.

AGAIN through crisping fields she comes,
The Spirit of the Soil,
To bring to labor's peaceful homes
The fruits of trust and toil.

A mystery of earth and air,
Cool morns and noonday heat,
With sunlight in her golden hair,
And dusk her feet.

She stands beside the threshold stone:
His brow the father lifts;
He knows her by his faith alone,
The children, by her gifts.

"I bring the roots," she says, "whose length
Of downward thrust was stayed
By no cold night's unbroken strength
Below the reach of spade.

"They hold my life in every pore,
My health in ring and grain,
A fervor from earth's central core,
A coolness from the rain.

"I bring the vineyard's purple gift
From highroad trellis bars,
The orchard's, whose bowed branches lift
Their free hands to the stars.

"My blood has passed to clustered lobe
In drops of living wine;
The perfume of each dusky globe
The orchard bears is mine.

"I called the healing sun to lean
Above the mildew's death:
The wind that drew their flavors keen
Was wakened by my breath.

"I bring the yellow corn unopened,
The bean with purple eye,
The barley with its mighty beard,
The amber wheat and rye.

"I went before when stone and root
Were routed from the land;
I heard the plowman's muffled foot,
The sower's whispering hand.

"My strength, born of primeval rock,
Is given to ear and leaf;
I am the fullness of the shock,
The ripeness of the sheaf.

"I bring the nut whose guarded oil
Is every cracked cell;
There comes a night-time of the soil
Whose daytime it shall tell.

"I bring the seed of field and lea
That watch and wait no more;
The calm of heaven's ethereal sea
Whose ships have come to shore.

"I bring the glory of the woods,
The softness of the sun,
The tender sunlight that floods
A world whose work is done—

"A sense that now the earth and air
Withdraw the asking palm—
The sweet fulfilment of a prayer,
The answer of a psalm."

She dropped her treasures on the floor,
Her hands with labor bread,
And from the thankful toiler's door
Passed to her winter rest.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1869.

THE MEANING OF DEMOCRATIC SUCCESS.

THE result of the late election in New York suggests the question, what does Democratic success in this State mean?

It means, in the first place, an arbitrary discrimination against the equal political rights of the citizens of the State. The question was submitted whether the property qualification should be removed from a class of voters which, as a class, is in no way inferior in industry, intelligence, and good conduct to any other, and by Democratic votes the property qualification was continued. No one, however, was surprised that those votes were cast against equal rights; for as the Democratic policy ten years ago was the most stolid submission to the dictation of the slavery interest, so now it is a stupid effort to retain as much as possible of the taint which that system left upon our national character and professions. Every great measure looking to the extension of freedom and fair play in this country finds stubbornly resisted by the Democratic party. Every encroachment made upon the equal rights of innocent citizens has been the work of the Democratic party. In our history it will be known as the party of slavery: the party to which the ignorant and the prejudiced were sympathetically drawn, and which, under the name of Democracy, endeavored to obstruct liberty.

The Democratic success in this State means, in the second place, the maintenance of the power of a ring, of which the Governor, by the nomination upon the frauds and his signing the Erie Directors bill, is shown to be the instrument, and which places upon the bench of the Superior Court Mr. JOHN H. M'CUNN. The judicial bench is the last resort under the laws in a free government. What the character of American courts, what the fame of American judges would be, if the party which selects Mr. M'CUNN for one of the chief honors and responsibilities of the judiciary could place Mr. JOHN H. M'CUNNS upon all the benches of all the courts in the land, may be readily seen by contemplating the official career of that magistrate. If the judiciary of the city of New York is an honor to the State and a glory to the country—if it is not a by-word and a derision—if it is not understood that the bench is a market, that rich men may have what judgments they will, and the worst miscreants escape by the connivance of the judges—if its morals are not spotted even with suspicion, and its decisions every where profoundly respected, it is because of the men whom the Tammany Ring place upon the bench. Every vote cast for the Democratic party was cast for the power which has made the present renown of the New York city courts.

The Democratic success in this State means, in the third place, if it should be complete, and the Legislature in both branches should be of that party, the overthrow of the best parts of the present municipal government. The Metropolitan Police system is bitterly opposed by the Democrats. All the Commissions have been rigorously denounced by them, and they have sought power to restore the city, as they claim, to its own control. That is to say, the party following its policy and pledges will place in the hands of the Tammany Ring the control of all the great interests of the city—its police, its health, its Department, its Central Board, its Central Park. It may be presumed that a power which makes such judges as we see will make a corresponding police.

Whether the city shall be healthy, the personal safety, the security of property will be better cared for by the Tammany authorities, the experience and the testimony of other cities will declare. How long an election in the city will be possible which will not be morally invalid by the knowledge of a vast system of fraud, so long as those authorized to hold elections control, may be inferred from what the most unscrupulous Democratic paper in the country says of certain Tammany judges: "He can," says the editor, speaking of himself, "by what shameless and cunning frauds such corruptionists of the Ring as WILLIAM M. TWEED and ALEX. T. HALL OF BOSTON lie in hell the rightful vote of the electors of HORATIO SEYMOUR." A Democratic success means the ascendency of such persons in the political control of the State. Those who desire it, therefore, did wisely in co-operating with them at the election.

The Democratic success means, in the fourth place, a change in the Registry law, or the total abolition of a registry, in order that frauds at the polls may be facilitated and the Ring more surely held, with the hope of deciding the next Presidential election in the city of New York. No honest voter can object to a registry, because he is vitally interested in the integrity of the ballot-box. The more severely scrutinized the list of lawful voters, the more secure is the country. The Democratic party, always hostile to all methods for maintaining the purity of the ballot, will break down every barrier, and those who helped them at the polls may congratulate themselves upon the result.

These are some of the consequences of the continued Democratic success in the State of New York, and, although not new, they may be profitably studied by the country.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

THERE is one subject which should be very carefully considered by the Board of Education in this city, and that is compulsory education. Since Mr. Superintendent HENRY FRASER, who was sent out by the British Government to examine our school system, the school of this city have so high a reputation among those in both countries who are interested in the extension of education that the report of the Board which controls the schools will be very influential. If that compulsory system is necessary any where in the country, it is here in the city of New York; and, therefore, if action is to be taken upon it, it will be naturally begin here. The subject was considered in the late Constitutional Convention, and was therefore not new, but was quite fully discussed in the Committee upon Education. But it seemed to be the general sentiment that the time had not then arrived for action, and although Mr. FRASER, who made many valuable suggestions, and who introduced the admirable article upon bribery, which was incorporated in the new Constitution, upon the subject in the Convention, he had little support. The argument for compulsory education is perhaps nowhere more carefully considered than in a report of Dr. DUNCAN, the French minister of public instruction, in 1863, which contains an admirable survey of the European school systems. Mr. REID, the late Superintendent in this State, embodied many of the facts presented by M. DUBUY in the report to which we allude elsewhere. As a matter of fact it is found that in countries where school attendance is compulsory, as especially in Prussia, the conviction is in name only; nor would the repeal of the law now seriously affect the schools, so deeply rooted has the law made the habit of universal attendance. So elsewhere, as in Baden, although attendance is compulsory, fines are very infrequent. In Wurtemberg every child must attend school until the age of fourteen. The first and second time a boy plays truant he is punished himself; the third time his parents pay the penalty. Every army recruit is examined, and the parents are responsible if their son can not write well. In the United States, in Wurtemberg there is not a peasant, or a kitchen-maid, or a bar-maid who can not read, write, and cipher well. In the United States, to-day, there is probably a seventh of the whole population who can do neither.

The argument for compulsory education in this country is not for the police. The tax for public schools is justified by the necessity of general intelligence to the general order of society. We tax men cruelly for schools that we may not be heavily taxed for prisons; and as the tax is laid for the welfare of the community, and not of the individual, the community may properly say that the tax to be made effective for its purpose. As to the expediency of enforcing an undoubted right of this kind, it would seem to be tolerably clear that, if it be expedient to provide schools at all, it is equally expedient to take care that they are not provided in vain. But it is the universal testimony of those who are best informed upon the subject that the advantages of our free public school system are by no means what they ought to be, nor what they could readily be made to be.

At the late Educational Conference in Birmingham, in England, the expression of opinion was unanimous upon two points: first, that a system should be established to secure the education of every child in the kingdom; and, second, that every child shall be compelled to be educated. The word education was used to denote what we know as common school instruction. The Conference, therefore, agreed upon what may be called the common-sense view of the subject. It is to be hoped that the New York Board will seriously enter upon the question whether it is not its duty to take active and sufficient measures to secure the great purpose for which the people pay the school-tax.

SARMIENTO AND LOPEZ.

GENERAL M'MAHON, our late Minister to Paraguay, is reported to have given a very rosy view of the Dictator LOPEZ and of his "Republic;" and as the General was alleged to have stated that the atrocities of the allied army were incomparably greater than those of LOPEZ, the Secretary of the Argentine Legation in Washington has protested against the "gratuitous calumny, which, as it is, by anonymous publication." But the witnesses whose testimony concerning LOPEZ and Paraguay is as pointed as his knowledge is ample and his judgment accurate is SARMIENTO, now the President of the Argentine Republic. We recently spoke of this gentleman as the most prominent and hopeful figure in South America. His long residence in this country, his vital sympathy with popular government, and his careful and extensive study of its working in the United States, make him to speak upon this subject with an authority which, of course, General M'MAHON would not claim for himself.

In June, 1868, while the war in Paraguay was still dragging along, and when Mr. SARMIENTO was the Argentine Minister to the United States, he published a Paraguay and LOPEZ; and what he said is confirmed by the most intelligent of the foreign residents upon the Plate River with whom we have conversed. Mr. SARMIENTO says that of Paraguay is neither a republic, nor a monarchy, nor a tyranny, in the sense of power usurped from another. "The dictator LOPEZ received the government of the country from his father by a will; his father had taken possession of it after the death of FRANCIA, who had himself usurped it when the Jesuits were expelled. "Paraguay," says Mr. SARMIENTO, "is a plantation with a million of Indians instead of negroes, who consider themselves the property of the LOPEZ family, and fight for them because these chiefs fight against the white men whom they hate, and of whose character and civilized practices they know only through the LOPEZ family has allowed to enter the precincts of the country." So absolute is this authority that Captain FOSE mentions that even when the country was at peace the inhabitants of Assumption shut themselves in their houses at eleven o'clock in the day, at the command of the bell, that the South American might not be able to speak with any native. The Englishmen who were in the service of LOPEZ or Humaita were brought by him to defend the fortress in case of ill luck in the war of conquest which he was about to undertake, he having already seized the province of Matogrosso from Brazil and that of Corrientes from the Argentine Republic. The British Government sent a Commission to free the Englishmen whom he held, and LOPEZ refused to deliver them. One of them, who has served a long time in the country, has just published in London a history of the war, in which the character of LOPEZ is drawn in a very different manner from that which is attributed to General M'MAHON.

The Argentine Republic is allied with Brazil and Uruguay to defend itself against the conquest of LOPEZ. For having abolished slavery fifty years before we did, and being the seat of the most promising political and industrial activity in South America, that republic naturally recoils from subjection by a tyranny compared with which the most brutal known among the European races would be a blessing. "The triumph of LOPEZ," says Mr. SARMIENTO, "nearly two years ago, "means the extension to Uruguay and the Argentine Republic of the Guarini Indian despotism, under a master who is dictator, chief justice, judge, and lord of life and property." That these words truly describe LOPEZ no one who has investigated the subject doubts. Yet there are many influential papers in the United States which really seem to think that there is no choice between the parties in the Paraguayan war, and that an empire is going to crush a republic. Mr. SARMIENTO and LOPEZ are the good and evil genius of the La Plata region; and there can be no question to which of them the moral sympathies of the United States naturally belong.

THE GREAT PERIL.

WHEN the honest voters say where are stated that the ballots deposited in the box and the subsequent count do not correspond with the honest vote, the system of popular elections and the public peace are in peril. There is no practical difference between a free vote at Tammany Hall imposing their will upon the public by fraud and a man at the Tuileries imposing his will by force. Nor is there any intelligent and reflecting Democratic voter in the State of New York who does not know that his party leaders are responsible for the bulk of the monstrous election frauds, and that every one his votes at their bidding he is supporting a policy which must end in the total corruption of the government or in revolution.

That there are dishonest men in the Republican party, that there is cheating upon the Republican side, we do not doubt. But that is no reason for the honest men of the other party to deny against all knowledge and testimony that the great frauds are practiced by Democratic leaders for the advantage of the Democratic party. Nor can any intelligent man excuse his indifference to the subject by saying that both parties are equally guilty. For the man who does not know that the political planes of the Democratic party commend themselves to the most ignorant and worthless part of the population; is not aware of one of the most obvious and significant facts in our politics. He may go into any part of the country upon an election day and he will be sure to find that nine-tenths of the ballots which form the degraded part of the population vote the Democratic ticket, and that the more thrifty and intelligent the neighborhood the more positive is the Republican majority.

This is not chance. It has the deepest reason. Every district and ward in Maryland gives a Democratic majority. The same is probably true of Kentucky. They are the two especially Democratic States. Of course in the war their hearts were with the rebellion, for they in any chief point of social and progressive political communities superior to the great States of the Northwest? The two armies in this country are not equally worthless. Will any body pretend to designate a spot in which the Republicans have the same unqualified control that the Democrats have in the city of New York, where they are or can be justly accused of frauds so enormous as those which are matters of universal notoriety within the part of the Democratic leaders in this city?

During the twelve years, from 1856 to 1867 inclusive, the average annual number of naturalizations in New York was 16,000, yearly average of immigration from and including 1847 to 1860—a period of thirteen years—was 197,435; while for the four years, from 1860 to 1863 inclusive, the yearly average had fallen off nearly one-half. None who arrived later could be naturalized in 1868. But in that year three courts in the city—the Common Pleas, the Supreme, and the Superior—admitted a naturalization of 33,318—nearly four times the average of former years. And if to this be added the missing blanks, which, as every man practically familiar with the details of last year's elections knows, were used wherever they could be, the total naturalizations for the city of New York for 1868 was 60,386. Of the admitted certificates issued more than eighty-two per cent. were issued by two courts, the Superior and the Supreme. In the Supreme Court Judge GEORGE G. BARNARD was the only magistrate who naturalized. In the Superior Court a gentleman who examined the files of the certificates testified that about eight-ninths were signed by JOHN H. M'CUNN.

These were the facts. They were known at the time; but their extent was subsequently proved. The fraudulent papers were every where. They were sent by mail to those who had not applied, although the law requires the personal appearance of the applicant. And it was in the midst of this universal knowledge that GEORGE T. HOPPER, the Democratic Mayor of the city, and Democratic candidate for Governor, on the day before the election, issued a Proclamation bitterly denouncing the charges of fraud as gross and unfounded, and asserting that they were made to cover the fraudulent schemes of the Republicans. There was not an intelligent man in the city or its neighborhood who did not know that Mr. HOFFMAN'S statement was untrue. The frauds were known, and it was known that they had been perpetrated by Democratic agents. If proof were wanting after that collected by the Congressional Committee of Investigation, it is supplied by the volunteer evidence of the editor of the chief Democratic paper in the city, who has since described by name the present Mayor of the city, Mr. HALL, and one of the State Senators from the city, Mr. TWEED, as "corruptionists," and denounced their "shameless and cunning frauds."

It is already beginning to be understood that an election in the State of New York is not an appeal to the opinion of the people. It is simply registering the edicts of a few Democratic leaders, by such of the ballot-boxes, full or not then, nearly time for those who support the Democratic party because they do not like certain Republican men and measures, to ask themselves whether a party under such auspices an honest expression of the popular will becomes impossible is not necessarily and swiftly subverting the government?

EFFECT OF SELLING GOLD AND BUYING BONDS.

It appears that the public debt had been reduced from March 1, 1869, to November 1 about $64,332,070 65. This sum is mainly made up of purchases of bonds and their accrued interest. Nothing has been given by the Treasury that $11,000,000 of gold will be sold, and $10,000,000 of bonds purchased for November. The interesting financial question of the day is, What effect will this upward quotation of bonds by the United States by selling gold and purchasing bonds?

Ever since the breaking down of the attempt ed gold corner, the power of the Treasury in the absence of any European demand for balances, has become omnipotent. Owing to those large Treasury purchases of bonds the credit of the United States has been so strong that bonds are still purchased in foreign markets, and, owing to frequent sales of Treasury gold since the corner was broken, gold has steadily fallen. Speculators fear to become Bulls in gold, inasmuch as the movement on the longto-be-remembered Friday against their machinations was so sudden and effectual, and fear for a repetition of Treasury sales made on the instant, and without previous notice. With $110,000,000 of gold in the treasury—this was the amount on the 1st of November—no combination could be formed in now crippled Wall Street to meet the vast power of the Department. Every sale of bonds in Europe tells directly in putting down gold, inasmuch as the German brokers have, who make most of the sales—using the telegraph cable for the purpose —become instantaneous sellers of gold in our market to an equal extent. The great houses which do this business watch the respective markets for our bonds, which are ordinarily kept within $\frac{1}{2}$, and frequently within $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. of each other, and when there is a chance of profit sell or buy bonds according to circumstances. To facilitate transactions the foreign branch or agency is kept constantly supplied with bonds, which can instantly be delivered to the foreign purchaser. The payments for them abroad, or by cable transfer of funds here, permits an immediate sale of such gold in our market. On the 4th of November gold was sold at 126¼, and one of these transactions by a German house here, and profit ensued. These combined causes, the sale by the Treasury and by such banks as wished to depress gold on the 4th of November, although it had been announced in Wall Street that the Bank of England on that day had raised its rate of interest from 2½ to 3 per cent.—a circumstance that would ordinarily affect our market by raising the gold rate.

The price of the great staples which this country exports, as well as that of imported produce held here for sale, is affected generally in the proportion in which gold falls in our market. As far as concerns any breadstuffs and cotton purchased here by foreign agents for export, they are paid for in gold. The object of the seller is to obtain as much currency for his gold or for the exchange, which the transaction permits him to draw, as possible; and the lower the rate of gold, the smaller the returns in currency. Our breadstuffs are now depressed, inasmuch as the fall in gold, say from 135 or 140 to 126¼, reduces the quantity of currency received in the same proportion.

If the fall in gold were due to an equivalent improvement in the currency of the United States, no complaint could justly be made, as it would in that case be permanent; but it is apparent, as the currency remains undiminished in its volume of about seven hundred millions of dollars, that the sole depression for the fall is due to the combined influences referred to; and as the price of gold in our market must ultimately be ruled in great part by the amount of paper in circulation, there is no difficulty in deciding that the Treasury Department, which is now effectually controlling the market in that direction, must witness a reaction as soon as its influence is withdrawn, or in spite of that influence whenever the condition of finances abroad calls for balances held in this country.

The industrial interests of the United States are suffering severely from the fall in gold. These great interests are measured mainly as to price, which, measured by our paper circulation, must be considerably above the present market rate. The present maximum rate of affairs in this respect is wholly favorable to the foreign purchaser of our great staples, and of corresponding disadvantage to the producing interest of the United States. Undoubtedly from this cause many persons in the United States are benefited by low prices of our commodities—such, for instance, as labouring men and those who live on salaries; but the producers of wheat are not receiving remunerative prices, and hence it is held back in the States which most largely engage in this industry.

The price of wheat is not remunerative, because the expenses of its production are paid in depreciated currency, while the quotation to gold of, say, 140 to 100, and it is now sold on the basis of 127 to 100, in a currency which apparently has appreciated according to the proportionate difference. What is known as the home outlet of a fine region, is now quoted at from 63 to 95 cents per bushel, according to quality. The production this year will not exceed 15 bushels per acre. After deducting the seed-sown, the cost of plowing, sowing, reaping, living, hauling to market, risk of collection, and, beyond all, the interest on the capital invested in wheat-producing qualities in the soil, and the price is not sufficient.

The interests of the producers of the country are best promoted by a permanent rate for gold. The fact that the paper currency is a fixed quantity, and that the amount of gold in the Treasury and in circulation can be readily made favorable to a nearly uniform price; and were it not for the shamelessness of a few gamblers in Wall Street, who hold in equal contempt public sentiment and public opinion, and the efforts of the Treasury Department, neither the excessive rise which depressed gamblers occasioned, nor the subsequent excessive fall which the Treasury occasioned, would have happened. A mean somewhere between these extremes would ultimately be reached and maintained until the people renew their machinery of mischief and plunder.

It must be evident that the condition of our industrial interests is dependent on the combination of the gamblers who can unite the largest number of bank officers and public officials in their schemes, is wholly unsafe; and that true policy requires the most effective measures for placing our affairs on more solid ground.

Although the reduction of the public debt from an amount a fraction over twenty-five hundred and twenty-five millions to an amount a fraction under twenty-four hundred and sixty-two millions is regarded with favor as indicating both the power and integrity of the people, yet it can not escape attention that the duties received from excessive imports—the latter occasioned by the sale of our bonds in Europe—constitute a large part of the sum for this payment, a resource which imprudence creates. The opportunity to use this exceptional contribution to the Treasury to withdraw from circulation a part of our war currency—continued on a war basis in peace—was denied by Mr. HOOPER'S bill, and by an act of Congress, passed in the interests of those who demand a vitiated and depraved financial system.

But our object was not so much to show that Mr. HOOPER has deemed himself driven on to the adoption of a system which postponed a return to specie payments, as to present the effect of paper currency of gold below the level that it justly bears to our paper issues. The policy subjects the productions we export to the control of the foreigner at low prices, while at the same time the producer in this country is exposed to high prices in their creation. The policy, now that gold is reduced to 126-27, would enable the foreigner to procure money in a corresponding proportion. This alone will prevent those violent vicissitudes which, to business men, produce constant confusion and distraction.

KING PRIM.

THE Republican movement in Spain is suppressed, and the leaders are either executed or in exile. General PRIM declares himself a monarchist, and, although he is known by as truly, have declared himself a monarch, for such he seems really to be. The army is devoted to him, and although SERRANO is regent, the reality of power is with PRIM. This result makes him the most conspicuous of all recent revolutionary chiefs. A success so sudden and so vast as the peaceable overthrow of a great government and the supreme exaltation of a soldier has not been lately seen. The Cortes, charged of the Constituent element, has resumed its sessions, and the caucuses are vigorously balloting for a king.

The paralysis which fell upon the movement a few months since arose in great part undoubtedly from the uncertainty of the extent and force of the Republican sentiment. The bravest, the most powerful, and the most eloquent speeches in the Cortes had been those of CASTELLAR. They were essentially Republican, and it was difficult to measure the enthusiasm which they excited. On the other hand, the monarchical party could not agree upon a king, even had they been able to, and there was evidently a chaos of intrigue. Nobody seemed to command the situation. PRIM had apparently failed. Had there been one man to speak with a power which could be recognized by all, the later troubles would have been avoided. But no man had proved that power. The hot weather and the consequent doubt and inaction led the Cortes to adjourn. It was inevitable that the Republicans, who are always the bold and aggressive party, would attempt to obtain control of affairs; and in putting them down, and in announcing distinctly his political faith, PRIM, in whom the Cortes now sees the chief of the army, has become the recognized master of affairs, and the deliberations of the Cortes will now undoubtedly have some definite result.

It is fair to presume that a king will be elected, and minor questions of forms who he will be. It is plain enough who he ought to be. LET PRIM be king. He is identified with the revolution; he has proved his courage; he understands Spain and the Spaniards; he is as good a man for the purpose as has been proposed; and inasmuch as no one can be made king whom he does not approve, he will have power behind the throne, and might, therefore, as well be upon it. The glamour of royalty is gone. For a dozen years past the adventurers in Europe has been the nephew of the Corsican lieutenant of artillery. PRIM'S blood is as blue as NAPOLEON BONAPARTE'S; and now that royalty is every where in danger from the growing impotence of its representatives, why should not its original principle be summoned to justify the throne—and the regal qualities be conceded to him who can wield the regal power? When the CORTES declares for a monarchy, it means a permanent executive. If it summons the DUKE of MONTPENSIER, or any other Prince, or any weak puppet Don in Europe to the throne, it must know that it can not summon with him the royal train, the royal prestige, the royal sentiment, and can no more confer them on him than England could have been loyal to Prince ALBERT. It may respect him and trust him and fear him, but it may question and trust and treat a chief who is not of royal descent. What it wants is a king without royalty; and to satisfy that want General PRIM is essential.

Nothing certainly is gained by the present situation. The only excuse for a republican that the preference of the nation for a king should be consulted, or possibly that the spread of the republican sentiment should be perfected. But the manifestation of republican sentiment having been peremptorily suppressed and the monarchy assured, there should be no delay in selecting a monarch. But all the royal candidates have been long known, and none are satisfactory. None of them has exhibited the least enthusiasm in Spain, or has had more than an ordinary popularity. If Spain must have a monarchy, let her make a king to correspond. Viva King PRIM!

NOTES.

MR. CURTIN, who has been speaking in Russia and Bohemia, in the languages of those countries, is now in Moscow. CURTIN, the present United States Minister to Russia, but MR. JEREMIAH CURTIN, of Michigan, a graduate of Harvard, and late Secretary of Legation in Russia with Mr. CASSIUS M. CLAY. Mr. CURTIN'S knowledge of languages is very remarkable. When the RUSSIAN fleet was at New York, during the war, he made the acquaintance of the officers, and learned from them fluently in their own tongue, although he had never been out of this country. We believe it was at the instance of those officers that Mr. CURTIN went to Russia, where his skill and facility as a linguist, with his general ability and good character, promoted him to his responsible position—a precedent which we should be heartily glad to see constantly followed.

THE death of Mr. GEORGE PEABODY has occasioned every where the most friendly remarks upon his wide dispensation of riches. He had a good sense to be his own executor, and his good deeds will be always memorable. The universal testimonials to his virtues and his generosity showed perhaps an immense surprise that a rich man should be willing to part with his money; but it also shows the general feeling that to use with money in such ways is to put it to its noblest use. MR. PEABODY chose wisely for himself and happily for his fellow-men, and his name will be always kindly remembered.

GOVERNOR HOFFMAN gayly informs the people of the State that knowledge suddenly acquired is seldom profitable, but he is willing to tell us one thing, and that is that the success of Mr. SWEENEY, Mr. TWEED, Mr. HALL, and their associates secures the return of Democrats to our politics. The Legislature of these gentlemen, the Governor says, will contain no Democrats who can be bought, and the same kind guardians are going to take care of the interests of the many and not of the few. This is truly delightful. The whole Democratic line advances, and the Governor gives the inspiring cry, "TWEED and purity! HALL and principle! SWEENEY and self-sacrifice!" The gay Governor is emulous of the excellent Wickford Squires. "Here, boys!" cried that chief executive of Dorchester Hall, snatching his jug over the bluest of watered milk, "Here's richness!"

WE are not surprised to learn that the Rev. W. H. MICHAELS has met with the most gratifying success in his recent lectures at Steinway Hall, in this city. The subjects of his lectures on the evenings of the 2d and 4th instants were, "A Blind Man's Experience in Search of his Sight," and "What a Blind Man saw in Paris." At the first of these lectures GOVERNOR HOFFMAN presided. We understand that Mr. MICHAELS is prepared to repeat these lectures through the country during the present season.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

EXERCISES were held on the 3d in New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Maryland, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. The Democratic majority in New York city was reduced by about 20,000 on last year's vote. Greeley, in this city, ran ahead of SEYMOUR in 1868. Judge BRADY was elected Judge of the Supreme Court, and John H. MCCUNN, John J. FREEDMAN and James G. Spencer for judges of the Superior Court. Martin Kalbfleisch was elected Mayor of Brooklyn. Judge CHARLES J. MARTINE was elected Judge of the Court of Oyer and Terminer. The Senate contains 17 Democrats and 15 Republicans; the Assembly 68 Democrats and 60 Republicans.

Governor CLAFLIN was re-elected in Massachusetts, Chamberlain, the Labor Reform candidate, polled nearly 13,000 votes.

Governor CLAFLIN'S majority (Republican) in Worcester is about 10,000. The State will contain 30 majority in the Assembly will be small.

Governor AUSTIN'S majority (Republican) in Minnesota is about 1,000.

In New Jersey the Senate stands 13 Democrats to 8 Republicans, and the House 34 Democrats to 27 Republicans.

Illinois carries the Constitutional Convention for the Republicans.

In Maryland there was a light vote, and the Democrats carried every thing.

General BANKS took the oath of office preparatory to entering upon his duties as Secretary of War. NOVEMBER 3.

The diminution of the public debt during October was $2,305,000.

The Licking County Infirmary, an insane asylum in Ohio, was destroyed by fire October 30, and ten of the inmates were burned to death. NOV. 1.

The colored citizens of Baltimore and of the State of Maryland met with old celebrated Democracy of Emancipation with great enthusiasm.

The Rev. Dr. THOMAS H. SKINNER has sent out by the Evangelical Alliance of the United States, last spring, to the several branches of the Alliance in Belgium, Switzerland Street and Fifth Avenue in this city, he made a statement which he said he had received from one of the gentlemen in Britain, France, Holland, Germany, and Switzerland, that last large deputations of the most eminent divines and Christian philanthropists will come to the assembly of the Alliance Conference in New York.

The Rochester Theatre was destroyed by fire on the morning of November 4.

Hon. Reverdy Johnson, Senator, of the "Ironsides" Constitution frigate fine, died at Bordentown, New Jersey, on the 4th, aged 91 years.

Hon. Reverdy Johnson and wife will celebrate their golden wedding at their residence in Baltimore on Tuesday, the 16th inst.

FOREIGN NEWS

THE Italian Government, following the example of the Spanish Government, has issued a circular for the purpose of reject declarations of the Œcumenical Council opposed to the laws of the country and the spirit of the age.

Quite heavy earthquake shocks were experienced on the morning of November 2 in Constantinople, and particularly in Dormstadt, Wiesbaden, Mayence, and Frankfort.

The Spanish Cabinet has been in part reconstructed. MARTOS has been appointed Foreign Secretary, and PAYSEGOIS Minister of Finance. The Spanish Cortes has again adjourned without choosing a king. The division in this matter has affected the cabinet. Admiral TOPETE, Minister of the Navy, declares that the government will endeavor to fill the vacant seats in the Cortes by candidates favorable to the election of the Duke of Genoa to the throne.

The correspondent of the London Post writes as follows from Rome concerning the expected action of the Council: "The dogmatic definition of the assumption of the Virgin Mary will encounter no opposition. The Pope evidently desires the consecration of this dogma. The erection into a dogma of the assumption of the Virgin Mary is a favorite project cherished by its most ardent champions. The foundation of this project is the belief in the union of the two elements of a dogma, and belief in its necessity is not very general, but the unity of the Church requires it."

The Emperor of Austria arrived in Athens November 3, and was met by the King of Greece.

As we go to press tidings of the death of King VICTOR EMANUEL of Italy are hourly expected.

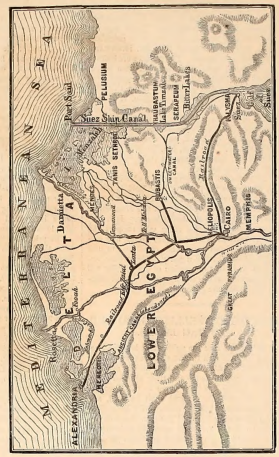
The Archbishop of Paris has issued a pastoral letter on the Œcumenical Council. It maintains that the Pontiff, Œcumenical is organized, independent of the question of the infallibility of the Pope without reference.

General Jordan, Adjutant-General of the Cuban army, writes to a friend in this country from Hayti:

"While we have no absolute need of foreign soldiers and will have to a limited extent to repulse the fruition, we do need supplies. As near as I am able to judge, we have 40,000 men with arms, ammunition, and if state in perfect sincerity that we could use immediately 100,000 men. We have not a foot of land under our hands could end this war in ninety days. We have not wished to employ more resources in attacking large cities—save ports I mean: because, even though every Spaniard in the island should be slain, of our trained soldiers, with a perfect knowledge that we could and would hold the ground, that we have no enemy to defend them against the Spanish navy. Foreign Principe and all interior towns we have so closely besieged that they are really of no avail to our enemy except the name of holding them. Our resources, ally are bounded by it, for in their attempts to send from supplies we destroy their value to them."

From St. Petersburg we learn that on the 31st of August, at Kischeneff, only part three of the Russian, a very alarming shock of earthquake was felt in and around Kischeneff, in Bessarabia. The shock destroyed not only the greater part of the houses in the town, but also those of the village of Banik.

M. FERDINAND DE LESSEPS, CHIEF PROMOTER OF THE SUEZ CANAL.—[SEE PAGE 748.]



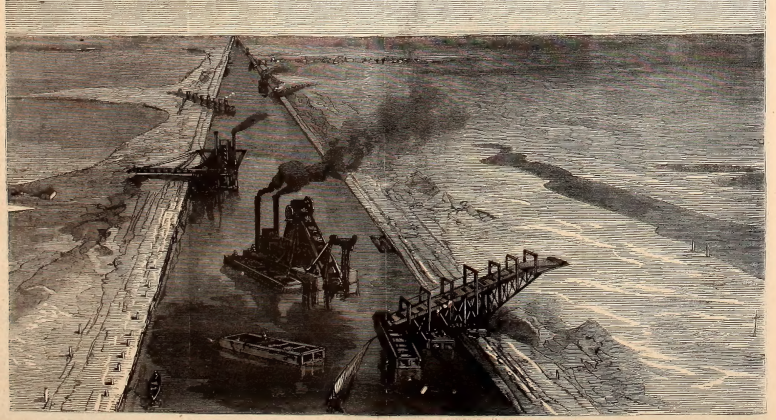
MAP OF THE SUEZ CANAL.—[SEE PAGE 748.]

HON. FREDERICK F. LOW.

PRESIDENT GRANT, on the 28th of September, appointed FREDERICK F. LOW, ex-Governor of California, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to China, to fill the position formerly occupied by J. ROSS BROWNE. It is said that the President, after deciding that the new minister ought to be appointed from California, showed to General SHERMAN a list of nominees, and that from these the General selected Mr. LOW as the best candidate for the position. It was certainly a wise selection.

Mr. LOW was in 1863 elected Governor of California by a majority of over 20,000 against ex-Governor JOHN G. DOWNEY, the Democratic candidate. He has always been identified with the Republican party of California, and during the war was an earnest supporter of President LINCOLN'S Administration. Mr. LOW has carefully studied China.

The appointment of Mr. LOW is eminently satisfactory to the people of the Pacific States. An evidence of its fitness in the eyes of our representative men is found in the dispatch sent to President GRANT September 29, signed by SCHUYLER COLFAX and some of the most prominent citizens of San Francisco. This dispatch expresses the satisfaction of the people of California with the President's appointment, as giving the nation a representative among the Chinese "whose ability and acquaintance with their customs, commerce, and industries will vindicate the fitness of his selection."



THE ISTHMUS OF SUEZ MARITIME CANAL, NEAR KANTARA.—[SEE PAGE 748.]

Faithfully yours
Wilkie Collins

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

PROLOGUE.—THE IRISH MARRIAGE.

Part the First.

THE VILLA AT HAMPSTEAD

I.

ON a summer's morning, between thirty and forty years ago, two girls were crying bitterly in the cabin of an East Indian passenger ship, bound outward, from Gravesend to Bombay.

They were both of the same age—eighteen. They had both, from childhood upward, been close and dear friends at the same school. They were now parting for the first time—and parting, it might be, for life.

The name of one was Blanche. The name of the other was Anne.

Both were the children of poor parents; both had been pupil-teachers at the school; and both were destined to earn their own bread. Personally speaking, and socially speaking, these were the only points of resemblance between them.

Blanche was passably attractive and passably intelligent, and no more. Anne was rarely beautiful and rarely endowed. Blanche's parents were worthy people, whose first consideration was to secure, at any sacrifice, the future well-being of their child. Anne's parents were heartless and depraved. Their one idea, in connection with their daughter, was to speculate on her beauty, and to turn her abilities to profitable account.

The girls were starting in life under widely different conditions. Blanche was going to India, to be governess in the household of a Judge, under care of the Judge's wife. Anne was to wait at home until the first opportunity offered of sending her cheaply to Milan. There, among strangers, she was to be perfected in the actress's and the singer's art; then to return to England, and make the fortune of her family on the lyric stage.

Such were the prospects of the two, as they sat together in the cabin of the Indiaman, locked fast in each other's arms, and crying bitterly. The whispered farewell talk exchanged between them—exaggerated and impulsive as girls' talk is apt to be—came honestly, in each case, straight from the heart.

"Blanche! you may be married in India. Make your husband bring you back to England."

"Anne! you may take a dislike to the stage. Come out to India if you do."

"In England or out of England, married or not married, we will meet, darling—if it's years hence—with all the old love between us; friends who help each other, sisters who trust each other, for life! Vow it, Blanche!"

"I vow it, Anne!"

"With all your heart and soul!"

"With all my heart and soul!"

The sails were spread to the wind; and the ship began to move in the water. It was necessary to appeal to the captain's authority before the girls could be parted. The captain interfered gently and firmly. "Come, my dear," he said, putting his arm round Anne; "you won't mind me? I have got a daughter of my own." Anne's head fell on the sailor's shoulder. He put her, with his own hands, into the shore-boat alongside. In five minutes more the ship had gathered way; the boat was at the landing-stage—and the girls had seen the last of each other for many a long year to come.

This was in the summer of eighteen hundred and thirty-one.

II.

Twenty-four years later—in the summer of eighteen hundred and fifty-five—there was a villa at Hampstead to be let furnished.

The house was still occupied by the persons who desired to let it. On the evening on which this scene opens a lady and two gentlemen were seated at the dinner-table. The lady had reached the mature age of forty-two. She was still a rarely beautiful woman. Her husband, some years younger than herself, faced her at the table, sitting silent and constrained, and never, even by accident, looking at his wife. The third person was a guest. The husband's name was Vanborough. The guest's name was Kendrew.

It was the end of the dinner. The fruit and the wine were on the table. Mr. Vanborough pushed the bottles in silence to Mr. Kendrew. The lady of the house looked round at the servant who was waiting, and said, "Tell the children to come in."

The door opened, and a girl twelve years old entered, leading by the hand a younger girl of five. They were both prettily dressed in white, with sashes of the same shade of light blue. But there was no family resemblance between them. The elder girl was frail and delicate, with a quick, sensitive face. The younger was light and florid, with round red cheeks and bright, saucy eyes—a charming little picture of happiness and health.

Mr. Kendrew looked inquiringly at the youngest of the two girls.

"Here is a young lady," he said, "who is a total stranger to me."

"If you had not been a total stranger yourself for a whole year past," answered Mrs. Vanborough, "you would never have made that confession. This is little Blanche—the only child of the dearest friend I have. When Blanche's mother and I last saw each other we were two poor school-girls beginning the world. My friend went to India, and married there late in life. You may have heard of her husband—the famous Indian officer, Sir Thomas Lundie? Yes: 'the rich Sir Thomas,' as you call him. Lady Lundie is now on her way back to England, for the first time since she left it—I am afraid to say how many years since. I expected her yesterday; I expect her to-day—she may come at any moment. We exchanged promises to meet, in the ship that took her to India—'vows' we called them in the dear old times. Imagine how changed we shall find each other when we do meet again at last!"

"In the mean time," said Mr. Kendrew, "your friend appears to have sent you her little daughter to represent her? It's a long journey for so young a traveler."

"A journey ordered by the doctors in India a year since," rejoined Mrs. Vanborough. "They said Blanche's health required English air. Sir Thomas was ill at the time, and his wife couldn't leave him. She had to send the child to England, and who should she send her to but me? Look at her now, and say if the English air hasn't agreed with her! We two mothers, Mr. Kendrew, seem literally to live again in our children. I have an only child. My friend has an only child. My daughter is little Anne—as I was. My friend's daughter is little Blanche—as she was. And, to crown it all, those two girls have taken the same fancy to each other which we took to each other in the by-gone days at school. One has often heard of hereditary hatred. Is there such a thing as hereditary love as well?"

Before the guest could answer, his attention was claimed by the master of the house.

"Kendrew," said Mr. Vanborough, "when you have had enough of domestic sentiment, suppose you take a glass of wine?"

The words were spoken with undisguised contempt of tone and manner. Mrs. Vanborough's color rose. She waited, and controlled the momentary irritation. When she spoke to her husband it was evidently with a wish to soothe and conciliate him.

"I am afraid, my dear, you are not well this evening?"

"I shall be better when those children have done cluttering with their knives and forks."

The girls were peeling fruit. The younger one went on. The elder stopped, and looked at her mother. Mrs. Vanborough beckoned to Blanche to come to her, and pointed toward the French window, opening to the floor.

"Would you like to eat your fruit in the garden, Blanche?"

"Yes," said Blanche, "if Anne will go with me."

Anne rose at once, and the two girls went away together into the garden, hand in hand. On their departure Mr. Kendrew wisely started a new subject. He referred to the letting of the house.

"The loss of the garden will be a sad loss to those two young ladies," he said. "It really seems to be a pity that you should be giving up this pretty place."

"Leaving the house is not the worst of the sacrifice," answered Mrs. Vanborough. "If John finds Hampstead too far for him from London, of course we must move. The only hardship that I complain of is the hardship of having the house to let."

Mr. Vanborough looked across the table, as ungraciously as possible, at his wife.

"What have you to do with it?" he asked.

Mrs. Vanborough tried to clear the conjugal horizon by a smile.

"My dear John," she said, gently, "you forget that, while you are at business, I am here all day. I can't help seeing the people who come to look at the house. Such people!" she continued, turning to Mr. Kendrew. "They distrust every thing from the scraper at the door to the chimneys on the roof. They force their way in at all hours. They ask all sorts of impudent questions—and they show you plainly that they don't mean to believe your answers, before you have time to make them. Some wretch of a woman says, 'Do you think the drains are right?'—and sniffs suspiciously, before I can say Yes. Some brute of a man asks, 'Are you quite sure this house is solidly built, ma'am?'—and jumps on the floor, at the full stretch of his legs, without waiting for me to reply. Nobody believes in our gravel soil and our south aspect. Nobody wants any of our improvements. The moment they hear of John's Artesian well, they look as if they never drank water. And, if they happen to pass my poultry-yard, they instantly lose all appreciation of the merits of a fresh egg!"

Mr. Kendrew laughed. "I have been through it all in my time," he said. "The people who want to take a house are the born enemies of the people who want to let a house. Odd—isn't it, Vanborough?"

Mr. Vanborough's sullen humor resisted his friend as obstinately as it had resisted his wife.

"I dare say," he answered. "I wasn't listening."

This time the tone was almost brutal. Mrs. Vanborough looked at her husband with unconcealed surprise and distress.

"John!" she said. "What can be the matter with you? Are you in pain?"

"A man may be anxious and worried, I suppose, without being actually in pain."

"I am sorry to hear you are worried. Is it business?"

"Yes—business."

"Consult Mr. Kendrew."

"I am waiting to consult him."

Mrs. Vanborough rose immediately. "Ring, dear," she said, "when you want coffee." As she passed her husband she stopped and laid her hand tenderly on his forehead. "I wish I could smooth out that frown!" she whispered. Mr. Vanbrugh impatiently shook his head. Mrs. Vanbrugh sighed as she turned to the door. Her husband called to her, before she could leave the room.

"IS THAT LADY YOUR WIFE?"

"Mind we are not interrupted!"

"I will do my best, John." She looked at Mr. Kendrew, holding the door open for her; and resumed, with an effort, her former lightness of tone. "But don't forget our 'born enemies!' Somebody may come, even at this hour of the evening, who wants to see the house."

The two gentlemen were left alone over their wine. There was a strong personal contrast between them. Mr. Vanbrugh was tall and large—a dashing, handsome man; with an energy in his face which all the world saw; with an inbred falseness under it which only a special observer could detect. Mr. Kendrew was short and light —slow and awkward in manner, except when absorbed in some question of science. Looking at something happened to concur with his character. his face, the world saw an ugly and undemonstrative little man. The special observer, penetrating under the surface, found a fine nature beneath, resting on a steady foundation of honor and truth.

Mr. Vanbrorugh opened the conversation.

"If you ever marry," he said, "don't be such a fool, Kendrew, as I have been. Don't take a wife from the stage."

"If I could get such a wife as yours," replied the other, "I would take her from the stage tomorrow. A beautiful woman, a clever woman, a woman of unblemished character, and a woman who truly loves you. Man alive! what do you want more?"

"I want a great deal more. I want a woman highly connected and highly bred—a woman who can receive the best society in England, and open her husband's way to a position in the world."

"A position in the world!" cried Mr. Kendrew. "Here is a man whose father has left him half a million of money—with the one condition annexed to it of taking his father's place at the head of one of the greatest engineering houses in England. And he talks about a position, as if he was a junior clerk in his own office! What on earth does position do for him, beyond what your ambition has already got?"

Mr. Vanbrorugh finished his glass of wine, and looked his friend steadily in the face.

"My ambition," he said, "sees a Parliamentary career, with a Peerage at the end of it—and with no obstacle in the way but my estimable wife."

Mr. Kendrew lifted his hand warningly. "Don't talk in that way," he said. "If you're joking—it's a joke I don't see. If you're in earnest—you have a suspicion on me which I would rather not feel. Let us change the subject."

"No! Let us have it out at once. What do you suspect?"

"I suspect you are getting tired of your wife."

"She is the best of wives, and I am thirty-five; and I have been married to her for thirteen years. You know all that—and you only accuse me of tired of her. Bless your innocence! Have you any thing more to say?"

"If you force me to it, I take the freedom of an old friend—and I say you are not treating her fairly. It's nearly two years since you broke up your establishment abroad, and came to live in England for the benefit of Mrs. Vanbrugh. With the exception of myself, and one or two other friends of former days, you have positively denied your wife to nobody. Your profession has smoothed the way for you into the best society. You never take your wife with you. You go out as if you were a single man. I have reason to know that you are actually believed to be a single man, among those new acquaintances of yours, in more than one quarter. Forgive me for speaking my mind bluntly—I say what I think. A woman, in your place, with your wife buried here, as if you were ashamed of her."

"I was ashamed of her."

"Vanbrugh!"

"Wait a little! you are not to have it all your own way, my good fellow. When we were both Thirteen years ago I fell in love with a handsome public singer, and married her. My father was angry with me; and I had to get my wife with her absent. I didn't matter, abroad. My father forgave me on his death-bed, and I had to bring her home again. It does matter, at home. I find myself, with a great career opening before me, tied to a woman whose relations are (as you well know) the lowest of the low. A woman without the slightest distinction of manner, or the slightest aspiration beyond her nursery and her kitchen, her piano and her dress. Is that a wife who can help me to make my place in society?—who can smooth my way through the obstacles and political obstacles, to the House of Lords? By Jupiter! if ever there was a woman to be 'buried' (as you call it), that woman is my wife. And, what's more, if you want the truth, it's because I can't bury her there that I'm going to leave her behind me. She has got a small knack of making acquaintances wherever she goes. She'll have a circle of friends about her if I leave her in this neighborhood to manage for herself. Friends who remember her as the famous opera-singer. Friends who will see her unwillingly assembled at a father (when the back is turned) coming drunk to the door to borrow money of her! I tell you, my marriage has wrecked my prospects. It's no use talking to me of my wife's virtues. She is a millstone round my neck, with all her virtues. If I had not been a born idiot I should have married a woman who would have been of some use to me—a woman with high connections."

Mr. Kendrew touched his friend's arm, and suddenly interrupted him.

"To come to the point," he said—"a woman like Lady Jane Parnell."

Mr. Vanbrorugh started. His eyes fell, for the first time, before the eyes of his friend.

"What do you know about Lady Jane?" he asked.

"Nothing. I don't move in Lady Jane's world—but I do go sometimes to the opera. I have you with her last night in her box; and I heard what was said in the stalls near me. You were openly spoken of as the favored man who was singled out from the rest by Lady Jane. Imagine what would happen if your wife heard that! You are wrong, Vanbrough—you are in every way wrong. You alarm, you distress, you disappoint me. I never sought this explanation—but now it has come, I won't shrink from it. Reconsider your conduct; reconsider what you have said to me—or you cannot see me or hear me again."

He poured himself out another glass of wine, and drank it at a draught before he replied.

"It's not so easy to tell you what I want," he said. "After the tone you have taken with me about my wife."

Mr. Kendrew looked surprised.

In Mrs. Vanbrorugh concerned in the matter?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Does she know about it?"

"No."

"Have you kept the thing a secret out of regard for her?"

"Yes."

"Have I any right to advise on it?"

"You have the right of an old friend."

"Then, why not tell me the whole truth?"

"There are some moments of embarrassment on Mr. Vanbrough's part.

"It will come better, he answered, "from a third person, when I expect here every minute. He is in possession of all the facts—and he is better able to state them than I am."

"Who is he?"

"My friend, Delamayn."

"Your lawyer?"

"No, my junior partner in the firm of Delamayn, Hawke, and Delamayn. Do you know him?"

"I am acquainted with him. His wife's family were friends of mine before he married. I don't like him."

"You're rather hard to please to-day! Delamayn is a rising man, is ever there was one yet. He has taken a fancy to me, and with cour-A man with a rising man before him, and with courage enough to pursue it. He is going to leave the firm, and try his luck at the Bar. There's body sure he will do great things. What's your objection to him?"

"I have no objection whatever. We must be personally acquainted before we dislike with, out knowing why. Without knowing why, I dislike Mr. Delamayn."

"Whatever you do, you must put up with him this evening. He will be here directly."

He was there at that moment. The servant announced "Mr. Delamayn."

III.

Externally speaking, the rising solicitor, who was going to try his luck at the Bar, looked like a man who was going to succeed there. He was young, his head was full of gray eyes, his thin, resolute lips, said plainly, in so many words, "I mean to get on in the world." His dress said it in its way. I mean to get on at your expense." Mr. Delamayn was habitually polite to every body—but he had never been known to waste a superfluous word to his dearest friend. A man of rare ability; a man of unblemished honor (as the common phrase goes); but not a man to be taken familiarly by the hand. You would never have borrowed money of him—but you would have trusted him with untold gold. Involved in private and personal troubles, you would have hesitated at asking him to help you. Involved in public and political troubles, you would have said, Here is my man. Sure to push his way—nobody could look at him and doubt it—sure to push his way.

Kendrew is an old friend of mine," said Mr. Vanbrough, addressing himself to the lawyer. "Whatever you have to say to me you may say before him. Will you have some wine?"

"No—thank you."

"Have you brought any news?"

"Yes."

"Have you got the written opinions of the two barristers?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because nothing of the sort is necessary. If the facts of the case are correctly stated there is not the slightest doubt about the law."

"I suppose that reply Mr. Delamayn took a written paper from his pocket, and spread it out on the table before him.

"Is that the brief?" asked Mr. Vanborough.

"The case relating to your marriage."

Mr. Vanbrough started, and showed the first tokens of interest in the proceedings which had escaped him yet. Mr. Delamayn looked at him for a moment—and went on.

"The case," he resumed, "as originally stated by you, and taken down in writing by our head-clerk."

Mr. Vanborough's temper began to show itself again.

"What have we got to do with that now?" he asked. "You have made your inquiries to prove the correctness of my statement—haven't you?"

"Yes."

"And you have found out that I am right?"

"I have found out that you are right—if the case is right. I wish to be sure that no mistake has occurred between you and the clerk. This is a very important matter. I am going to take the responsibility (of giving an opinion which I must expect to have serious consequences; and may be followed by serious consequences) and I want to assure myself that the opinion is given on a sound basis, first. I have some questions to ask you. Don't be impatient, if you please. They won't take long."

He referred to the manuscript, and put the first question.

"You were married at Inchmallock, in Ireland, Mr. Vanborough, thirteen years since?"

"Yes."

"Your wife—then Miss Anne Silvester—was a Roman Catholic?"

"Yes."

"Her father and mother were Roman Catholics?"

"They were."

"Your father and mother were Protestants? and you were baptized and brought up in the Church of England?"

"All right!"

"Miss Anne Silvester felt, and expressed, a strong repugnance to marrying you, because you and she belonged to different religious communities?"

"She did."

"You got over her objection by consenting to become a Roman Catholic, like herself?"

"I took the shortest way with her—and it didn't matter to me."

"You never formally received into the Roman Catholic Church?"

"I went through the whole ceremony."

"Abroad or at home?"

"Abroad."

"How long was it before the date of your marriage?"

"Six weeks before I was married."

Referring perpetually to the paper in his hand, Mr. Delamayn was especially careful in comparing that last answer with the answer given to the head-clerk.

"Those points," he said, and went on with his questions.

"The priest who married you was one Ambrose Hawke, a young man recently appointed to his clerical duties?"

"Yes."

"Did he ask if you were both Roman Catholics?"

"Yes."

"Did he ask any thing more?"

"No."

"Are you sure he never inquired whether you had both been Catholics for more than one year before you came to be married?"

"I am certain of it."

"He must have forgotten that part of his duty—or, being only a beginner, he may well have been ignorant of it altogether. Did neither you nor he take the risk of informing him on the point?"

"Neither I nor the lady knew there was any necessity for informing him."

Mr. Delamayn folded up the manuscript, and put it back in his pocket.

"Right, I am sure," in every particular."

Mr. Vanbrough's swarthy complexion slowly turned pale. He cast one furtive glance at Mr. Kendrew, and looked away again.

"Well," he said to the lawyer, "now for your opinion! What is the law?"

"The law," replied Mr. Delamayn, "is beyond all doubt or dispute. Your marriage with Miss Anne Silvester is no marriage at all."

Mr. Kendrew started to his feet.

"What do you mean?" he asked, sternly.

The rising solicitor lifted his eyebrows in polite surprise at Mr. Kendrew wanted information, why should Mr. Kendrew ask for it in that way? "Do you wish me to go into the law of the case?" he inquired.

"I do."

Mr. Delamayn stated the law, as that law still stands—to the disgrace of the English Legislature, and the English Nation.

"By the Irish Statute of George the Second," he said, "every marriage, celebrated by a English priest between two Protestants, or between a Protestant and any person who has been a Protestant within six months before the marriage, is declared null and void. And by two other Acts of the same reign such a celebration of marriage is made a felony on the part of the priest. The clergy in Ireland of other religious denominations have no concern with this law. But if we live in it" exclaimed Mr. Kendrew.

Mr. Delamayn smiled. He had outgrown the customary illusions of the time we live in.

"There are other instances in which the Irish marriage-law presents some curious anomalies," he went on. "It is a felony, as I have just told you, for a Roman Catholic priest to celebrate a marriage which may be lawful in every other country in Europe, between a Presbyterian minister, and a Non-conformist minister. A parochial clergyman may celebrate a marriage that may be lawfully celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest. And it is again felony (by yet another law) for a Presbyterian minister and a Non-conformist minister to celebrate a marriage which may be lawfully celebrated by a clergyman of the Established Church. An odd state of things. Foreigners might possibly think it a scandalous state of things. In this country, we don't appear to mind it. Returning to the present case, the results stand thus: Mr. Vanbrough is, in the eye of the law, a single man. Anne Silvester is a single woman; their child is illegitimate, and the Roman Catholic Redemptorist priest, Ambrose Redman, is liable to be tried and punished, as a felon, for marrying them."

"An infamous law!" said Mr. Kendrew.

"It is the law," returned Mr. Delamayn, as a sufficient answer to him.

Thus far not a word had escaped the master of the house. He sat with his lips fast closed and his eyes riveted on the table, thinking.

Mr. Kendrew turned to him, and broke the silence.

"Am I to understand," he asked, "that the advice you wanted from me related to this?"

"Yes."

"You mean to tell me that, foreseeing the present interview and the result to which it might lead, you felt any delicacy as to the course you were bound to take? Am I really to understand that you hesitate to set this dreadful mistake right, and to make the woman who is your wife in the sight of Heaven, your wife in the sight of the law?"

"If you choose to put it in that light," said Mr. Vanbrough; "if you won't consider—"

"I want a plain answer to my question—" yes, or no."

"Let me speak, will you! A man has a right to explain himself, I suppose?"

Mr. Kendrew stopped him by a gesture of disgust.

"I won't trouble you to explain yourself," he said. "I prefer to leave the house. You have given me a lesson, Sir, which I shall not forget. I find that one man may have known another from the days when they were both boys, and may have seen nothing but the false surface of him in all that time. I am ashamed of having ever been your friend. You are a stranger to me from this moment."

With those words he left the room.

"This is a cursedly hot-headed man," remarked Mr. Delamayn. "If you will allow me, I think I'll change my mind. I'll have a glass of wine."

Mr. Vanbrough rose to his feet without replying, and took a turn in the room impatiently. Seconded in his purpose—in intention, if not yet in act—the loss of the oldest friend he had in the world staggered him—for the moment.

"This is an awkward business, Delamayn," he said. "What would you advise me to do?"

Mr. Delamayn shook his head, and sipped his claret.

"I decline to advise you," he answered. "I take no responsibility, beyond the responsibility of stating the law as it stands, in your case."

Mr. Vanbrough sat down again at the table, to consider the alternative of asserting or not asserting his freedom from the marriage tie. He had not had much time thus far for turning the matter over in his mind. And for his residence on the Continent the question of the flaw in his marriage might no doubt have been raised long since. As matters were, the question had only taken its rise in a chance conversation with Mr. Delamayn in the summer of that year.

The alternative was a hard one to set silent, sipping his wine, and the husband sat silent, thinking his own thoughts. The first change that occurred in the scene was produced by the appearance of a servant in the dining-room.

Mr. Vanbrough looked up at the man with a sudden outbreak of anger.

"What do you want here?"

The man was a well-bred English servant. In other circumstances his machine, doing its duty impenetrably when it was once wound up. He had his words to speak—and he spoke them.

"Mrs. Vanbrough is at the door, Sir, who wishes to see the house."

"The house is not to be seen at this time of the evening."

The machine had a message to deliver—and delivered it.

"My lady desired me to present her apologies, Sir. I was to tell you she was much pressed for time. The agent has locked up the house desire's list—and her coachman is stupid about finding his way in strange places."

"Hold your tongue—and tell the lady to go to the devil!"

Mr. Delamayn interfered—partly in the interests of his client, partly in the interests of propriety.

"You attach some importance, I think, to letting this lady in as soon as possible?" he said.

"Of course I do!"

"Is it wise—on account of a momentary annoyance—to throw away an opportunity of laying your hand on a tenant?"

"Wise or not, it's an infernal nuisance to be disturbed by a stranger."

"Just as you please. I don't wish to interfere. I only wish to say—as the result of my knowing of my partner as your guest—that it will be no nuisance to me.

The servant impenetrably waited. Mr. Vanbrough impenetrably gave way.

"Very well. Let her in. Mind, if she comes here, she's only to look into the room, and go out again. If she wants to ask questions, she must go to the agent."

Mr. Delamayn interfered once more, in the interests, this time, of the lady of the house.

"Might it not be desirable," he suggested, "to consult Mrs. Vanborough before you quite decide?"

"Where's your mistress?"

"In the garden, or the paddock, Sir—I am not sure which."

"We can't send all over the grounds in search of her. Tell the house-maid—and show the lady in."

The servant withdrew. Mr. Delamayn helped himself to a second glass of wine.

"Excellent claret," he said. "Do you get it direct from Bordeaux?"

There was no answer. Mr. Vanbrough had returned to the contemplation of the alternative between freeing himself and remaining bound by the marriage tie. One of his elbows was on the table, he bit fiercely at his finger-nails. He muttered between his teeth, "What am I to do?"

A sound of rustling silk made itself gently audible in the passage outside. The door opened, and the lady who had come to see the house appeared in the dining-room.

IV.

She was tall and elegant; beautifully dressed, in the happiest combination of simplicity and splendor. A thick summer veil concealed her face. She lifted it, and made her apologies for disturbing the gentlemen over their wine, with the unaffected ease and grace of a highly-bred woman.

"Pray accept my excuses for this intrusion. I am ashamed to disturb you. One look at the room will be quite enough."

Thus far she had addressed Mr. Delamayn, who happened to be nearest to her. Leaning round the room her eye fell on Mr. Vanborough. She started, with a loud exclamation of astonishment. "You!" she said. "Good Heavens! who would have thought of meeting you here?"

Mr. Vanborough, on his side, stood petrified.

"Lady Jane!" he exclaimed. "It is impossible?"

She barely looked at her while she spoke. His eyes wandered guiltily toward the window which led into the garden. The situation was a terrible one—the discovery is the only word for it—for Lady Jane, or if Lady Jane discovered his wife. For the moment nobody was visible on the lawn. There was time, if the chance were taken, for there was time for him to get the visitor out of the house. The visitor, innocent of all knowledge of the truth, gayly offered him the hand.

"I believe in mesmerism for the first time," she said. "This is an instance of magnetic sympathy, Mr. Vanborough. An idea in the mind of mine wants a furnished house at Hampstead. I undertake to find one for her, and the day I select to make the discovery is the day you have for dining with a friend. A last house at Hampstead is on my list—and in that house I meet you. Astonishing!" She turned to Mr. Delamayn. "I presume I am addressing the owner of the house?" Before a word could be said by either of the gentlemen she noticed the cards. "What pretty grounds! Do I see a lady in the garden? I hope I have not driven her away." She looked round, and appealed to Mr. Vanborough. "Your friend's wife?" she asked, and, on the occasion, waited for a reply.

In Mr. Vanborough's situation what reply was possible?

Mrs. Vanborough was not only visible—but audible—in the garden; giving her orders to one of the out-of-door servants with the tone and manner which proclaimed the mistress of the house. Nothing was said, "She is not my friend's wife?" Female curiosity would inevitably put the next question, "Who is she?" Suppose he invented an explanation? The explanation would take time, and time would give his wife an opportunity of discovering Lady Jane. Seeing all these considerations in one breathless moment, Mr. Vanborough took the shortest and the boldest way out of the difficulty. He answered timidly by an affirmative inclination of the head, which dextrously turned Mrs. Vanborough into Mrs. Delamayn, without allowing Mr. Delamayn the opportunity of hearing it.

But the lawyer's eye was habitually watchful, and the lawyer saw him.

Mastering in a moment his first natural astonishment at the liberty taken with him, Mr. Delamayn drew the inevitable conclusion that there was something wrong, and that there was an attempt (not to be permitted for a moment) to mix him up in it. He advanced, resolute to contradict his client, to his client's own face.

The voluble Lady Jane interrupted him before he could open his lips.

"Might I ask one question? Is the aspect south? Of course it is! I ought to see by the sun that the aspect is south. The windows in other two are, I suppose, the only rooms on the ground-floor? And is it quiet? Of course it's quiet! A charming house. Far more likely to suit my friend than any I have seen yet. Will you give me the refusal of it till to-morrow?" There she stopped for breath, and found Mr. Delamayn his first opportunity of speaking to her.

"I beg your ladyship's pardon," he began. "I really——"

Mr. Vanborough—passing close behind him, and whispering as he passed—stopped the lawyer before he could say a word more.

"For God's sake, don't contradict me! My wife is coming this way!"

At the same moment (still supposing that Mr. Delamayn was the master of the house) Lady Jane entered on the charge.

"You appear to feel some hesitation," she said. "Do you want a reference?" She smiled satirically, and favored her friend to her aid. "Mr. Vanborough!"

Mr. Vanborough, steeling step by step nearer to the window, answered, come what might of it, on keeping his wife out of the room—neither heeded nor heard her. Lady Jane followed him, and struck him briskly on the shoulder with her parasol.

At that moment Mrs. Vanborough appeared on the garden side of the window.

"Am I in the way?" she asked, addressing her husband, after one steady look at Lady Jane. "This lady appears to be an old friend of yours."

There was a tone of sarcasm in that allusion to the parasol, which might develop into a tone of jealousy at a moment's notice.

Lady Jane was not in the least disconcerted. She had her double privilege of familiarity with the men, whom she liked—her privilege as a woman of high rank, and her privilege as a young widow. She bowed to Mrs. Vanborough with all the highly-finished politeness of the order to which she belonged.

"The lady of the house, I presume?" she said, with a gracious smile.

Mrs. Vanborough returned the bow coldly—entered the room first—and then answered, "Yes."

Lady Jane turned to Mr. Vanborough.

"Present me!" she said, submitting resignedly to the formalities of the middle classes.

Mr. Vanborough obeyed, without looking at his wife, and without mentioning his wife's name.

"Lady Jane Farnell," he said, passing over the introduction as rapidly as he could. "Let me see you to your carriage," he added, offering his arm. "I will take care that you have the refusal of the house. You may trust it all to me."

No! Lady Jane was accustomed to leave a favorable impression behind her wherever she went. It was a habit with her to be charming to widely different ways; to please. The social experience of the upper classes is, in England, an experience of universal welcome. Lady Jane declined to leave until she had thawed the icy reception of the lady of the house.

"I must repeat my apologies," she said to Mrs. Vanborough, "for coming at this inconvenient time. My intrusion appears to have sadly disturbed the two gentlemen. Mr. Vanborough looks as if he wished me at two hundred miles away. And as for your husband——" She stopped and glanced toward Mr. Delamayn. "Pardon me for speaking in the third person. I have not had the pleasure of knowing your husband's name."

In speechless astonishment Mrs. Vanborough's eyes followed the direction of Lady Jane's eye—and rested on the lawyer, personally a total stranger to her.

Mr. Delamayn, resolutely waiting his opportunity to speak, seized it once more—and held to his theme.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "There is some misunderstanding here, for which I am in no way responsible. I am not that lady's husband."

It was Lady Jane's turn to be astonished. She looked at the lawyer. Useless! Mr. Delamayn had set himself right—Mr. Delamayn declined to interfere further. He silently took a chair at the other end of the room. Lady Jane addressed Mr. Vanborough.

"Whatever the mistake may be," she said, "you are responsible for it. You certainly told me this lady was your friend's wife."

"What!!!" cried Mrs. Vanborough—loudly, sternly, incredulously.

The inbred pride of the great lady began to appear behind the thin outer veil of politeness that covered it.

"I will speak louder if you wish it," she said. "Mr. Vanborough told me you were that gentleman's wife."

Mr. Vanborough whispered fiercely to his wife through his clenched teeth.

"The whole thing is a mistake. Go into the garden again!"

Mrs. Vanborough's indignation was suspended for the moment in dread, as she saw the passion and the terror struggling in her husband's face.

"How you look at me!" she said. "How you speak to me!"

He only repeated, "Go into the garden!"

Lady Jane began to perceive, what the lawyer had discovered some minute since, that there was there was something wrong in the villa at Hampstead. She had found that there was a lady in an anomalous position of some kind. And as the house, to all appearance, belonged to Mr. Vanborough's friend, Mr. Delamayn, she resolved (in spite of his recent disclaimer) he in some way responsible for it. Arriving, naturally enough, at this erroneous conclusion, Lady Jane's curiosity rested for an instant on Mrs. Vanborough with a finely contemptuous expression of inquiry which would have overwhelmed any lady's maid in the land, and which was a study for a painter in its

WASHINGTON, October 8, 1869.

By the President of the United States:

THE year which is drawing to a close has been free from pestilence. Health has prevailed throughout the land. Abundant crops reward the labors of the husbandman. Commerce and manufactures have successfully prosecuted their peaceful paths. The mines and forests have yielded liberally. The nation has increased in wealth and in strength. Peace has prevailed, and its blessings have advanced every interest of the people in every part of the Union. Harmony and fraternal intercourse, restored, are obliterating the marks of the past conflict and estrangement. Burdens have been lightened, means increased. Civil and religious liberty are secured to every inhabitant of the land, whose soil is trod by none but freemen. It becomes a people thus favored to make acknowledgment to the Supreme Author, from whom such blessings flow, of their gratitude and their dependence; to render praise and thanksgiving for the same, and devoutly to implore the continuance of God's mercies.

Therefore I, ULYSSES S. GRANT, President of the United States, do recommend that Thursday, the eighteenth day of November next, be observed as a day of Thanksgiving and of praise and of prayer to Almighty God, the Creator and the Ruler of the Universe.

And, second, I do further recommend to all the people of the United States to assemble on that day in their accustomed places of public worship, and to unite in the homage and praise due to the bountiful Father of all mercy, and in fervent prayer for the continuance of the merciful blessings He has vouchsafed to us as a people.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed, this the fifth day of October, A.D. one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninety-fourth.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

THANKSGIVING, 1869.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

UNCLE SAM'S THANKSGIVING DINNER.

IN THE TROPICS.

THE SUN never best upon the coral reef,
But palm-trees bow their coronals of green,
Kissed by the soft southwest wind. Myriads
Of gold and purple plumaged orioles,
Of scarlet-crested, snowy-winged birds,
Dash, dazzling meteors of living fire,
Across the forest track.

The tiger sleeps,
Crafty and cruel-brooding, in his lair,
Waiting the veil of night, as Evil hides,
Shunning the bright rays of the glorious sun,
And batteuing on darkness. Crimson flowers
Hang from the creepers, where the boa lurks,
Coiling her deadly folds. His venomed eye
Fixed on the path beneath. The leopards crouch,
Half wekeful in the jungle: scene so fair,
At every wind footing increase—death!
Low the red sun declines; within the brake
The stealthy panther begins to stir,
The jackal sounds the prelude of attack,
To warn our lingering footsteps. Safety now
No longer sits upon the traveler;
But discord, rapine, and a thousand foes,
Gaunt-eyed, and crimson-fanged, and ravenous,
Rise into being 'neath the mask of Night.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book IX.

CHAPTER VI.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THERE letters from abroad had come to the vicarage. Mr. Levincourt burned them all, and said no word of them to any one.

One evening, when Mr. Plew returned from a round of professional visits, his mother put into his hand a large letter covered with foreign postmarks.

"Of course, Nathaniel," said the poor old woman, trembling'y watching his face, "I guess who it's from, and you would have nothing to say to her now, my dears, would you?"

"Mother!" gasped the little surgeon, clutching at the letter.

"There, there, Nathaniel, don't be angry with me, love. I have never said a wry word about the girl since you asked me, and I don't want to. But—of course I know you are a grown man" (Mr. Plew was three-and-forty), "and can act for yourself; but you know, Nathaniel, love, I'm the mother that bore you, and in some ways you'll always be a child to me—by, if you were a hundred." And it goes to my heart to see you badly treated by them that ain't worthy to—There, my dear, I've done."

Mr. Plew shut himself up in his little bedroom, and opened his letter.

His face, always anxious, all aglow with excitement, fell, and the light faded out of it. The bulky packet contained a sealed letter addressed to "Miss Veronica Beaumont." Within the outer envelope were written these words:

"I rely on you to convey the inclosed into Maud's hands. I think you will not fail me.

V."

Mr. Plew opened his shabby little writing-desk, took out a sheet of paper, warped the letter in it, sealed it, and directed it to Miss Desmond, No. 367 Gower Street, London.

Then he pressed the outer envelope to his lips, flushing a hot, painful crimson as he did so, and, finally, he sat down beside the bed, hid his face on the pillow, and cried.

The next day Maud received her letter. It ran as follows:

"I will begin with a warning. I warn you not to waste compassion and wailings and lamentations upon me. I desire, and need, no pity. I have chosen my fate, and the day may come, will come, when you will all acknowledge that I have chosen well. I have written to you once before, and twice to papa. Having received no answer, the idea occurred to me that papa had purposely kept it from you. I know he is full of twaddle—contamination, evil communications—must hold no parley with—I will not write the trash. But I now apply to you. Behave like a man.

"It may be, on the other hand, that you have received my letter, and have chosen to make no sign. If it be so, so be it. But I give you this chance, by directing the present letter to the care of Mr. Plew. I believe him to be a faithful creature, and I hope that Sir Alfred and myself may one day have it in our power to show him that we think so.

"The words 'Sir John and myself' made Maud recoil, when she read them, as though she had received a physical blow. The letter proceeded:

"You will, of course, be taught to think all evil of me, and to leave the paltry, vicious atmosphere of a place like Shipley. How I loathe the name of it! And it is, no doubt, true that I caused papa some temporary anxiety. I will be as brief. I left the letter on my toilet-table, and I conjectured that it could not long remain unseen. The letter, once read, ought to have been destroyed him. Sir John gave me weighty reasons for not wishing to make our marriage public at once. I was content to respect his secret. From the fact of papa having preserved an obstinate silence I am led to guess that he is nourishing resentment against me. I shall be sorry if this be so, but can stoop to no more entreaties.

"The knowledge of the position I shall one day hold in the eyes of all the world sustains me against the idea of passing misconstruction.

"Sir John is all kindness and consideration to me. I am surrounded by all the elegant luxuries that wealth can purchase or watchful affection suggest. I am traveling through exquisite scenery, and drawing near to my mother's native sunny land. I hate affectation of sentimentality, but, in truth, my heart beats faster as I look at the snowy peaks, and think 'beyond there lies Italy!' Direct to me, Poste Restante, Arona, Lago Maggiore. Within a fortnight we shall be there. Your letter must be addressed to Lady Gale.

"Your affectionate (if you will let it be so)

VERONICA.

"Maudie, Maudie, tell me how papa is. How you are. Love me, Maudie.

V."

The last few words were apparently added hurriedly. They were blurred and almost illegible. But Maud dwelt on them rather than on the rest of the letter. They showed her Veronica's heart was not dead, although her haughty spirit disdained sympathy or compassion.

Twice, three times, did Maud read the letter through her blinding tears before she laid it down on her lap, and fairly thought over its contents.

One conviction stood out clear in her mind—either Veronica was deceived or deceiving.

That she could have no right to the title of "Lady Gale" they in England knew but too well. But was it possible certain that Veronica knew it? Was it not much more probable that Sir John was continuing to deceive her? Might he not even have entered into a false ceremony of marriage? Such things had been!

Maud pondered and pondered. Suddenly she took a resolution. Come what might, she would answer Veronica's letter. It could not be right to leave her in ignorance of the real facts of the case. She would write to Veronica, and tell her then inclose Veronica's letter to Mr. Levincourt, and tell him what she had done. He might be angry, but in his heart he would thank her. He could not really desire to abandon his only child to shame and misery. It would be only just now to know the truth, and would leave that wicked man. She must!

Maud peeped into the drawing-room before entering, to see if little desk in her own room.

Lady Tallis was asleep on the sofa. She always slept regularly after luncheon. Maud, who always kept regularly after luncheon. Maud, who always kept regularly after luncheon. Maud, who always k

Tallis's flow of talk, said, hesitatingly, "Your niece, is it not?"

"Indeed and in truth she is my niece, Mr. Frost, and a great blessing and comfort it is to have her with me! Maud, my darling, this is Mrs. Frost. Mr. Frost, Miss Desmond."

Mr. Frost sat down beside the young lady and began to talk to her. He perceived at once that she was very different in every respect from her aunt. It was quite impossible to jump into terms of familiarity with Maud Desmond.

"You have been ill, I was sorry to learn," said Mr. Frost.

"I was a little ill; very slightly. I am quite well now, thank you."

"Perhaps London does not altogether agree with you? You have been used to a country life, have you not?"

"I have lived nearly always in the country; but I am very well in London now."

"You are living in the house of a very old friend of mine, Mrs. Lockwood."

The cheap Maud's face from apathy to interest when he uttered the name was not lost upon Mr. Frost.

"You are an old friend of Mrs. Lockwood's?" repeated Maud, smiling.

"A very old friend. I knew her husband before he was married. I have known Hugh ever since he was born. He is a right good fellow."

"Oh yes."

"But his mother is a little disturbed about him at present. He has been taken an obstinate fancy into his head, and wants to set up as an architect on his own account, instead of remaining longer in Digby and West's offices. Perhaps you have heard?"

"Yes, I heard something of it from Mrs. Lockwood, and from my friends, Captain and Mrs. Shearborne."

"Ah, exactly."

"Captain Shearborn seemed to think that Mr. Lockwood was justified in his plan."

"I have no doubt that Captain Sheardown is an excellent gentleman."

"He is very good and very sensible."

"No doubt. Still, on this point his opinion is scarcely of great valuable that could be had. I am going to Italy myself in a very short time. You are looking pale. Is the heat of the room too much for you?"

"No, thank you. Yes—I am rather oppressed by it. You were saying—"

"That I was going to Italy on business which, if carried out successfully, would enable me to throw an excellent thing in Hugh Lockwood's way. If he will keep him abroad for a year or two, but that would be no disadvantage; on the contrary, if we can only persuade Hugh not to be in a hurry to assume responsibilities on his own account—"

"The carriage must be here by this time, Sidney," said Mrs. Frost, rising and touching her husband's shoulder. "Do inquire!"

"Not going yet, surely!" exclaimed Mrs. Lovegrove, in stern distinctness. "Not going before partaking of our humble refreshments?"

"Oh, thank you very much," returned Mrs. Frost, "but I really couldn't eat any thing. We rushed away from dinner in order to get here before it was all over. Your hours are so vituriously early!"

It was perhaps strange that Mrs. Lovegrove should feel offended at being told that she kept virtuously early hours. But the fact was that she did so feel.

"I saw," said the hostess, "that you had scraped acquaintance with my friend Lady Tullis Gale. I would have presented you to her, but the fact is, she does not particularly care for making acquaintance out of her own set."

"Oh, that native elderly lady! She turned gown? Yes; Sidney presented me to her. What an odd person!"

"In a peculiar and painful position," pursued Mrs. Lovegrove, loftily, "Mr. Lovegrove does not feel justified in intruding strangers on her accustomed circle."

"What's the matter with her? Is she not quite right in her head?" asked Mrs. Frost, slightly touched on her forbearing to have spoke.

This was too much for Mrs. Lovegrove. She had felt that she was getting the worst of it throughout; but for she was injured, and Mrs. Frost was genuinely cool and unconcerned.

"I don't understand you, Mrs. Frost," said Mrs. Lovegrove; "nor can I conjecture why you should wish to—to—insult my friends."

"Oh dear me, I assure you I hadn't the least idea of insulting the poor woman," rejoined Mrs. Frost, impertturbably. "It would be her misfortune, not her fault, you know, after all. But you said something yourself about her peculiar and painful position."

"I did so, Mrs. Frost," she said. "And poor dear Lady Tullis's position is indeed a sad one. Her husband—a man of enormous wealth, but of a profligate a character that I shudder to breathe his name in the same atmosphere where my daughter and her husband, Captain and Mrs. Lovegrove, reching a climax of impressiveness, and lowering her voice almost to a whisper, "has gone off, deserted her!"

"Really? Very shocking!" But," added Mrs. Frost, "do you know, I think not, on the whole, very surprising!"

That night, in the seclusion of their chamber, Mrs. Lovegrove informed her husband that, come what might, she would never, on any consideration, invite "that woman"—so she designated Mrs. Frost—inside her doors again.

"Pooh, pooh!" said Mr. Lovegrove, "why not?"

"Why not, Augustus? I wonder that you can ask! Her insolence and airs are beyond bearing. And did you see her gown?

"A black gown, wasn't it? It looked very neat, I thought."

"Very neat! If three guineas a yard paid for that lace it was trimmed with I will undertake to eat it. That is all, Augustus!"

But yet that proved to be not quite all. And Mr. Lovegrove had to listen to a long catalogue of Mrs. Frost's misdemeanors until he fell asleep.

Mrs. Frost, on her side, declared that she had been bored to death; that she had not enjoyed any thing like the collection of creatures Mrs. Lovegrove had gathered together; that they had stared at her Mrs. Frost as though she were a savage; and, finally, she asked her husband what good had been done by her going there at all, seeing that about every one of Mrs. Lovegrove's set had chosen to take offense, and walk away from her in a huff?

"No good at all, Georgina, certainly, unless you had chosen to behave with civility, when you knew how I had begged you to do so."

"Really, I was perfectly civil. But Mrs. Lovegrove tried to quarrel with me because I was not overwhelmed by the honor and glory of being introduced to that ridiculous old Irishwoman."

"Lady Tullis's niece is about evenly very charming creature."

"The golden-haired girl in white? Well—yes, perhaps; I did not look at her. She certainly she did look different from the rest of the menagerie. Those apple-green creatures! Ugh! They set one's teeth on edge!"

"You must call on Lady Tullis, Georgina. I want you to invite the girl, and take her into society a little."

"I? Thanks! I really can not undertake to chaperon all your clients' daughters and governesses and cousins, and Heaven knows who besides."

"Lady Tullis Gale is no client of mine."

"Why do you trouble yourself about her, then?"

"Georgy, listen: this is a case in which your woman's tact might be of use. I feel sure you will enjoy it on my behalf. There is some foolish love-making going on between Hugh Lockwood and this Miss Desmond. But she is different from what I expected. She is very attractive. Now, it is very undesirable that young Hugh Lockwood should entangle himself in an engagement just now."

"Very undesirable for whom?" asked Mrs. Frost, yawning behind her fan.

"For—for his mother."

"Really? Well, I should suppose that very penniless little person with the prominent jaw was able to manage her own business. I am sorry I can not get up any vital interest in the case. But you know, Mrs. Lockwood is not a dear old friend of mine?"

Mrs. Frost had for a brief time been really a little jealous of Zillah. And she still affected to be so whenever it suited her, although she felt tolerably certain that whatever were the strength of intimacy between her husband and Mrs. Lockwood, there was no echo in it of an old love-story.

"Suppose I tell you, Georgina," said Mr. Frost, suppressing the hot words of anger which rose to his lips. "That it would be rather cheap for me that Hugh Lockwood should engage himself at present."

"What in the world can it matter to you, Sidney?"

"There are business complications in the affair," said Mr. Frost, dryly. "But it is there young folks are living in the same house and meeting daily, and so long as the young lady is receiving no other attentions or courtesy, it is in the course of nature that she should be disposed to fancy herself in love with Hugh, and to him. And that would be a bad girl to him, of sense and sweetness, and is a thorough gentlewoman. But Hugh ought to marry money. He will have thousands of his own. Miss Desmond is very poor. Now, if you would give her some pleasant society, and let her see something of the world, there would be less fear of Hugh and her making fools of themselves."

"Why don't you ask her to dine, Lady What's-her-name?" asked Mrs. Frost, leaning back in the carriage with closed eyes. "She is the proper person to look after her niece."

"I tell it to you because I choose that you shall obey me!" thundered Mr. Frost, furiously. "It is not enough that you drive me half wild by your extravagance; that you have neither common gratitude nor common consideration for your husband; but you must oppose me in turn. You deliberately put yourself in opposition to every plan or wish of mine. You distress by your exchanges and your folly. In my special interest to be on good terms with; and you seek the company of fashionable fools who teach you to patronize and insult. I despise my friends. Take care, Georgina! I warn you to take care! There are limits to even my indulgence!"

Mr. Frost had uttered the last words in his heart, after the carriage had drawn up at his door. And the words had been heard by the servant who opened it.

Mrs. Frost was mortified. She even shed a few tears. But her husband's wrath was flaming too high to be extinguished by a few tears of his mistress.

"That is all I get," said Mrs. Frost to herself, as her maid was brushing out her hair, "for consenting to go near that odious Bedford Square set at all! I was a fool to consent. I don't believe a word about its being important to Sidney whether Hugh Lockwood marries a princess or a pauper. It is merely to carry out some scheme of that artful little creature Mrs. Lockwood. But she shall find that whatever her influence over my husband may be, she can not make me an accomplice in her plots."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

HENRY COOPER,

U. S. SENATOR FROM TENNESSEE.

MR. HENRY COOPER, elected to the United States Senate by the Tennessee Legislature, October 22, is one of a trio of brothers of acknowledged ability, and eminent in the legal profession. Judge COOPER himself is represented to be a man of irreproachable character, and to have an unblemished reputation as a politician. He was a Union man during the war, if one may be so designated who held a strictly neutral position. His old political affiliation was with the Whig party. He has never been a prominent politicant for office, and has never been defeated in any canvass before the people. His native talents and the influence of the Tennessee Legislature reached the point where it was evident that ERETHRIDGE could not be elected, the latter proposed the concentration upon Judge COOPER. The Nashville Republican Banner regards his election as "the triumph of a truly conservative, patriotic, national, progressive public sentiment."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

CONVENTIONISM have received a warning that their evil deeds, though long concealed, will surely be brought to light while we have keen detectives in the Secret Service. A counterfeit revenue stamp appeared in the market about two months ago, since which time Colonel BALLINGER, of the Treasury Department, and his assistants have been quietly but effectually at work. A week or two ago an engraver, who was hitherto believed unblemished reputation, and has worked for the best firms in the country, was arrested. The fact of his arrest excited much suspicion, and last week numerous implements for the manufacture of counterfeit stamps and coin were discovered and seized in the house of the prisoner himself. Buried in the garden the officers discovered a large tin box, which was found to contain 10,000 counterfeit revenue stamps, in large sheets, the plates for printing, dies, rollers, and every denomination of stamps, from one cent to five dollars. In the box was also a die for making three-cent silver pieces, steel dies for stamping coins, and a number of unfinished figures; and in the lower room of the house was found a perforating press for punching the holes between the stamps on the printed sheets. The engraving was very strikingly true workmanship; and it is believed that a large quantity of bogus stamps have been put in circulation.

Thanksgiving-day may have lost some of the peculiar significance which was attached to its observance in olden time, but Massachusetts is not to be overcome easy; but never let it be abolished, say we. The day is full of historic memories, and solid country, and may it be ever most gratefully observed!

A new work, which will probably attract considerable attention, is now in preparation by Mr. BARNUM. The main conclusions which are drawn in regard to lower animals in his "Origin of Species" will be applied to man in the new work.

Amherst College has now 268 students. A boat crew has been organized by each of the three lower classes—and a University crew are still wanting. Including all departments. This college has now thirty-eight one thousand dollar scholarships. The Halley Observatory at Princeton is nearly completed. Ex-President M'LEAN is writing a history of the college. The Bonnell scholarship at Harvard College will realize $700 from the recent centennial celebration and subscriptions.—The Judd Scientific Hall for Wesleyan University, Middletown, is commenced and will probably be finished within the next year. This will be a memorial building to the young son of Mr. Judd, who died a few months ago, at the age of twenty. Young as he was he had traveled extensively over the continents of Europe, and was familiar with the Greek, Latin, and French languages. He was prepared to enter Wesleyan in the autumn of 1870, as Freshman class, and was looking forward with bright anticipations to college life.—The town of Bethlehem has received one thousand dollars from the University of Vermont; and, in consequence of this liberality, fifty thousand more have been pledged.

A novel breach of promise case is before the Baden courts, originating in the evening a rejected lover declined to dance with the rejected a proposition of marriage by letter from a fashionable physician at Heidelberg, who wished secrecy for the time, as his father opposed the match. A correspondence was carried on, the lady bought her trousseau, and the rumored her engagement. When at last it was announced that the family opposition was removed, and the betrothed went to Heidelberg for introduction and marriage, he declared that the whole thing was a hoax, the letters forged, and the physician entirely ignorant of the matter.

The reunion of the Old and New School Presbyterians is a great and important event in the history of one of our largest religious denominations. It will be accomplished by a nearly unanimous vote, and the necessary steps to set the United Church into operation will be taken at the present week at the meeting at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

The organ which has just been completed for the new building of the Young Men's Christian Association has already been privately exhibited to a select few, and highly approved by them. It is understood that the Association will soon give a grand concert, when the public will have opportunity to judge of the merits of this new instrument. It was built at a cost of about ten thousand dollars, and combines many particular features.

Baron Lionel de Rothschild, who died about a year ago, left behind him a history of the monetary speculations and loans he had effected in Europe for the members of his firm, which is now being printed in the form of a memoir.

Rev. Dr. Breckinridge never could endure the habit which some students possess of answering questions by asking one themselves. "Where," inquired the Doctor once of a dull fellow, who always managed to gain some time by raising a query of some kind—"where was Solomon's Temple?" "Hem: do you refer to its location, sir?" "Yes," growled the Doctor in his deepest tones, "I refer to its location, or to any thing else you choose to put may be enclosed under the word 'where.'"

Two hundred and fifty-five specimens of American and foreign art are on exhibition at the National Academy of Design, which was opened to the public last week. The collection is much smaller than it has been in previous years; but it contains enough of interest to warrant many visits from the lover of art—as well as from the critic.

Father Hyacinthe is said to have a purpose of establishing a newspaper in Paris called Le Chrétien, which shall be both political and religious in its character. Such a paper, well conducted, would be a blessing to Paris—provided it is not conducted!

Fanny Fern gives her views about women barbers thus: "There is no man who would not rather be shaved by a woman than to have a great hairy-lipped man pawing about his jugular vein, and poking him in the ribs to get up when another man's turn came. That's say how his wife might like it, but I am very sure he would; and so do wife why—she could stand a more close shave, couldn't she?"

The Bonn of Health is indefatigable in efforts to ferret out the filthy localities which contain the seeds of epidemic diseases. It is estimated that there are now no less than 100,000,000 gallons of stagnant water in lots between Sixty-fifth Street and the Park, which the sewers can not drain on account of inferior construction and limited capacity.

An English druggist makes an excellent suggestion in regard to the sale of poisonous substances. He proposes that, in addition to the word "poison," the label should have printed on their surface the appropriate antidotes for each dose of poisons. A bottle containing a mineral acid, for instance, would have on the label:

POISON!

Antidote, give (enclosed—an early chalk, cray, or whiting, or coffee-grounds.

If similar labels accompanied all deadly drugs that were dispensed, quite a few lives might be saved.

Among queer associations of recent date, the Pall Mall's Association is one of the funniest. Yet the curious articles of its constitution are very sensible. Only two hundred members, and those more or right by a ballot, are allowed the privilege. Membership. But if any are so unfortunate as to decrease in weight after admission, the fault is pardoned, and they are not expelled. No drunkard or habitual intoxicate are admitted, nor any who have publicly exhibited themselves for money.

A lady of Rochester, Iowa, while drinking tea five years ago, was incited to laugh by a remark made by her father. She choked so as to cause a stricture of the throat, which has ever since prevented her eating. For the past three months she has been altogether unable to swallow, and was sustained only by fluids injected into her stomach. Her death at last was from starvation.

A most extraordinary story appears in a Florence newspaper, and horrible as it is, and incredible as it seems, it possesses a scientific interest which induces us to give a short account of it. A Mr. Reid, lady, two men named Avolio and Carines were executed privately in the prison of Villa Nuova, Rio Janeiro. Lorenzo y Carmo of Rio Janeiro, well-known by reason for his remarkable works on electricity appeared to a physiology, and the executioner's skill, obtained permission to profit by this event, in order to experiment on the powers of electricity. He made a battery of possible, to unite the head to the neck after decapitation. The heads of the two criminals fell within a few minutes of each other, and the same battery immediately a compression was effected on the carotid arteries of one of the heads, so as to prevent hemorrhage. The body and head were then placed in natural position upon a bed, and the cells of a powerful electric cells apparatus. The eyes of the decapitated remains were soon perceptible, and ensued regularly. The mind was then found to be the body by stitches and special apparatus. At the end of two hours a feeble pulse was manifest, and in sixty-two hours it was evident, to the astonishment of every one, that a process of cicatrization had commenced on the lips of the section. The latter four other signs of life manifested themselves, when the director of the prison came for the first time into the experiment room, and it was then discovered that the head of Carines had taken the start for that of Avolio, by some mistake, and applied to the body of the latter! Nevertheless, the experiment continued, and when respiratory movements reproduced themselves electricity was suspended. The doctor and his assistants were frightened at a result so unexpected, but the learned surgeon employed all his skill to continue the work which chance had so singularly commenced. By means of an esophagus probe liquid nourishment was introduced into the stomach. At the end of three months the cicatrization was complete, and motion, though still difficult, became more and more perceptible. At length, at the end of seven months and a half, Avolio-Carines was able to rise and walk, feeling only a slight stiffness in the neck and shoulders. Every one, then, thought this one observation tale, and the scientific world will look for the result.

There is some truth in the ideas of Mrs. Barclay, who is or has been lecturing to ladies in Chautauqua County. She says she practices gymnastics, as fever can be cured by a smart run of a mile or so, or a jolting ride in a lumber-wagon. She recommends carrying about with you a small sponge-cake dresses brings on a feeling of laughter. Moreover, she holds that the doctrine that a woman should be ill only while their patients continue healthy; and she speaks with admiration of a certain country where doctors are heavily fined when their patients die in their hands.

A boy at Norwich, England, is accused of being his own grandfather. The charge is proved in this wise: There was a widow (Anne) and her daughter-in-law (Anne), and a child (Anne) was born to the latter. The widow married the son, and the daughter married the father. The widow was, therefore, mother (step) to her husband's father, and consequently grandmother to her own husband (Henry). By this husband she had a son (Henry), who therefore was his own grandmother. Now, as the son of a great-grandmother this must be either a grandfather or a great-uncle; but the (Devil) was one or the other. He is his own grandfather.

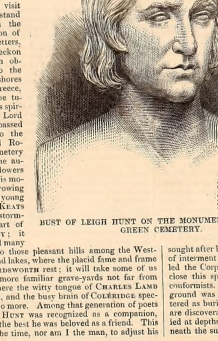
One of the most annoying things a busy editor can experience is to find that his postage stamps will not "stick"—and, after vainly laboring to make them adhere, to be obliged to gum them, but as if there was no other intention originally than that every one should use his own brush and bottle. There is certainly considerable room for remarks, but in the presence of transportion letters will become minus stamps and go to the Dead-Letter Office, through no fault of the writers.

DANIEL DEFOE'S TOMB.

THE LEIGH HUNT MEMORIAL.

WE give on this page a representation of the bust placed upon the monument recently (October 19) erected to the memory of LEIGH HUNT, the celebrated English poet and essayist, in Kensal-Green Cemetery. In the ten years that have passed since the death of LEIGH HUNT, which happened about the end of August, 1859, at the age of seventy-five, the affectionate esteem for his character, most warmly felt by those best acquainted with the spirit of his life and writings, has been cherished as a personal and social faith. The monument erected over his tomb is a permanent expression of their regard for his virtues as a man and for his merits as one of the most graceful and genial of English authors. There were present on the occasion of the dedication of this monument the relatives and friends of LEIGH HUNT, and also many well-known literary men. Letters of apology for absence were received from ROBERT BROWNING, ALFRED TENNYSON, CHARLES DICKENS, JOHN BRIGHT, Lord LYTTON, Earl RUSSELL, and others, who were contributors to the memorial fund. Lord HOUGHTON presided at the dedication, and delivered the address. Some years ago he performed a similar office for the monument in the same cemetery over the grave of THOMAS HOOD. The immortal jester, who had so much tenderness and poetry in his heart, and whose success as a humorist has almost resulted in an injustice to his serious writings, had fewer claims on the general public for posthumous honor than the varied writer whose last resting-place has been commemorated by the sculpture of Mr. JOSEPH DURHAM and the eloquence of Lord HOUGHTON. HOOD was neither a politician nor a critic; LEIGH HUNT was both, besides being an original creator in poetry, fiction, and general literature. No doubt the strongest inclination of the latter was not toward politics. He was not a master of the scientific parts of government and national economy, and, if he had had an opportunity, would probably have made as indifferent a minister of state as ADDISON did. But he understood exceedingly well that sentiment of natural justice, of fair consideration, and of abstract reason which lies at the root of all worthy politics, and which at particular periods requires the emphasis of high principle and the illumination of lambent wit even more than the doctrines of political science. The early years of the founder of the Examiner were passed in just such an epoch. Both in England and abroad it was a time during which the commonest principles of freedom were denied and outraged. The old military despotisms of continental Europe were engaged in mortal struggle with a newer military power just as despotic as themselves in act, however revolutionary may have been the fundamental basis on which it rested. In England Toryism was at the very height of its reactionary fervor, and the condition of England was more like that of Austria previous to her recent reforms than that of the old home of temperate liberty. It was an age, therefore, in which the mere demand for freedom, for enlarged powers of popular self-government, for religious toleration, and for purity in the conduct of affairs and in the administration of the law, was of greater importance than the discussion of elaborate details of politics. In the enforcement of these general principles, now by indignant protest against their violation, now by a quick Voltarian wit (for those who are only acquainted with the writer's later style have no idea how much pungency there was in his youthful pen), and at one time by tendiness to suffer personally for his championship of the right, LEIGH HUNT, in association with his brother JOHN—whose honest and intelligent, though less brilliant, services demand a passing recognition—helped forward the better time which a later generation has inherited; and when the sometime editor of the Examiner finally quitted politics, and settled down to the uninterrupted cultivation of literature pure and simple, he did so in the midst of a comparative calm which was all the healthier for the previous storm of battle.

In the course of his address LORD HOUGHTON said: "It is true Mr. Hirst represents the past generation of our literature, and that I think is all the more reason why we should honor him to-day.—The tomb which we are about to visit will not stand alone in the association of men of letters. It will beckon many an observer to the marshy shores of Greece, where the tumultuous spirit of Lord BYRON passed away—to the beautiful Roman cemetery where the autumnal flowers are at this moment growing over the young form of KEATS and the storm-cast heart of SHELLEY: it will lead many a one to those pleasant hills among the Westmoreland lakes, where the placid fame and frame of WORDSWORTH rest: it will take some of us to the more familiar grave-yards not far from this, where the witty tongue of CHARLES LAMB is silent, and the busy brain of COLERIDGE speculates no more. Among that generation of poets LEIGH HUNT was recognized as a companion, and by the best he was beloved as a friend. This is not the time, nor am I the man, to adjust his place in that illustrious company, but I will say here and every where that he was a true English poet. Not merely the faculty of imagination, not merely the presence of wit, not merely the great and sedulous accomplishments in our literature—not these alone made him a poet; he was born one and he died one. There is one sphere of literature in which I think I may say he was absolutely eminent—I mean that of poetical criticism. In that field I place him before any other man of letters in this country."



BUST OF LEIGH HUNT ON THE MONUMENT IN KENSAL-GREEN CEMETERY.

Being regarded as a rabid Republican, LEIGH HUNT was sentenced to two years' imprisonment; and after he left prison he was detained for many years by a persistent obloquy and injustice which in these times seem absolutely incredible.

After the address, which, owing to the inclemency of the weather, was delivered in a neighboring chapel, the company proceeded to the tomb. The monument was uncovered, Lord HOUGHTON saying: "In the name of the subscribers to this monument, and of the friends of Mr. LEIGH HUNT, who remember him and are careful of his fame, I present this monument to his family, to the country, and to posterity."

OLD TOMBS IN BUNHILL-FIELDS.

THE ancient city burial-place in London known as Bunhill-fields Cemetery has been recently converted into a public walk, laid out ornamentally, and planted with trees and flowers. From time immemorial this spot has been used as a cemetery. In the midst of the fen beyond the city wall a tumulus or mound marked traditionally the site of Saxon burial. In the year 1549 more than a thousand cartloads of human remains were removed from the charnel-house of St. Paul's Cathedral and deposited in that spot. In the days of the first STUART, and during the period of the Commonwealth, burial in this ground was frequently performed by stealth. In 1665, to disclose this spot for the use mainly of the Nonconformists. From 1665 to 1832, when the ground was closed, 123,000 bodies were registered as buried there: of these only 5000 tombs are discoverable: but there are vaults lying buried at depths varying from six to twelve feet beneath the surface. The place boasts no gilded shrines or splendid mausoleums; and yet in this country as well as in England an interest is felt in this humble spot of earth scarcely second to that with which Westminster Abbey itself is regarded. Men lie here whose names are household words in every clime; for we may claim that JOHN BUNYAN, DANIEL DEFOE, and ISAAC WATTS are the property not of any nation, but of all mankind.

Our illustrations of a few of the many interesting monuments in Bunhill-fields ground will speak for themselves with the eloquence of familiar names. They are those of JOHN BUNYAN, author of "The Pilgrim's Progress;" DANIEL DEFOE, author of "Robinson Crusoe," and many other popular works; Dr. ISAAC WATTS, author of the favorite hymns and psalms of Evangelical Christians; and Mrs. SUSANNAH WESLEY, the aged mother of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY.

MRS. SUSANNAH WESLEY'S TOMB.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

On page 740 we give a map of the course of the great ship canal between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, formally opened to travel and commerce on the 17th of this month, with the imposing ceremonies suited to so important an event. While awaiting the full and accurate illustrations which we shall in due time receive, we, in the mean time, lay before our readers a brief description of the canal and the principal places along its route.

Starting from Port Said (pronounced Say-id), on the Mediterranean, the canal runs southward through Lake Menzaleh, a shallow, marshy body of water, closely resembling our own Dismal Swamp, to the intermediate port of Ismailia, distant from Port Said about seventy-five miles, thence along the eastern shore of Lake Timsah (the lake of Crocodiles) to the deep cuttings at Toussoum and Serapeum, and thence through the Bitter Lakes into the last deep cutting at Chelouf, debouching about twelve miles further south into the Red Sea at a point about one mile southeast of Suez. The actual distance traversed by the canal is a little over a hundred miles, about sixty miles of which run through the beds of the lakes Menzaleh, Ballah, Timsah, and the Bitter Lakes. Embankments are required on Menzaleh and Ballah, but not upon the others. The average width of the whole canal on the top is three hundred and twenty-eight feet, on a low level, and narrower where deep cuttings have had to be made. The average width at the bottom is from two hundred to two hundred and forty-six feet. There is to be an average depth of water of twenty-six feet throughout the canal.

The most difficult part of the whole undertaking was the formation of a port on the Mediterranean. Ten years ago the site of Port Said was nothing but a low, narrow sand-bank, the resting-place of flamingoes and other water-fowl that frequented the surrounding marshes. On this unpromising spot, in 1859, M. LESSEPS squatted with an army of Arab workmen and commenced active operations. The first huts erected for the engineers were built on piles. A few months wrought a wonderful change in the appearance of the place. Solid land was formed by dredging out the harbor and channel, and substantial buildings superseded the rude shanties. At the present time over one thousand acres have been reclaimed from the marshy waters; and Port Said is now a flourishing sea-port—a regular place of call for four lines of steamers, with a commodious harbor, immense workshops, great stores of material, and a motley population of twelve thousand souls, made up of workmen and adventurers of all nationalities. It has a handsome square named after M. LESSEPS, comfortable dwelling-houses, and well-supplied stores. The great feature of the place is, of course, the harbor. In order to protect the mouth of the canal from the mud constantly deposited in great quantities by the current of the Nile, as well as to defend the shipping from storms, two immense piers or breakwaters have been built out into the sea, separated by an interval of seven hundred and fifty yards. The western pier is twenty-seven hundred yards in length, the eastern one two thousand yards, and between them lies the harbor. The material used in the construction of these piers is a kind of artificial stone, made on the spot from a combination of sand and lime. The lime of which these blocks are made was quarried on the line of the canal, a few miles south of the port, there ground, and then transported to the works. It was there mixed with the sand, and subjected to hydraulic pressure in huge wooden moulds. The moulds were then removed, and the blocks left to harden in the sun. This process required two or three months. When ready for use they weighed about twenty tons apiece, and were placed in position by means of ingeniously-contrived machines.

DR. ISAAC WATTS'S TOMB. JOHN BUNYAN'S TOMB.

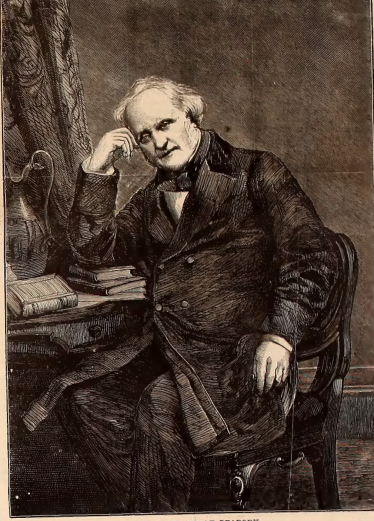
The canal leaves Lake Menzaleh at a place called Kantara, on the Desert, and passes over two miles of sand-hills to Lake Ballah, through which it again cuts in the same way for eight miles. Then comes the first deep land-cutting, from Ferdaue to Lake Timsah, the deepest of which is near El Guisr, and from sixty to seventy feet. Twenty thousand Fellahs were employed for two years in cutting a channel to the Mediterranean, to float the steam dredges and fill the shallow basin of Timsah, formerly fed by the Nile inundation only. This lake is the central point of the work, and on its shore stands the new town of Ismailia, named after the Viceroy. It is the "inland" port of the canal, connecting by fresh-water canal with Zagazig, fifty miles distant in the interior, and opening a transit for the rich agricultural products of that region. The journey from Port Said to Ismailia occupies about eleven hours; from Ismailia to Suez about sixteen.

Between Lake Ballah and Suez there are two points (the only ones along the route subject to danger from this source) where extensive precautions have been taken to prevent the drifting sand from filling the bed of the canal, viz., at El Guisr and Serapeum. At the latter point it is proposed to irrigate the banks and plant them with trees, as the most effectual means of protection.

At Suez, the southern terminus of the canal, the sea-wall is on a smaller scale than that required at Port Said. Before the company commenced operations the town contained a population of about three thousand, chiefly Arabs. It now numbers over twenty-five thousand inhabitants, and is a place of much enterprise and constantly increasing importance. Of the present population more than four thousand are Europeans. The situation of Suez is one of mingled dreariness and beauty. In front of the town lies the sea, its waters of a deeper blue than those of the Mediterranean. On one side tower the lofty mountains of Attaka, on the other rises the majestic head of Mount Sinai: while behind the town stretches the wide expanse of the great desert, without tree, shrub, or blade of grass to break its sad monotony. But what gives Suez its principal value in the eyes of M. LESSEPS is its magnificent harbor, in which more than five hundred vessels can find ample accommodation. Should the canal be successful, Suez will undoubtedly become a flourishing and important town.



THE LATE GEORGE PEABODY.

GEORGE PEABODY.

GEORGE PEABODY, the great philanthropist, whose name has been associated with gifts of more than princely munificence for the benefit of the laboring classes and of educational institutions, died at his residence in Eaton Square, London, at half past eleven o'clock on the night of November 4. His benefactions have endeared him to the peoples of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations—England and America.

GEORGE PEABODY was born in Danvers, Massachusetts, February 18, 1795. He had no educational advantages. At the age of eleven he was a clerk in a grocery-store in his native town. Here he remained three years, when he went to Thetford, Vermont, to live with his grandfather. At the age of sixteen he went to Newburyport, Massachusetts, where he was employed as a clerk by his brother DAVID. Soon after, his brother's store having been destroyed by fire, GEORGE was solicited to go to Georgetown, District of Columbia, by his uncle, JOHN PEABODY. The latter, being heavily involved in debt, carried on his business under his nephew's name for two years. In the mean time the war of 1812 had broken out, and now GEORGE PEABODY, though still a lad and exempt from military duty, volunteered his services. Among GEORGE PEABODY'S friends in Georgetown was ELISHA RIGGS, who, when the war was over, proposed to enter into partnership with the young man in the drapery business, furnishing the capital himself. The enterprise was a success, and in 1815 the firm removed to Baltimore; some years later branch establishments were opened in New York and Philadelphia. In 1826 Mr. PEABODY, then thirty-one years of age, became the head of the firm.

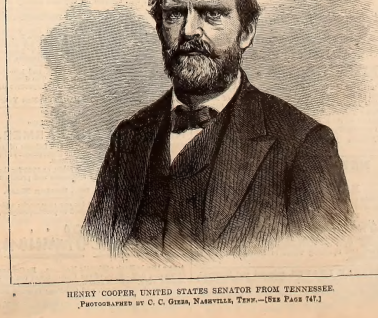
During the ten years which followed Mr. PEABODY frequently visited England to purchase goods. In 1837 he became a permanent resident of London. In 1843 he retired from his American business, and established a commission agency and banking-house in London. He was already a man of large wealth, and had performed noteworthy service for the public. His influence had secured a loan to the State of Maryland, and in other ways he had done much to sustain the credit of his native country in England. His business in London became extensive, and he added to the fortune which he owned at the time of his permanent residence in London the sum of from twenty to thirty millions of dollars.

Throughout his life Mr. PEABODY was noted for his liberality. In 1851 he assumed the entire expense of arranging and garnishing the American Department in the Crystal Palace. A year later he contributed $10,000 to pay the expenses of a second voyage by Dr. KANE to the arctic seas in search of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN.

The one hundredth anniversary of the corporate existence of Danvers, Massachusetts, occurred on the 16th of June, 1852, and that day was celebrated in a manner befitting the occasion. Among the invitations to attend the festivities was one to GEORGE PEABODY, who replied, expressing regret that he could not be present to join in the celebration of this the centennial of his native town. He, however, sent the committee a sentiment inclosed in an envelope, "which was not to be opened until his name should be called in due course at the dinner-table." After the dinner had been eaten, and several speeches made, Mr. PEABODY'S name was called, the envelope opened, and this sentiment read: "Education—A debt due from the present to future generations." In continuation he wrote: "In acknowledgment of the payment of that debt by the generation which preceded me in my native town of Danvers, and to aid in its prompt future discharge, I give to the inhabitants of that town the sum of $20,000 for the promotion of knowledge and morality among them." To this sum he afterward added largely, the donations altogether exceeding $200,000.

In 1857 Mr. PEABODY paid a visit to the United States, and one of his first acts was the contribution of $300,000 for the establishment of an educational institution in Baltimore. To this he afterward added $200,000, and in 1866 the donation was increased by $500,000, and on the 22d of September last he gave $400,000 more, making a total contribution of $1,400,000.

In 1858 Mr. PEABODY returned to England, and set about putting into practical effect a scheme of benevolence which had occupied his mind for several years previous. This was, "under a sense of gratitude" for his success in England, "to make a donation for the benefit



HENRY COOPER, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM TENNESSEE.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. C. GIZER, NASHVILLE, TENN.—[SEE PAGE 747.]

EX-GOVERNOR FREDERICK F. LOW, UNITED STATES MINISTER TO CHINA.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY, WASHINGTON, D. C.—[SEE PAGE 760.]

of the poor of London." To this end he consulted his friends M. M. SAMPSON, Sir JAMES EMERSON TENNENT, his partner, J. S. MORGAN, and the Right Rev. Bishop MCILVAINE, of Ohio. In a letter dated "London, March 12, 1862," and addressed to CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, the United States Minister to England, Lord STANLEY, M.P. (now Earl of Derby), and others, whom he appointed trustees, he wrote, after explaining the motives which actuated him: "My object being to ameliorate the condition of the poor and needy of this great metropolis, not to promote their comfort and happiness, I take pleasure in apprising you that I have determined to transfer to you the sum of £150,000, which now is or will be available for this purpose on the books of Messrs. GEORGE PEABODY & Co., as you will see by the accompanying correspondence." This munificent gift was afterward swelled to the sum of £350,000, or nearly $2,000,000.

In accordance with the spirit of the gift Queen VICTORIA wrote a most graceful letter to Mr. PEABODY, adding to it a portrait of herself. The letter and portrait are both deposited in the Peabody Institute at Danvers.

Mr. PEABODY again visited this country in 1866. During his stay here he donated $1,000,000 for a Southern educational fund, to which, on the occasion of his last visit, he added another million. To Phillips Academy at Andover he gave $25,000; to the Newburyport Library, $15,000; to building a new church in Georgetown, Massachusetts, $10,000; to a library in the same town, $16,000; to the Essex Institute at Salem, $140,000; to the library at Thetford, Vermont, $6000; to the Massachusetts Historical Society in Boston, $20,000; to the Peabody Institute of Archæology at Cambridge, $100,000; to found a geological branch at Yale College, $150,000; to the Peabody Institute at Baltimore the additional gift, already mentioned, of $300,000; to the Maryland Historical Society, $20,000; to Kenyon College, Ohio, $25,000; for a library in Georgetown, District of Columbia, $10,000; making altogether considerably over $3,500,000, besides an additional gift to the Peabody Institute at Danvers.

His relatives were also remembered in this lavish distribution of his wealth, he presenting them with various sums, amounting in the aggregate to $1,500,000.

On the 30th of September, 1869, Mr. PEABODY took his departure from this country for London. It was his last voyage; in a few weeks after his arrival in England his earthly career was closed. Mr. PEABODY was never married. He was tall and well built, and his manners were always genial and inviting.

THE GRIZZLY.

A CALIFORNIA TALE.

SITTING in the luxurious apartments of my noble mansion on Fifth Avenue, I often recall a scene in my life the very thought of which fills me still with terror.

I was not born to riches. I was well educated and extremely poor when I commenced life. At that time, just when I was seriously debating whether I should teach school or open a retail grocery store out West, the startling tidings came of the great gold discoveries in California, which set on fire the heads of a world. I, among the potent influence of the gold-fever at once, and was one of the very first who went out to the new "El Dorado." I sailed out in a ship which, from the hold to the cradles, was literally crammed with human beings, and landed on the streets of the embryo city of San Francisco with scarcely a rag on my back.

I hurried off at once to a place just then discovered, and where a large crowd of human beings—the representatives of nearly every nation under heaven—had already assembled. Desperate characters they were, to be sure! Convicts recently escaped from prison and broken-down lawyers; ticket-of-leave men from Botany Bay and Norfolk Island, with impoverished clergymen; retired organ-grinders, with graduates of European universities—all were there. I marvel now at the coolness with which I ventured into the midst of such a crowd of desperadoes. But I myself was a desperado.

I chose, after a long search, a place in a remote cañon as the scene of my labors. Here I made my rude camp, and proceeded to dig. There were neighbors around me. In fact it was difficult to avoid neighbors, even if it had been desirable. For, in a cañon, no man might go, some one would be sure to track him. So I made the best of it, and put up with the presence of others.

Take them all in all my neighbors were about as villainous-looking a set of men as I had ever seen out of jail. One was a negro of enormous proportions, black as a coal, with the expression of an untamed wild savage in his brutal features. Another was a long, thin, cunning, treacherous miscreant, who (as I afterward learned) had been confined for twelve years in the Sing Sing prison for an atrocious crime. Another was a short, thick-set man, with a heavy beard which almost covered his features, and added to his ferocious expression. Among all the wild adventurers whom I had encountered, none were altogether so repulsive as these. They were respectively by the names of "Nigger," "Sing Sing," and "Pirate."

I tried to get away from the neighborhood of these men, but a fatality seemed to attend my efforts. On three different occasions I removed to new places, and actually, each time, I encountered these men, who had moved on before me. It looked as though I was actually following them. So I tried to get rid of my aversion, and turned myself to work.

At the last place to which we came there was a very remarkable man who had been living there for some time. He was a Spaniard, was tall and well formed, with a wonderful expression of resolution and daring in his face. His face was pale, his eyes dark, and his general appearance commanded involuntary respect. He lived in a hut above a cavern on the side of a neighboring hill. This place he had selected for a residence some time previously. He was never seen digging any where in particular, and it was generally supposed that he had some very rich diggings in the immediate neighborhood of his cavern.

I dug on patiently for some months, and gained nearly enough to supply myself with the necessaries of life. I began to be very greatly discouraged. Seeing I met no success where I was, I resolved to change my location. I had lost all hope. For three days I had gained absolutely nothing.

"Buenos dias, Señor."

Looking up I saw the Spaniard. I bowed and was silent.

"You have a very deep hole there," he said.

"I should think so," I replied.

"Are you encouraged, Señor? Pardon me, but you look disheartened, I think."

"I have reason to be. I have gained nothing. I am tired of this place."

The Spaniard's eye lightened up. "No, Señor, do not."

"Do not?—why should I waste my time longer?"

"One must be patient, Señor."

"Yes, but patience has its limits."

The Spaniard gave me a look of the deepest meaning.

"Señor," he said, "if you are wise you will wait and work yet longer."

I looked inquiringly at him, but he turned away, and before I could speak had gone. As I looked up I saw close beside me the trio before mentioned. They had evidently overheard our short conversation. They were exchanging glances. I turned away and began to whistle. In a few moments I was at my work again and they had gone.

I had scarcely given more than a dozen blows with my pick before I heard a shout of cry. I recognized the Spaniard's voice. It was in the direction of his hut. To seize my two revolvers, and to bound forward in the direction in which I heard the voice, was but the work of a moment.

There stood the Spaniard with the three men around him. He held his knife in his hand and stood at bay. They were all armed with axes.

"Help, Señor!" shouted the Spaniard.

"Back, you infernal fool!" cried "Sing Sing," waving me off.

"You murderous villains!" I exclaimed, leveling both revolvers. "If you don't make tracks double quick you'll never leave this place alive!"

The men fell back cowed completely by my terrible revolvers. The Spaniard smiled sarcastically, bowed to me, turned and coolly disappeared among the trees. The men walked off scowling and muttering. I, too, turned away.

An hour passed. I worked on. Still half an hour came. Great Heavens! can I ever forget that time—the moment when the hopes of years, the longing of a lifetime be fulfilled before me!

It was sunset. The clouds were all aflame. The river rolled gloriously by. The trees tossed their branches in the evening wind as though bidding the day farewell; from the forest came a burst of melody.

There I stood, a rough, ragged miner, in the bottom of a deep, wet, muddy hole. There I stood with thrills of rapture shooting through me. All my soul entranced, all my gaze riveted on one glittering mass at my feet.

I was master of wealth untold.

After the first burst of joy over a revulsion came. I had found my treasure, but how could I secure it? How could I carry it away unseen? Where should I take it? Or, if I did not carry it away, where should I hide it?

These thoughts flashed with the rapidity of light through my mind. I stood now overcome with perplexity.

I heard a movement above me. Looking up suddenly I thought I saw a dusky figure glide among the trees. "Is that Nigger?" I thought.

It was a lonely place. Around me the trio and the Spaniard—no other neighbors were near. The first were dangerous, the latter helpless. My strength lay in myself. My resolution was soon formed. I would bury as much of my treasure as I could carry in my tent, cover up the hole, and await my return.

It was ten o'clock before I had buried all that I wanted in my hut, and covered up my hole to my satisfaction. The extreme caution of the occasion already began to have its effects. I fancied I heard footsteps. A moment after I reached forth to get my revolvers, which, in my hurry and agitation, I had left in my tent some hours before.

The weapons were gone.

A cold sweat burst out upon me. I rushed back to the hole, hoping for a miracle. All a tall figure stood there. He had my pistols in his hands, displaying them with a triumphant gesture to two others.

It was "Nigger," with "Sing Sing" and "Pirate."

"I am lost!" I groaned. "To stay here is death, to go back to my hut is destruction. I am unarmed. These men would think no more of killing me than of crushing a fly." These thoughts came and passed in a moment.

Where should I go?

I could only think of the Spaniard. Without giving another moment's thought I turned and fled. My movements were seen. I was discovered. With a loud and savage shout they ran after me. Six bullets whistled past my head, but fortunately none touched me. If ever fear lent wings it was at that moment. I bounded along the path and down the hill and up on the other side toward where the Spaniard lived.

I heard them call on me to stop.

"Never mind," cried another voice, which I recognized as that of "Pirate;" "we'll get them both together this time."

On, on I ran. The clatter of footsteps was close behind.

With the frenzy of desperation, I rattled at the Spaniard's door. My pursuers were close upon me.

"Let me in! Save me!" I shouted.

Hurried footsteps sounded within. The bars rattled. I heard a heavy sound, I was pulled violently inside, the door was banged to and secured, and a heavy bloze of my pursuers fell upon it.

"Just in time!" no murmured, breathlessly.

"Up stairs, quick!"

He held a lantern in his hand. By its light I saw a rude ladder which ascended to an opening above. I clambered up as I was directed. The Spaniard came up after me.

"All right," said he, as he gave me a meaning glance.

The men below had dealt some tremendous blows at the door, which, yet held on, however. I heard them eagerly shouting to one another. They said not a word to us. "No quarter" was their motto.

A few minutes of silence elapsed. They had gone off. They soon returned, however. I heard their voices.

"This 'll fix 'em," said one.

A moment after a terrific blow, as if dealt by some gigantic hammer, fell upon the house. The ladder yielded. But in a moment a tremendous growl sounded out and drowned every other sound. It was a wild, savage roar. My blood was cold within me. I had heard the sound before, but never so near. Then there arose to heaven the wildest shrieks of human agonies for mercy.

The only answer was the terrific roar which had first sounded, and sounds as of breaking, crushing bones. A few minutes all was still. The Spaniard descended. He was not gone long.

"It's all over!" he said, returning.

I descended. There on the floor lay the mangled bodies of the three wretches, and in the corner was the gigantic form of the largest grizzly bear that I ever saw.

I left the hut and never saw the Spaniard again. In a few weeks I had my gold all safe in San Francisco, and was preparing to return to the East.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE had my WHEELER & WILSON Machine almost eight years, and have never ceased blessing the lucky chance that brought it to me. Not one cent has it cost for repairs, and I have broken but one needle in five and a half years. The same needle has gone through "thick and thin," for these I learned that it would answer to use fine thread or silk for every thing, I never change my needle, but use the same one to sew thick cloth of many folds that I use for hemming pocket-handkerchiefs. MRS. R. S. BROWN.

New Haven, Conn.

HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.—This is one of the neatest publications ever issued in this country. Contains Choice Music, Choice Music, Art Notes, and Select Reading for the family circle. A Magazine of this kind has been needed. HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY is bound to be a complete success.—[N. Y. Sun.]

A WIDE-AWAKE YOUTH'S PAPER.—THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, of Boston, numbers nearly a score of regular contributors for 1870. Many of them are among our best known and most brilliant writers.—[Com.]

NO RIVEDIN IN THE WORLD ever came into such universal use, or has so fully won the confidence of mankind, as the CURRY PECTORAL for the cure of Coughs, Colds, and Consumption.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS

A Novelty for Little Pupils!

HITCHCOCK'S 10-CENT

BOY'S and GIRL'S

MUSICAL ALBUM,

Containing Six Popular Instrumental Pieces for Practice, arranged for little fingers. Contents of No. 1: Little Mayne Boys, Polka, Kids, Up in a Balloon, Flying Trapeze, Not for Joseph, Champagne Charlie. Sold by all Booksellers and Newsdealers, and mailed on receipt of price, 10 cents.

Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 24 Beekman St., New York.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S

Establishment for the sale of

HOUSE FURNISHING

Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at

1172 Broadway, cor. 28th Street.

Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Work of their own manufacture. On household articles requiring Replating done on short notice. They are also prepared to contract for Bell Work and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

MAPLE LEAVES, enlarged and improved. The best, the most popular, and the cheapest Magazine published. It will be sent from now to the end of 1870 for 50 cents. Send in your subscriptions without delay.

O. A. ROORBACH, 102 Nassau St., New York.

NASBY'S PAPER.

The Toledo Blade.

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns filled with News from all parts of the World, Choice original and selected Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit and Humor; a Commercial Department, a Religious Department, a Young Folks' Department, and an Agricultural Department, all prepared expressly for the BLADE. It is the constant aim of the Proprietors to make the BLADE a truly National Newspaper—not a paper for the East, the West, the North, or the South, but for The Whole Country.

PETROLEUM V. NASBY, P.M.

No humorous literature of the age has been more universally read and enjoyed than the letters of "PETROLEUM NASBY." Aiming always at the correction of some evil, combining a practical philosophy and unanswerable arguments with the keenest wit and richest humor, the "Confederate X Roads" Preacher has become famous wherever the English language is read. These letters are written expressly for the BLADE, and will be continued regularly in its columns.

A NEW STORY.—MR. LOCKE (PETROLEUM V. NASBY), is now engaged on a new story, entitled "PAUL DENMAN; OR, LOST AND SAVED." A Story of the Great Rebellion. This thrilling story will be published in the columns of the BLADE during the coming year, and of itself will be pronounced by every reader worth many times the subscription price of the paper.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per Year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten and over, $1 50 each, and an extra copy to every person getting up a Club.

PAY! PAY! PAY! We pay liberally, in cash, all who assist us in extending the circulation of the BLADE.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent at every Post-Office in the United States. Send for our Special Circular to Agents.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Send for a copy, and at the same time give us the address of a dozen or so of your friends, at as many different Post-Offices, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid. Address

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,

Toledo, Ohio.

STILL FURTHER REDUCTION

at retail,

in

Garner & Co.'s newest style, latest pattern

PRINTS,

to 50 cents per yard:

less than manufacturers' package prices.

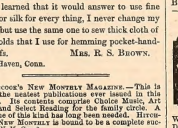
Also,

WAMSUTTA PRINTS, 8 cents per yard.

A. T. STEWART & CO.,

Broadway, Fourth Avenue, and Tenth Street.

$10, $12, $15, $20, $25.



Watches and Imitation Brazilian and Australian Diamond Jewelry. New Styles Oroide Gold Chains, $3 to $10 each. Call or send for Price-List.

JOHN FOGGAN,
No. 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Nos. 75 and 77 Sixth Avenue, corner Grosby.

ESTABLISHED 1830.

Wholesale and retail manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c., suitable for city and country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

SLOW HORSES made Fast and Fast Horses made Faster. The unabridged Sporting Journal containing these articles complete, only 15 cents. HORSE HUNNER says, in N. Y. Sunday, Oct. 16, they are very interesting and instructive, and alone worth the price of the publication.

HUNTING and TRAPPING, and how to Dress and Tan Skins and Furs, &c. The Journals with these complete, only 10 cents. Exposures of Humbugs in every Number.

JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., New York.

"One of the ablest and best."

Thus speaks of the agricultural department of the

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

which is noted for the excellence and fullness of its Market and Crop Reports, and the great extent of its correspondence with practical farmers.

TERMS: $2 00 a year for the Weekly, or $1 50 for the Monthly. Send stamp for specimen and premium list.

R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for our new work; sells to all classes, without regard to politics, religion, or occupation. How Ready!

Our Home Physician.

A new Handy-Book of Family Medicine. By GEORGE M. BEARD, A.M., M.D., of the University of the City of New York. This is new work, written up to date. Contains many valuable hints, and valuable prescriptions. Send for 16-page circular.

R. B. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 654 Broadway, N. Y.; TREAT & BILLEY, 117 So. Clark St., Chicago, Ill.

HITCHCOCK'S NEW

MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR NOVEMBER.

CONTENTS:

CARLOTTA PATTI.....Portrait and Biography.
CARLOTTA ALBANI..... "
STORY OF ZOROASTER.....By Andrew Ramsay.
THE FAST AGE.....Editorial.
READ MUSIC WELL..... " POPULAR MUSIC AS POPULAR PRICES..... " GOSSIP..... "
HOME, SWEET HOME.....By Waverly.
MCDONALD CLARK..... "
ART NOTES.....Special Contributors.
MUSICAL..... "
DRAMATIC..... "
POETICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.....Original.

MUSIC.

DEAR HEARTH AND HOME.....By J. R. Thome.
MY DEAREST ONE, FOR THEE.....J. G. Mosher.
MAIDEN'S PRAYER.....C. Beverly.
"YOU ZARE?".....C. M. Currier.

Read what Moore's Rural New-Yorker says:

"HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.—If the excellent taste which characterizes this first issue of a new musical periodical is but a prelude of what is to come, then it will rather may rest assured of success. Handsomely illustrated, beautifully printed, and well filled with the choicest pieces of literature supplied by the best writers of music—such as biographies of Musician and Lecturers on Music, Musical and Instrumental Gossip, a very attractive and valuable."

This Magazine is sold by booksellers and newsdealers generally, and mailed to subscribers

AT $3 per Year.

Specimen copies sent, postpaid, on receipt of 25 cents. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
24 Beekman Street, New York.

Malarious Fogs.

Countless millions of chilly feet of malarious vapor reek from the moist earth every twenty-four hours during the month of November. This evaporated moisture is the active principle which begets fever and ague, bilious remittents, indigestion, dysentery, bilious cholic, rheumatism, and many other ailments which prevail more generally in the Fall than at other seasons, and some of which, in low, swampy regions and new clearings, take the form of virulent malignancies. The best safeguard against these complaints, as evidenced by the experience of a long series of years, is the most pleasing and at the same time the most efficient of all vegetable tonics. The invigoration of the system is manifestly the best means of defending it against the attacks of sickness, whether epidemic, local or casual. Nature, as every pathologist knows, is the most determined enemy of disease, and the purpose of a remedy mainly are in most instances the consequences of the efforts she makes to conquer the foe. The great object, therefore, of preventive treatment, is to reinforce the system, and it is accomplished thoroughly, rapidly, and safely, by the use of

HOSTETTER'S

STOMACH BITTERS,

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS.

This powerful tonic contains also an aperient and corrective principle. It is no less valuable as a regulator and purifier than as an invigorant, and while the danger of exciting the brain or over-stimulating the circulation by employing it as an antidote.

IMPROVED ALUMINUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any now offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. In case of Silver, I expose the attention of scientific men, and have not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and in all these goods are manufactured in my own factory. I am enabled to warrant them an excellent time piece.

Prices from $10 to $25.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

Goods sent C. O. D., with charges.
Address JULES D. HUGUENIN WILLEMIN,
Locle, Neuchatel, Switzerland.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all the time, their spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make the unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

CIRCULATE IT WIDELY.

IT WILL DO GOOD WHEREVER IT IS READ.

NEW YORK OBSERVER.

$3 50 PER ANNUM.

SAMPLE COPIES FREE.

SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,
37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

BOOSEY'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.—A Complete Catalogue now ready. Send free. Boosey's Ballad Singer, the new Half-Dime Series of the Best Songs. Sold everywhere. Specimen Number mailed for Five Cents.—64 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 $20. $15 $25.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Grade). These justly celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established, as to require no recommendation. Prices:—Horizontal Watches, $10, equal in appearance and for time to Gold Watches worth $100. Full-Jeweled Levers, $15, equal to $150 Gold ones. Full-Jeweled Levers, extra fine and superior finish, $20, equal to $200 Gold ones.

We have just commenced making a very fine American Watch, full jeweled, Patent Lever, chronometer balance, adjusted to heat, cold, isochronism and position, down weight, equal in appearance and for time to a Gold Watch costing $150.

We charge only $35 for these magnificent Watches.

The above prices are for Gentlemen's sized "Soldiers' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $2 to $8. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal in quality and prices to the prices.

CALIFORNIA DIAMONDS.

We are now making jewelry of the California Diamonds. These are real stones of great brilliancy and hardness, and can not be distinguished from the genuine stones, even by good judges. They are particularly brilliant at night by artificial light, do not scratch or become dull by use, and retain their brilliancy for a considerable time. The following are the prices:

Ladies' and Gents' Finger Rings, single stones,

one carat.....$5 each
Gents' Pins, single stone, according to the size of the stone.....$4 to $6
Ladies' Cluster Pins.....$7 50
Ladies' Clasp Pins.....$7 50

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free.

Watches sent C. O. D., to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 358 Broadway, New York.

FRENCH CLOCKS,

BRONZES,

FANCY GOODS,

MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,

Opera Glasses,

FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,

PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES,

AND

WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,

No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

S. W. GEERY,

IMPORTER,

Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Tea, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,

Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 76 Broadway,
Established in 1850. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been a special business of the House.

My stock comprises some of the Oldest Liquors in the country.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Business, which will be supplied by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

WATERS'

NEW SCALE PIANOS.

With Iron Frame, Overstrung Bass and Agraffe Bridge.

Melodeons and Cabinet Organs.

The best manufactured. Warranted 5 years.

Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs.—Prices greatly reduced for Cash, or Installments. From $75 and upward. New Cabinet Organs, $46 and upward. Second-hand Instruments, $30 and upward. Monthly installments received. Warerooms, 481 Broadway, N. Y.

FOWLE'S PILE AND HUMOR CURE.

The greatest and only medicine in the world that is Warranted a Perfect Cure for all kinds of Piles, Tumors, Scrofula, Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Abscesses and Diseases of the Skin and Blood. Internal and external use. Entirely vegetable. In case of failure, I request all dealers to return money, and charge it back to me. Sold by Druggists. H. H. FOWLE, Sole Proprietor, Boston. Sold every where. Send for Circulars.

HOLIDAY JOURNAL FOR 1870.

Containing a Choice Collection of Tales, Poetry, Stories, and Wonders. 16 large pages, Illustrated. Sent FREE on receipt of a two cent stamp. Address ADAMS & CO., 25 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about the presses, type, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen book of type, cuts, borders, &c., 25 cents. Address ADAMS PRESS CO., 53 Murray Street, New York.

AGENTS! AGENTS! AGENTS!

NOW There is!! Something New! Attractive! Valuable! Just out! Sells like wildfire! Every body wants it! Every Family wants! Something for Holidays! 100 more Agents wanted at once! Sales from $10 to $20 per day. A young lady makes $23.40 in one half day! Others can do the same. Large Illustrated Circular sent free. Send for my private circular. W. J. HOLLAND, Springfield, Mass., or Chicago, Ill.

A GENTS wanted every where. Brown's Patent Double Ice-Cone Ventilating Damper gives the most heat from the least fuel. No Ranges, Furnaces, or Stoves complete. O.R. BRIGGS & CO., 184 Washington St., N.Y.

5000 Agents Wanted. A sample sent free, with terms to clear from $10 to $20 per day. Two entirely new articles. Salable as flour. Address N. H. WHITE, Newark, New Jersey.

HALL'S JOURNAL OF HEALTH for 1870 is Free to any person who writes, very briefly illustrated with Pictures. Clubs with RAILWAYS for $1 above their subscription price. Address 176 Broadway, N. Y.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and amusing. 10 cents. LIBRARY OF LOVE, 25 cents. Send to W. C. WEBSTER, 3 Astor Place, N.Y.

LITTLE, BROWN, & COMPANY

Publish this Day:

PARKMAN'S

DISCOVERY of the GREAT WEST

8vo. Cloth. $2 50.

This volume embodies the exploits and adventures of the first European explorers of the Valley of the Mississippi; the efforts of the French to secure the whole interior of the continent; the attempt of La Salle to find a westward passage to India, his colony on the Illinois, and his plan of invading Mexico, his contest with the Jesuits, and his assassination by his own followers. The narrative is founded entirely on contemporary documents, including many unpublished letters and journals of the chief explorers, which, for the first time, place in a clear light one of the most interesting and striking portions of American History.

JUVENTUS MUNDI.

The Gods and Men of the Heroic Age.

BY THE RT. HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

Crown 8vo. Cloth. $3 50.

In this edition all the references to the Poems of Homer have been carefully verified, and nearly two hundred errors corrected.

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!

NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It is a remedy for the unbearable loss of the harmless liquids—they are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing and powerful curatives. Relief and comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in due course of time. It combines through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up as it flows from head-ovarians all the wretched symptoms, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat, "cold in the head," sneezing, dizziness, loss of memory, dimness of vision, and restores the sense of taste and smell. It literally annihilates this loathsome malady in all its forms forever, and cures the most distressing cases. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, office 11 Ann St., N. Y.

LIVINGSTON'S PATENT

BRACED RUBBER SAW.

PATENT GROUND.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 16 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

PAINTER'S Manual gives best methods and latest improvements in House painting, Sign painting, Graining, Varnishing, Polishing, Staining, Gilding, Glazing, Silvering, Grecian Oil-Painting, Chinese Painting, Oriental painting, &c. &c. Also, Principles of Glass-Staining, Harmony and Contrast of Colors, Analysis of Colors, Philosophy, Theories, and Practice of Color, &c., &c. 8o cents. Sold by all dealers, or sent by mail on receipt of price.

JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 NASSAU St., New York.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN ARE BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Prices of Presses, $3, $10, $18, $30, $50, $76, $105, $216, $310, $360. Send for a circular to LOVE PRESS CO., 16 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machines. The best machine in the world. 3000 stitches a minute. Licensed under sewing machine combination. Address for circular,

THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.: or St. Louis, Mo.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR

PRIEST and NUN.

Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 130½ Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WANTED—AGENTS, to sell the AMERICAN LIFE SAVING Machine. Price $30. The simplest, cheapest, and best Lifting Machine ever invented. Will lift a drowning person from any depth. Liberal inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN LIFE SAVING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

$40 for a beautiful Set of Teeth on Gold, $20 on PLATINA, $10 to $20 on ALUMINUM and RUBBER, at the DR. SON'S Dental Institute, 117 East 23d St. (near 4th Avenue).

THE MEXICAN; or, LOVE AND LAWLESSNESS. By Capt. Mayne Reid. Illus., 12mo., 368 pages, cloth binding. By mail, $1, post free. Address BEADLE & ADAMS, 98 William St., New York.

PEABODY Stationery Packages, 50 cents.—Beautiful Box of Paper and Envelopes. Address NEW ENGLAND PAPER COMPANY, Box 674, Post-Office, New York.

$200 to $300 PER MONTH made by any man with Stencils and Key Checks. Sample and Catalogue sent free. Address S. M. SPENCER, 411 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

$7 SEWING MACHINE.—Elegant and simple. The well known beaviest Beaver Cloth, Leather, or Linen. Address Star Sewing Machine Co., 111 Broadway, New York. Liberal discount to agents.

THE SOPHIANO. A Musical Wonder. By JANE E. ROCHFORD. Illustrated. Cloth, $2 00. LORING, Publisher, Boston.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

TERMS FOR 1870.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, six Copies for $20 00.

Postage included for all subscribers in the United States.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE & WEEKLY, each, for the County of Sales 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where the paper is delivered. In the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 20 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 10 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Such periodical will stop when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written, and the direction to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

☞ New Subscribers to either of Harper's Periodicals can furnish themselves in the present time to the close of 1870 for Four Dollars.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $63; Eighth Page, $32; One Inch, space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line, each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS. Complete. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition. Each Novel in 1 vol. 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents per volume. The set complete in 12 vols., $9 00.

2.

ADAM BEDE.
THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.
SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE AND SILAS MARNER.
ROMOLA.

3.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The French Revolution." "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

4.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and the Sea Monsters," "The Tropical Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.

4.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Land at Last," "Land at Least," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

5.

THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE, King of Naples and of Italy. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. Uniform with the Student's Histories of France.

6.

A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK; or, A County Family. A Novel. By the Author of "One of the Family," "Young Port," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812. By Benson J. Lossing. A Cyclopædia of History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Second War for American Independence. Illustrated by Lossing, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution," &c. With 1,500 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1094 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $6 50; Sheep, $7 50; Half Roan, $8 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

8.

THE MINISTER'S WIFE. A Novel. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "Perpetual Curate," "Salem Chapel," "Margaret Maitland," "Brownlows," "Agnes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either HARPER'S WEEKLY, HARPER'S MAGAZINE, or THEOLOGICAL JOURNAL, sent to one address for $3 00, by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without drugs. Full directions, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any color of hair or beard to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1. For sale by Merchants & Druggists generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

$25 A DAY.—32 new articles for Agents. Samples free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fuller, N. Y.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

A NEW DISCOVERY!!

PHALON'S

"VITALIA;"

OR,

Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaccident matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the directions being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!

AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,

CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,

517 Broadway, N. Y.

TO THE LADIES.—One week's time, pleasantly employed, will pay for a first-rate Sewing MACHINE. Address COREY D. RELSEY, 120 Lexington Ave., New York.

EDWARD SEARS' ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT, 40 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEADSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KENDRIX BROS., Indianapolis, Ind.; BRADFORD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 674.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

CHARLES A. DANA.

CHARLES ANDERSON DANA was born in Hinsdale, New Hampshire, August 8, 1819. He is one of the old New England stock of DANAS. His father failed in business. The son attended the district school two winters, when, at the age of eleven, he went to Buffalo, and entered his uncle's dry-goods store. Here all his leisure moments were given to study. An inveterate reader, he stored his mind with knowledge of every kind. In 1837 the failure of his uncle threw him upon his oars. For two years young DANA was engaged in settling up the business of the establishment. Within that time he prepared himself for college, and finally entered Harvard University at the age of twenty. He had a great predilection for the classics, and became unusually proficient in the Greek, Latin, and German languages. Close application to his studies seriously affected his eyesight, and on this account he left the college, in 1841, without regular graduation. Harvard subsequently gave him his degree, and his name appears upon the catalogue among the list of graduates.

On leaving college Mr. DANA joined the Brook Farm community. This was one of the first socialist experiments in this country. While there Mr. DANA became acquainted with MARGARET FULLER, GEORGE RIPLEY, A. BRONSON ALCOTT, NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, ORESTES A. BROWSON, THOREAU, THEODORE PARKER, and others. The farm was situated near West Roxbury, Massachusetts. Mr. DANA had charge of its fruit department several years. During this time he partly edited a small newspaper called the Harbinger. In 1846 the community was dissolved. Mr. DANA, then twenty-seven years of age, sought employment in Boston. He accepted an office from ELIZUR WRIGHT, then proprietor and editor of the Chronotype. Mr. DANA wrote editorial articles for that journal, and made himself generally useful, for a salary of five dollars per week. He came to New York in February, 1847, and succeeded GEORGE G. FOSTER as city editor of the Tribune. He was at first paid $10 per week; in the fall this amount was increased to $14. At once he took an advanced position as a journalist.

On the breaking out of the French Revolution in 1848 Mr. DANA went to Europe. He was absent nine months. During that time he visited the principal cities on the Continent, at an expense of less than $600. He earned, by his correspondence, enough to pay all his expenses and support his family. On his return he was made Mr. GREELEY'S principal assistant, at a salary of $20 per week. In two years this stipend was increased to $35, and in 1856 he was paid $2500 per year. This was equal to Mr. GREELEY'S salary, and was the largest received by Mr. DANA while employed on the Tribune. In 1856 Mr. DANA compiled his "Household Book of English Poetry, and in 1858 he and GEORGE RIPLEY began their labors upon the "New American Encyclopædia." Mr. DANA was associated with Mr. GREELEY on the Tribune until April 1, 1862, when he resigned his position and left the office. It is simply just to say that under his management the Tribune became a recognized political power, and acquired an influence until then unknown among American newspapers. Soon after leaving the Tribune, Mr. DANA was appointed by EDWIN M. STANTON, then Secretary of War, one of the committee to settle the accounts of the Quartermaster's Department at Cairo. His associates were GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, and Judge LOGAN, of Illinois. The investigation involved millions of dollars. His labors at Cairo finished, Mr. DANA was appointed a commissioner to examine the affairs of the Pay Department in the Valley of the Mississippi. He went through GRANT'S Vicksburg campaign in the winter and spring of 1863. His reports to the War Department after the first failure to capture the Southern strong-hold silenced the enemies of General GRANT, and prevented the General's removal from his command. On Mr. DANA'S return to Washington he was appointed Assistant Secretary of War, with a salary of $3000 a year. He held this office until the close of the Rebellion.

CHARLES A. DANA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, NEW YORK.]

In 1865 he went to Chicago, and became editor of the Republican. After a year's service he sold out his interest at a profit of $10,000, and returned to New York. It was mainly through his personal instrumentality and influence that the Sun Association was formed. Mr. DANA took sole charge of the Sun on January 1, 1868. Since that time the Sun has taken a leading position among the journals of the country. Its daily circulation exceeds 75,000 copies. In April, 1869, Mr. DANA was offered the Appraisership of the port of New York. He declined it. Two weeks afterward he was arrested, at the suit of JOHN RUSSELL YOUNG, of the Tribune, for libel, damages being laid at $100,000. The suit has never been brought to trial.

In 1846 Mr. DANA married Miss ELVIRE MACDANIEL, who then resided in Walker Street. Four children, one boy and three girls, are the fruit of this union. Mr. DANA is now forty-nine years of age. He is five feet ten inches high, is well built, has a broad forehead, whiskers, mustache, and hair tinged with gray, small, keen eyes, and wears glasses. He dresses carelessly, and is one of the most courteous of men. He is true to his friends and unrelenting in his enmities. His editorial associates are treated as friends. He is never overbearing in his conduct toward them. Mr. DANA is one of the best linguists of the age, speaking nearly all the living languages of Europe.

THE "IRON AGE."

A CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE has recently been consulting with our ship-builders in relation to the decay of a trade once extended and profitable, and always honorable. The facts, as reported, seem as bad as had been expected, and it is even hinted that, unless some decided change is made in our policy, not only may American ship-building be considered a thing of the past, but the time is not far away when it may be impossible to find an American ship in which to cross the seas.

This question will soon call for earnest consideration. Meanwhile we are happy in being able to give one item in aid of its elucidation—one, too, which shows that affairs are not in quite so bad a way as has been supposed.

The bark Iron Age, of which we present a representation on page 756, has attracted the attention of a large number of our merchants during the past two or three weeks, while she lay at Counties Slip, loading for Galveston. She was built by HARLAN & HOLLINGSWORTH, of Wilmington, Delaware, for MESSRS. TUFFER & BRATTLE, of this city. She is the first large iron sailing vessel constructed in this country; and, as the owners state, cost about as little as the average of their Clyde estimates for a similar vessel. Experience has shown that iron vessels far exceed wooden ones in buoyancy, in strength, in carrying capacity, and in durability, and therefore is cheapness; and the materials at our command for their construction are so good that builders estimate American plate for the purpose equal to English plate of an eighth of an inch greater thickness.

The Iron Age is handsomely modeled, 155 feet in length, 34 feet 8 inches beam, 7 feet between decks, 18 feet 6 inches in depth of hold, and her register is 680 tons. She is provided with HERR'S patent steering apparatus, RITCHIE'S spirit compass, ADAIR'S Liverpool double-acting pump, THOTTMAN anchors, and wire standing-rigging to end all, is rated first-class by the American and French Lloyds.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1869.

PROSPECTS.

ALTHOUGH political parties nominally grow out of particular issues, they also represent tendencies of human nature; and in the history of all free governments this fact is constantly evident. Men, for instance, are naturally conservative, or incredulous and timid; or they are naturally progressive, inclined to believe that the new is the true, and that not to go forward is to go backward. Here we have the germs of the Tory party and the Opposition; the party that would hold fast and the party that would cut loose. The strife, indeed, often degenerates into a mere battle of the ins and the outs, but the fundamental principles and tendencies remain. Therefore it is a great error to suppose that, in our political situation, when the Fifteenth Amendment is adopted, parties will be wholly reconstructed upon new issues. The history of each party, its traditions, the character of its leaders and of its supporters, will always be vital elements in any augury of its prospects.

There is a loud cry upon the Democratic party from some of its organs not to race with dead issues, but to bury them. But why are they dead issues? Mr. VALLANDIGHAM exhorts it to cut loose from all settled issues and obsolete questions. But this cry has been heard ever since the war ended, and when the party dismounted from a dead horse or confessed any question to be obsolete? If any question might be considered beyond dispute it was that the elected citizens must be made politically equal. But almost without exception every Democratic convention of the autumn declared against that equality, and the Democratic party of New York voted against it. While this was the action of the party, its leaders were unchanged. It nominated General ROSECRANS in Ohio, but his letter declining the summons showed that he was not in accord with the party because he was not politically hide-bound, and it took its station elsewhere. Mr. PENDLETON. In Pennsylvania the hope of sloughing off dead issues and leaders by nominating General HANCOCK was baffled, and Mr. PACKER, an original Copperhead, was selected. In Massachusetts alone, where there was no hope of success, a man of newer ideas was put forward in Mr. JOSIAH QUINCY, ADAMS. In New York the same old leaders, with the same old cries, marshaled the old forces and directed the old assault upon equal rights and the defenses against legislative and electoral corruption.

The party remains the same, raises the old cries and follows the old leaders, because it is composed of substantially the same elements. It is not the intelligent and well-meaning Democrats who control the party policy. They are in ignorance and prejudice which are beneath them. The waves toss the boat—it is not the boat that governs the waves. There is not a Democratic leader in America for a generation who has dared to say "equal rights." How many of them who do not pander to the Roman Catholic element of the party? Mr. SEYMOUR, chief in the State of New York would venture to insist that Roman priests shall keep their hands off the public school system? Or will it be asked why the Democratic party does not throw over the old issues and the old leaders, the answer is that the one task that Hercules could not perform was to cast off the fatal robe. To strip off the robe was to kill himself.

The strength of the Republican party lies in the genius of intelligent, truly patriotic citizens. The strength of the Democratic party lies in the multitude of ignorant citizens. The Democratic policy for a generation has been the necessary result of that fact. It was an ignominious and cruel policy. But while this is still the fact, and until the party demands another kind of policy, what greater folly than to expect a frank acceptance of new issues and a preference of new men? Suppose the Legislature in this State restores the city of New York to its own control, as the phrase is, what then? The work will begin with the abolition of the Police Commission and the Registry law. Will that course diminish fraud and force at the polls? Is it conceivable that good citizens to vote? Is it conceivable that any of the great objects of government will be more certainly secured? Is it not evident that an election in the city will then be a mere fraud without even the pretense of a check? And is that the celebrated "self-government" of the city?

And why should a party composed of such elements as we have described renounce old issues and old leaders when it has just succeeded by clinging to them? They are agreeable to the party. When the Democratic party consents to be adopted, therefore, there will remain two political organizations, and they will be judged according to their career and tendency. The Democratic party has not now, and will not have then, any great financial policy, nor any record of more capable and honest administration of affairs upon which to appeal to the country. The Republicans will have the satisfactory administration of General GRANT, the steady reduction of the debt, the public confidence always pleased by a chief and Cabinet who are not technically politicians, and the conscious ness of the support of the better sentiment of the country. These are positive, not negative, advantages. Democratic declamation does not affect them. There is no Republican disaffection, nor will there be any such. The opposition may assume a position which neither its character, precedents, nor managers show to be probable or possible.

THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.

On the 8th of December the Great Council of the Roman Catholic Church will assemble at St. Peter's in Rome, amidst all the pomp with which that Church invests its chief events. It was supposed that the time that the sum mons of the Pope would be disregarded. But now all doubt is removed. Bishops, abbots, generals of monastic orders, and other ecclesiastics have received and accepted the call of their Holy Father; and from all lands they are moving in large numbers toward the capital of their faith.

But the Council will not be an Œcumenical Council in the proper sense of that term. Œcumenical, from the Greek word signifying the inhabited or civilized world, is synonymous with universal or general. Originally an Œcumenical Council was neither more nor less than a Parliament of the Emperor, to which all the bishops of the Empire were called. In the early Christian centuries the whole ecclesiastical organization of the Church was based on the secular system of the Empire. Hence the first seven Œcumenical Councils was called by the Roman Emperor, and at each of them he was present personally or by deputy; not as a member of them did he fail, directly or indirectly, to influence the discussions. CONSTANTINE was more than President at the first General Council—that of Nice; and LEXIS and THEODOSIUS presided at the seventh. This was the last Council regarded as Œcumenical by the Greek Church; for by this time the Church had begun to crumble to pieces, and an Œcumenical or General Council of the Church was found to be impossible. The Pope, however, did his best to occupy the old position of the Emperor; but from this date (787) the Greek Church stood aloof. The establishment of the Second Roman Empire by CHARLEMAGNE was completed and made permanent the religious and secular separation of the East from the West.

According to the Roman Catholic Church, twelve Councils, all of them General, have been held since the Second Council of Nice; but at none of these was the West or Eastern Church represented, and by that Church the decisions of those Councils have been disregarded. Attempts have frequently been made to reunite the Churches of the East and West; but, mainly in consequence of the pretensions of Rome, all such attempts have signally failed. The last Council called with that object that of Trent—a Council which was called for the purpose of making an end of Protestantism. It sat for eighteen years, but apparently failed to accomplish its object. It was never held as less Œcumenical than any of its eleven immediate predecessors, and for the very obvious reason that the Churches of the East and the Reformers of the Reformation were all of them unrepresented.

The present Pope, PIUS THE NINTH, not unmindful of the past and not unwilling to give a Catholic or Œcumenical authority to his objects and aims, issued invitations to the "Bishops of the Eastern Rite," to "Protestants and other non-Catholics." But the Bishops of the Eastern Rite have not only positively refused to recognize the Council, but have expressed themselves indignantly upon the terms of the invitation. While the Protestant Churches, mainly through the persistency of Dr. CUMMING, a Scottish divine in London, have learned that the invitation was not an invitation, but only a permission to return and penitently seek admission within the fold of Mother Church. The forthcoming Council will not, therefore, be Œcumenical in any true sense. It will not represent the Churches of the East, which have many millions of adherents. The Patriarchs of Alexandria, which is a more ancient See than that of Rome, Constantinople, which for many centuries was a more important See than that of Rome—and of Armenia, with their numerous suffragans, will be conspicuous by their absence. So the Churches of the Reformation—the Protestants of England, Scotland, and Ireland, of France and Switzerland, of the Netherlands, of North Germany, of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, of the United States of America, of Canada, of Australia—will all be unrepresented. Even of these, the Church in Russia will be absent, which, although a branch of the Greek Church, has an organization of its own. This immense empire, with its sixty millions of inhabitants, will not have a single representative in the Council.

JOSEPH DE MAISTRE pronounced an Œcumenical Council a chimera; and the forthcoming Council, despite its pretension, will be the best proof of DE MAISTRE's foresight. In a word, the Œcumenical Council of 1869 will be a Council only of the Roman Catholic Church, and a purely Ecclesiastical Council. For, unlike all previous Councils of the kind, it will be absolutely unsupported by the civil authorities of any kingdom, empire, or republic. It will be no more representative of the Christian world than a Methodist Conference, an Episcopal Convention, a Lutheran Council, or a Presbyterian General Assembly. It will be, as we have already said, only a Roman Catholic Council, considering the only matters of sentiment which prevails regarding it among the adherents of Rome, it will but very imperfectly represent even the Roman Catholic Church.

The Council will sit in St. Peter's Church, a part of which has been specially fitted as a council hall. There will be admitted to seats the portraits of distinguished churchmen. The floor is to be covered by a costly carpet, the gift of a king. Galleries have been erected for the accommodation of reporters, of official theologians, of embassadors, persons of rank, and members of royal families, who may seek admission. The only exceptions the Council will be strictly private. The Pope will preside in person or by his legate. The discussions, if there be any discussions, will be carried on in the Latin. But even the proceedings will reach the outside world; for the reporters will report only to the Council itself. The pageant of the opening will no doubt be magnificent, and the strangers who have come from far to see the spectacle are little likely to be disappointed. With the first day, however, the sensation will begin to end. After the first day the real work of the Council will begin; and thoughtful men all over the world will intently watch the progress of this last Papal experiment, whose failure would be a serious blow to the pretensions of Rome.

PERVERSION OF THE PUBLIC MONEY.

THE expression of public opinion in this State upon the proposition to give the public money to sectarian schools was last year so emphatic that the Legislature did not dare to do it directly. But in the City Tax levy there was a clause inserted, directing that a certain sum should be taken from the city revenues and given to certain schools. Mr. NATHANIEL JARVIS, JUN., was selected by the Board of Education to make the distribution, and after a careful investigation he has made a report to the Comptroller, in accordance with the provisions of the act. Nor is there any complaint that this part of the law has not been faithfully and honestly done. The result is, that $214,987 have been taken from the city money and given to fifty-three sectarian schools. Of these schools twenty-eight Roman Catholic schools receive $153,880, and twenty-eight Protestant schools receive $61,107.

The people of New York are taxed to support public schools in which all the children in the State may be educated. If the school accommodation is insufficient, it is the duty of the Board of Education to see that the difficulty by an increase of the tax. The words of the clause authorizing the sectarian distribution imply that the provision is made for children whom the public schools can not receive. But careful investigation shows that proper care would even now make room for all children, while it is notorious that the money for special sectarian schools is part of the plan of the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics to break down the system of public schools in the State. If the priests of the Church of Rome had control of the free schools of New York we should not have heard of insufficient accommodation, nor would there have been a special grant.

The hostility of the Roman clergy to public schools which they do not control is founded in the claim of their Church to an absolute domination of the life of every individual member. They assert that the important education is religious, and that their tenets are Christianity. A school, therefore, which does not teach religion is, in their view, atheistic. There must, therefore, be religious instruction in the schools; but that only true religion is Romanism. The Roman clergy also object to the Protestant version of the Bible, which is read without comment as an opening exercise in the public schools. They insist, therefore, that the Bible shall be excluded or prohibitive to their faith; and should they succeed in excluding it, they would strengthen their plea that the education in the public schools is irreligious, because there would be then neither religious form nor religious book used in them.

This is a contest which the people of New York should resist at the beginning. A single provision should be made for the instruction of all the children in the State in what are understood as the common branches of secular education. Beyond which child should be required to attend school, under proper penalties either upon his guardians or upon himself. Parents who preferred to educate their children at private schools would, of course, do so. Technical and sectarian religious instruction in the public schools should be forbidden, for there is already a sufficient provision for such instruction according to religious preferences of every kind. Moreover, in a community which taxes Jews, Roman Catholics, and Protestants indiscriminately for the support of schools, it is plainly just that the chief religious book of neither should be used in the school exercises, since it is only tolerated as necessary ill feeling. But the attempt to divert the money paid by all the people for the secular education of all the children to the support of a Jewish, or Roman Catholic, or Baptist, or Presbyterian, or Methodist, or Unitarian, or Episcopal school should be strenuously resisted as an assault upon the public peace.

It is a cardinal principle in this country that the state, as such, favors no form of religious faith whatever. The state, as such, has no religion. Such was the case of New York by fundamental law, is an association for protecting the absolute liberty of every citizen in the enjoyment of his religious faith, whatever it may be, or well as in the profession of it. The majority, therefore, whether it be Presbyterian, or Quaker, or Roman Catholic, or Jewish, or Anabaptist, has no right to compel the minority to support sectarian schools. But under the clause in the tax levy there is such compulsion. Here, for instance, are the Hebrew Free School No. 1, and the Public New York Protestant Episcopal Public School, and the Immaculate Conception School. These are all strictly sectarian schools, and the people who have already paid the tax to educate their pupils in the public schools, by this clause are taxed again to educate the same pupils under a particular religious influence. It is the beginning of the destruction of the public school system, and, although a sop is thrown to certain Protestant sects, it is the work of the spirit which is most hostile to that last system, and which will not relax any effort, open or hidden, for its subversion. Nothing can defeat this purpose of the Roman Catholic ecclesiasticism but the utmost vigilance. The Democratic party will yield in this direction whatever the Roman Catholic influence may require. And it is a curious fact that, while the system of public education has been taken by the state from the priests, in New York it is apparently getting to be doubtful whether the priests can not destroy the State system.

JOHN JONES.

IT is nobody's business that the stockholders of a railroad company pay honors to their engineers. Banks, insurance companies, associations of all kinds, very properly cause portraits and busts of their distinguished or beloved officers to be made at their own or their treasure. But if a savings-bank, having ordered a portrait of its president, should invite the President of the United States and all other distinguished persons to attend the ceremony of hanging it upon the wall of the directors' room, and should solicit the interest of the public by advertisements and circulars, it would be very churlish in the public not, at least, to ask the question who is this gentleman, and why is there such a tremendous flutter? Who and what are the associates have hung up his portrait?

When the statue of GEORGE PEABODY by WILLIAM STORY was lately unveiled in London, every body felt that there was great propriety in thus visibly commemorating, in the heart of the business of London, a merchant who had given vast sums of money for the benefit of others. If a bust of Mr. PETER COOPER, or of Mr. EZRA CORNELL, or of Mr. MATTHEW VASSAR should appear in the Central Park, it would be instantly perceived that they were the memorials of great public benefactors. Memorial statues are grateful witnesses of a sense of public obligation to individual men, except when a king builds his own statue at the expense of his people, or the directors of a hospital or other institution perpetuate their chief in bronze or marble. That a man has remarkable sagacity, which enables him to amass a huge fortune, and even to become one of the richest men in the world, is of no public importance, nor can the fact be supposed to excite any especial general admiration or gratitude. But a man who devotes his powers and his resources, whether money or time or talents, to the relief and improvement of his fellow-men, takes his place with HOWARD or FRANKLIN or JENNER.

The youth of a country should stand before the statues of their fathers, not to admire certain qualities which are given by nature, but to contemplate the purposes to which those qualities were directed. A boy, looking at the portrait of JOHN HOWARD, may feel that he has not the opportunity nor the gifts to do precisely what HOWARD did, but he will feel that, in his sphere and according to his powers, he also can carry a heart of sympathy and relieve human suffering wherever he goes. But the same boy, looking at a statue of JOHN JONES, for example, and being told that he was the richest man in the world and made all his own money, will probably answer, "What's JOHN JONES to me, or what am I to JOHN JONES?" There are plenty of JOHN JONESES who have made more or less money, and who have not been especially stingy. But certainly JOHN JONES, who is worth a hundred millions of dollars and gives fifty thousand dollars to a charity, does not so well deserve a statue as a sailor who has starvation wages and gives part of them to an orphan asylum. If indeed, the stockholders of JOHN JONES's factory choose to build a statue to him, it is their privilege. But why should they take a speaking-trumpet on the occasion, and answer every body's attention, and talk about "worthy models and proper lessons?"

ENGLAND'S DIFFICULTIES.

In the speech of MR. GLADSTONE in London, at the Lord Mayor's inauguration, the significant confession is made that, "Whatever the tendencies of modern civilization—whatever its triumphs," "they have not had, nor are they likely to have in our day or in our children's, the effect of lightening the responsibilities of the Government."

That difficulties thicken about the English is very apparent. They consist of terrorism in Ireland; a supposed dangerous increase of power in the uneducated classes; a growing inferiority in the manufactures which command universal competition; the inability to produce food with in a hundred millions sterling in value of the quantity annually consumed; and the steady growth of pauperism. Political and economical troubles arise together to perplex those who have the largest interest in maintaining order.

Ever since the reform bill the trades unions was due to the number of laborers standing on the verge of pauperism, and who, as more and more food was needed to be imported, were thrust into that hopeless condition. The laborers of the Continent, quieted by cheaper food and happier circumstances, are strangers to the combinations which in England have lowered the skill, impaired the morals, and diminished the effectiveness of their manufacturing industry, as compared with that of France, Belgium, and Germany. The superiority of the latter in many respects over the English, added to other causes, is, however, having its effects. At Bolton, in Lancashire, the laborers a few days ago treated the demand for a reduction of five per cent. on the wages paid in cotton factories with a respect wholly unknown. In various other departments of industry strikes have been settled by workmen on a basis which concedes the inability of the capitalist to continue high wages in the face of the competition to which labor is now exposed. This change in tone comes late, but it is yet possible to create a joint interest between classes hitherto opposed which may so improve the habits and industry of the operative as to make English competition with the world on the basis of free-trade harmless to the Kingdom. Complete harmony is now essential to success.

The slow recovery in England from the financial explosion which, in 1866, followed the wildly speculative creation of companies on the policy of a limited liability, and the unexpected and unwelcome termination of the war in the United States, is attributed by many to the high price of raw cotton; but the English grain crops of 1867 and 1868 having been bad, the large population, deprived of much of their food, were only small consumers of manufactured products. The diminished consumption of cotton goods in 1867 in England was equivalent to 50,000,000 pounds weight. Other manufacturing nations in Europe had to pay for raw cotton on the same or worse terms than the English—they were supplied with it largely through England—but whatever suffering they encountered from the high price of that staple was not attributed to a cause applicable equally to all nations except India and the United States, which were both growers and manufacturers of cotton. Portions of the English manufacturers clamor for protection instead of free-trade, and for encouraging the growth of cotton in expensive India, as the remedies for unprofitable labor. But protection would concede inferiority and prevent recuperation; and the effort to elevate this culture in India will be fruitless against the superior climate and lands of the cotton-growing region in the South, and against the education and skill of Southern planters, who can raise enough of this staple at low prices—which must soon prevail—to supply the world.

When the true causes of English stagnation are fully understood and admitted, a powerful effort will be made to remove those restrictions on the part of capital and labor, to recover the lost ground, even although reciprocity in the policy of other nations may not be allowed. The ground assumed by the English of ability to compete with all others, which for years was successfully maintained, can not be abandoned without continued and hopeless distress.

It is supposed that a million of laboring men in England, with their families, numbering four millions more, might be converted into agricultural laborers, if the land now appropriated to the parks of the aristocracy were opened to cultivation. As the struggle now going on involves the life or death of those who do not emigrate, it would seem that these parks must be applied to cultivation under a system of laws which no longer encourage landed accumulation. This change will undoubtedly help the industry of England, but at the expense of the property which, held by gross neglect of high duties, and by a dedication of their lives to frivolities and dissipation, have wasted and forfeited, their hereditary claims. The increasing power of the uneducated classes has been invited by rulers whose prestige and strength have been voluntarily wasted.

The gravest difficulty which now disturbs the nation is the Irish question—not free, in the view of many, of complication with the United States. The large immigration into the United States of Irishmen loaded with hostility to England, and their connection with the Democratic party, create the fear that in the Democracy should succeed in the elections, the Government here might be urged into at least a very unfriendly attitude to England. But apart from this complication the question in its domestic shape threatens the peace of the Kingdom. Sympathy with Ireland, on the ground of oppression which can not be practiced by landlords, has moved those laboring classes which have lately been invested with the ballot; and threatens to involve the whole without much obstruction from the Government. Landlords are driven away, and the tenant is likely to become master of the field in scorn of English ascendency.

The difficulty is much deeper than is admitted. The difference in religion is at the bottom of it—a contest which can not be settled to be composed except on the basis of a complete triumph. The question is part of the wider one which has conquered nations once, and the universal prevalence of Roman Catholicism. The human mind fails to measure the extent of this conflict, which has been active since the Reformation, and is now struggling every where for empire. England may gain peace for a time by conceding independence to Ireland, but in the end she must be—must ultimately share in the universal struggle.

In looking at the present aspect of things, it would seem that Providence is furnishing the world with additional proof that it is not here that happiness and repose may be found, at least when just conditions are neglected. Spain and Italy are convulsed with revolution. France is disturbed with fear of such an event in case of NAPOLEON'S death. Some of the South American republics are in arms. China full insists on overthrowing the power of England for the first time abandons her colonial policy, fearing that its continuance may embroil her with other powers. The United States affords evidence, in many portions of it, that our republican system is afflicted with such deep corruption as to produce the apprehensions which drew from the English premier his gravest but ominous admissions. The times call for wisdom, virtue, and prudence there and here, or wide-spread confusion may follow. England must summon all of her resolution to overcome the serious difficulties which threaten her industry and her government.

YOUNG MEDICAL GENTLEMEN.

In the golden age of the Republic, Captain RYNDERS and his mob silenced MRS. LUCRETIA MOTT, in the Broadway Tabernacle, because of her intolerant and incendiary declaration of the equal right of innocent Americans to personal liberty. But Captain RYNDERS and his mob, although characteristic defenders of the true Democratic faith and practice, had symptoms of public decency, failed to save the great Goliath for whom they fought. The gentle words of MRS. MOTT were more powerful than all the oaths and shillalahs of the Empire Club, and, like the smooth stones from the brook, slew the huge giant of the Captain's idolatry.

It is a lesson which the young gentlemen of the Philadelphia Medical School might ponder with advantage. The authorities recently opened the medical lectures of the school to young women, and a class of twenty-five attended. They were modest, intelligent, and sincerely interested in the study of a profession which, in many branches and under many circumstances, it is most desirable that women should practice, and of course should practice with every advantage and with the best possible preparation. In the lecture hall, with the twenty-five young women, sat three or four hundred other young persons, sarcastically called young gentlemen. These last indulged their wit and humor before the beginning of the lecture by shouting, "Ha! ha!" to two or three of the managers of the hospital who were Quakers. After the lecture began, they were quiet. But the lecture was followed by a case of practical surgery, the treatment of a young man with a broken thigh. In the midst of the operation the young gentlemen burst into roars of mock applause, stamping, clapping, and shouting whenever it advanced at the twenty-five young women, who sat calmly, intent upon their duty. But lest the manifest desertion of their proper sphere by the young women hat not been sufficiently demonstrated by the young gentlemen, the latter, when the ladies came out, crowded them from the footwalk into the carriage across the hospital grounds.

Like the conduct of Captain RYNDERS and his mob, this of the Philadelphia young gentlemen was brave and manly. But, we fear, that it is, like the other, the full fail of its purpose. If there are young women—and we assure them young gentlemen that there are a great many—who are anxious to accomplish themselves in medical and surgical science and practice, they know that the most disgusting obstacle they will encounter is not the nature of the study, but the conduct of the young gentlemen, their fellow-students. Are those young gentlemen not able to see that such conduct as theirs of the other day, instead of persuading modest women that women should not pursue such studies, only deepens the resolve of every self-respecting woman that she will do all that she can by example to help sisters who are inclined to these studies, were it only to save herself in delicate and critical moments from the possible misconception and professional treatment of the other sex?

GENERAL JORDAN UPON CUBA.

GENERAL JORDAN, Adjutant-General of the Army of Cuba, gives in a recent letter some information as to the military situation of the country as he views it. He says that the Cuban cause has no absolute need of foreign soldiers of any kind. Cuba can arm numbers 26,800 men who have arms; and it is followed by 40,000 liberated slaves armed with the machetes—a weapon half hatchet and half machete. The people are in arms and clothed. If the Cubans had 75,000 stands of arms, he is very sure they could end the war in ninety days. They have conquered the large cities and ports because, having no artillery, they could not hold them. Meanwhile there are 30,000 Cuban ladies "living an ordinary life, half starved, half naked, half useless, suffering indescribably, and absolutely requiring clothes and shelter.

This statement from the camp of the revolutionary army is certainly not encouraging for the Cuban cause. General JORDAN does not say that the revolutionary leaders have money to spend between a bright hope and the eastern Pacific Railroad passenger train. A Pullman palace car, with other passenger cars were demolished, and from fifteen to twenty persons injured.

The large frame building known as the Republican Wigwam, at Chicago, was destroyed by fire on the night of the 18th.

The first stone of the new Post-office building in the city was laid on the afternoon of the 18th.

Among Kendall, the veteran politician, died in Washington, on Thursday, in his eighty-fifth year. He was one of the delegates to the Chicago Democratic Convention which nominated General McClellan for President.

Major-General Wool died at TROY, November 10, in his eighty-fifth year.

Hon. ROBERT A. Walker died at his residence, in Washington, November 11, aged sixty-eight.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Bishop of London on the 15th delivered a funeral sermon on the late Queen Dowager of Westminster Abbey. The Bishop said no untitled commoner ever died around his grave so large a concourse of sincere mourners as George Peabody. The sermon, although a long one, is full of high praise for others, especially for the poor. Simple in his habits, unostentatious, a man of great wealth, his enjoyment is beneficence. It was his business to gather riches that he might give it away. His name would be the heritage of two great nations, and would be honored by millions of the cool-headed Old and New America.

George Peabody, just before his death, made an additional donation of £150,000 to the Peabody Fund in aid of the London poor.

A monster demonstration in honor of Henri Rochefort was made in the streets of Paris on the night of November 12.

The Italian Cabinet approves of the choice of the Duke of Genoa for the Spanish throne.

Admiral Topete has been elected Vice-President of the Spanish Cortes.

The cold lists more than 600 Americans attend the German universities.

The entire Russian army is to be provided with breech-loaders.

Latin will be the language of the Œcumenical Council, and a uniform pronunciation is to be fixed, in order that the assembly, owing to the diversity of accents, need not degenerate into a second Tower of Babel.

The Bishop of Orleans, France, declares that he will abide by the decisions of the Œcumenical Council, whether they be right or wrong. The Archbishop of Paris, on November 1, opposing the adoption of Papal infallibility by the Council, without discussion, is reported to have been instigated by Napoleon.

Transcribed by Google

THE SCHOOL-SHIP "MERCURY."

It is only quite recently that practical philanthropists have directed their attention to the homeless boys of our large cities. It was known that our criminal classes were fed from these "Arabs" of the street; but beyond the punishment of those detected in guilt nothing was done—no effort was made in a practicable and sensible way, looking toward the prevention of crime or the rescue of unfortunate youth. Lately, however, something has been accomplished in this direction by the Children's Aid Refuge. This plan locked in one important respect. Escaping from the Refuge, the boys in most cases went back to the street, and, under the influence of the old temptations, resumed their former evil courses.

We think it was in Boston that the idea first originated of training neglected boys for seamen. A school-ship was instituted for this purpose in Boston; and our Commissioners of Public Charities have adopted a similar idea in this city, and the boys from Blackwell's and Hart's islands have been drafted into the school-ship Mercury. This ship, of which we give an illustration on this page, arrived off the Battery November 1. She was formerly a Havre packet, a noble vessel, 200 feet in length, 40 feet beam, and 24 feet in depth, and about 1600 tons register. Her dimensions between decks are 74 feet. Her accommodations and fitting up in cabins, storerooms, etc., are perfection. She has been arranged for 300 boys, though at present there are only 114 on board; but there are 100 at Hart's Island eagerly waiting for the necessary uniforms to come on board. These, as well as every thing possible, are made at the various institutions; and therefore the delay is altogether unavoidable. The yards are so heavy that, to fill all the stations in man-of-war style, it absolutely requires each watch goes to school, and the other half goes on deck, loosing and reefing sails, learning seamanship, exercising with the two brass six-pounders they have on board, and making all kinds of semait to noon, when there is a spell for dinner and recreation until one. At that genuine Bowery style. After this they learn to box the compass. Then comes the vivo voce recitation of the Lord's Prayer, then five minutes' silent prayer, and then hammocks are piped down, and in a few moments the embryo tars are in the soundest of slumbers.

THE SCHOOL-SHIP "MERCURY."—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

SCHOOL BETWEEN DECKS ON THE SCHOOL-SHIP "MERCURY."—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

three hundred boys, and these there will not be the slightest difficulty in obtaining. Having formerly been a packet, every thing about the Mercury is in gallant, handsome style. All the woodwork is neatly painted: there is a profusion of brass-work, which is polished, and which the boys keep in remarkable neatness, and like a mirror.

Chief among the officers is a gentleman whose bravery and humanity in the saving of human life have been gratefully acknowledged by the Queen of England, accompanied with a valuable gold watch, and by the King of Prussia, who presented him with a superb chronometer. He has also been the recipient, from various societies, of two gold and three silver medals. He was in command of the vessel when she was purchased by the city of New York for her present purpose, and very pleasantly, that it seems he was bought with the ship.

The boys are generously provided for in every thing touching their comfort. They are divided into starboard and port watches, in naval style, and are well and warmly clothed in naval uniforms, having round their blue cap a ribbon with Mercury in golden letters. They rise at half past five (at five A.M. in summer), stow away their hammocks and wash the decks, clean the brass-work, and make things ship-shape, until half past seven, when they have breakfast. Then half of hour work of the same kind recommences until five P.M., when comes supper and freedom until half past seven. At that hour they sing hymns and strong, hearty songs, like "Hoist up the Flag!" which they give with immense gusto and with a strong intonation on the final syllable, in Admiral PORTER has informed General BOWEN, one of the Commissioners of Public Charities, that he is highly in favor of the institution, and believes it will prove a valuable nursery for our naval forces. The Admiral proposes shortly to make a cruise with the Mercury.

THE "IRON AGE."—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

ROMAN CATHOLICISM IN FRANCE.

It has been charged, by the Roman Catholics, against Protestantism that the freedom of thought and conscience which the latter has nourished has been the cause of modern infidelity. Not only is this charge without foundation as against Protestantism, but it may with justice be hurled back against those who make it.

In Protestant England and America both political and religious liberty have found their boldest champions, and have been developed to their largest growth, and under the most healthful conditions. On the other hand, in Roman Catholic Spain, France, and Italy civil freedom has been choked by the atmosphere; it has breathed by gasps; its life has been perpetuated through a series of violent revolutions, and it has never gained a permanent triumph. Freedom of thought in these countries has been developed under the same morbid conditions. As their political revolutionists have always substituted anarchy for despotism, so their scientists and philosophers have almost invariably sought refuge from priestcraft in infidelity.

The present condition of France in these respects is very plainly shown in the attitude of M. Raspail, the editor of the Rèveil, and one of the radical deputies of the Corps Legislatif. His opinions, as taken from his own lips, are published in the New York Herald. We will give a brief extract from this correspondence, showing the religious condition of France, and the peculiar views to which men of thought, disgusted with the corruption of the Romish Church, are driven.

"Religion," says M. Raspail, "must be based on morality—on our conscience. It must be in the bottom of the heart, or nowhere. We know nothing in regard to who or what is God. Rather than adopt all the mistseries (stuff) put forward by the Jesuits, let us rather believe the beneficent Being to exist in nature. Who knows if we are not ourselves parts of the divinity? Now, religion in France is a mockery, and worse—the instrument of tyranny and the source of degradation. Our people are corrupted by its agencies. The noblemen do not spend their nights with their wives, but stay with actresses and lewd women. In their eyes the title of father, husband, wife is as nothing. The wives, on their side, amuse themselves by going to the churches, where they would never go if it was not for the priests. They go there, at the same time, to show off their fine robes and toilets, as to a day theatre. See, at Compiègne, how the highest ladies, in the midst of holding their fashionable tea-parties and soirées, give rendezvous with 'little pieces of paper,' and then go and come from their walks, perfectly unconcerned—a mere pastime. It is an odious disgrace that our France of to-day should be filled with so many convents, which are real hotbeds of infamy and degradation for humanity. Here we have, inhabiting these numerous religious establishments, a vast army of over 100,000 persons, who are all the time engaged in disseminating infamy and in corrupting women—the wives and daughters of the people. Now these persons should be removed from such a state."

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

PROLOGUE.—THE IRISH MARRIAGE.

Part the Second.

THE MARCH OF TIME.

ADVANCING from time past to time present, the Prologue leaves the date last attained (the summer of eighteen hundred and fifty-five), and travels on through an interval of twelve years—tells who lived, who died, who prospered, and who failed among the persons concerned in the tragedy at the Hampstead villa—and, this done, leaves the reader at the opening of The Scene, in the spring of eighteen hundred and sixty-eight.

The record begins with a marriage—the marriage of Mr. Vanborough and Lady Jane Parnell.

In three months from the memorable day when his solicitor had informed him that he was a free man, Mr. Vanborough possessed the wife he desired, he gave the head of his table and to push his fortunes in the world—the Legislature of Great Britain being the humble servant of his treachery, and the respectable accomplice of his crime.

He entered Parliament. He gave (thanks to his wife) six of the grandest dinners, and two of the most crowded balls of the season. He made a successful first speech in the House of Commons. He endowed a church in a poor neighborhood. He wrote an article which attracted attention in a quarterly review. He discovered, denounced, and remedied a crying abuse in the administration of a public charity. He received (thanks once more to his wife) a member of the Royal family among the visitors at his country house in the autumn recess. These were his triumphs, and this his rate of progress on the way to the peerage, during the first year of his life as the husband of Lady Jane.

There was but one more favor that Fortune could confer on her spoiled child—and Fortune bestowed it. There was a spot on Mr. Vanborough's past life as long as the woman lived whom he had disowned and deserted. At the end of the first year Death took her—and the spot was rubbed out.

She had met the merciless injury inflicted on her with a true patience, with an admirable courage. It is due to Mr. Vanborough to admit that he broke her heart, with the strictest attention to propriety. He offered (through his lawyer) a handsome provision for her and for her child. It was rejected, without an instant's hesitation. She repudiated his money—she repudiated his name. By the name which she had borne in her maiden days—the name which she had made illustrious in her art—the mother and daughter were known to all who cared to inquire after them when they had sunk in the world.

There was no false pride in the resolute attitude which she thus assumed after her husband had forsaken her. Mrs. Silvester (as she was now called) gratefully accepted for herself, and for Miss Silvester, the assistance of the dear old friend who had found her again in her distress, and who remained faithful to her to the end. They lived with Lady Lundie until the mother was strong enough to carry out the plan of life which she had arranged for the future, and to earn her bread as a teacher of singing. To all appearance she rallied, and became herself again, in a few months' time. She was making her way; she was winning sympathy, confidence, and respect every where—when she sank suddenly at the opening of her new life. Nobody could account for it. The doctors themselves were divided in opinion. Scientifically speaking, there was no reason why she should die. It was a mere figure of speech—in no degree satisfactory to any reasonable mind—to say, as Lady Lundie said, that she had got her death-blow on the day when her husband deserted her. The one thing certain was the fact—account for it as you might. In spite of science (which meant little), in spite of her own courage (which meant much), the woman dropped at her post and died.

In the latter part of her illness her mind gave way. The friend of her old school-days, sitting at the bedside, heard her talking as if she thought herself back again in the cabin of the ship. The poor soul found the time, almost the task, that had been lost for so many years—the time of the past time when the two girls had gone their different ways in the world. She said, "we will meet, darling, with all the old confidence," just as she had said almost a lifetime since. Before the end her mind rallied. She surprised the doctor and the nurse by begging them gently to leave the room. When they had gone she looked at Lady Lundie, and woke, as it seemed, to consciousness from a dream.

"Blanche," she said, "you will take care of my child?"

"She shall be my child, Anne, when you are gone."

The dying woman paused, and thought for a little. A sudden trembling seized her.

"Keep it a secret!" she said. "I am afraid for my child."

"Afraid? After what I have promised you?"

She solemnly repeated the words, "I am afraid for my child."

"Why?"

"My Anne is my second self—isn't she?"

"Yes."

"She is as fond of your child as I was of you?"

"Yes."

"She is not called by her father's name—she is called by mine. She is Anne Silvester as I was. Blanche! Will she end like Me?"

The question was put with the imboiling breath, with the hasty accents which tell of the death in fear. It chilled the living woman who heard it to the marrow of her bones.

"Don't think that!" she cried, horror-struck. "For God's sake, don't think that!"

The wildness began to appear again in Anne Silvester's eyes. She made feebly-imploring signs with her hands. Lady Lundie bent over her, and heard her whisper, "Lift me up."

She let her friend raise her—she loaded up in her friend's face; she went back wildly to her fear for her child.

"Don't keep her up like Me! She must be a governess—she must get her bread. Don't let her act! don't let her sing! don't let her go on the stage! She must be happy—she must gradually recovered its sweetness of tone—she smiled faintly—like the old girlish world once more, in the old girlish way, "Vow to Blanche. Lady Lundie kissed her, and answered, as she had answered when they parted in the ship, "I vow it, Anne!"

The head sunk, never to be lifted more. The last look of life flickered on the dying eyes and went out. For a moment afterward her lips moved. Lady Lundie put her ear close to them, and heard the question reiterated, in the same dreadful words: "She is Anne Silvester—as I was. Will she end like Me?"

VI.

Five years passed—and the lives of the three men who had sat at the dinner-table in the Hampstead villa began, in their altered aspects, to reveal the progress of time and change.

Andrew Mr. Delamayn's Mr. Vanborough. Let the order in which they are here named be the order in which their lives are related, as seen once more after a lapse of five years.

How the husband's friend marked his sense of the husband's treachery has been told already. How he felt the death of the deserted wife is still to be told. Report, which once misnamed hearts of men, and delights in turning them outward to the public view, had always declared that Mr. Vanborough's life had its secret, and that the secret was a hopeless passion for the beautiful woman who had married his friend. Not a hint ever stepped to any living ear, which, if it could ever spoken to the woman herself, could be produced in proof of the assertion while the woman lived. When she died Report started up again, more confidently than ever, and appealed to the man's own conduct as proof against the man himself.

He attended the funeral—though he was no relation. He took a few blades of grass from the turf which bent over the grave—and, even when he thought that nobody was looking at him. He disappeared from his club. He traveled. He came back. He inhabited the house—grew weary of England. He applied for, and obtained, an appointment in one of the colonies. To what profession did all this point? Was it not plain that his usual course of life had lost its attraction for him, when the object of his infatuation had ceased to exist? It might have been so—guesses less likely have been made at the truth, and have hit the mark. It is, at any rate, certain that he left England, never to return again. Another man lost, Report said. Add to that, a man in ten thousand—and, for once, Report might claim to be right.

Mr. Delamayn comes next.

The rising solicitor was struck off the roll, at his own request—and entered himself as a student at one of the Inns of Court. For three years nothing was known of him but that he was reading hard and keeping his terms. He was called to the Bar. His late partners in the firm knew that he could trust him, and put business into his hands. In two years he made himself a position in Court. At the end of the two years he made himself a position out of Court. He appeared as "Junior" in "a famous case," in which the honor of a great family, and the title to a great estate were concerned. His "Senior" fell ill on the eve of the trial. He conducted the case for the defendant and won it. The defendant said, "What can I do for you?" Mr. Delamayn answered, "Put me into Parliament." Being a landed gentleman, the defendant had only to issue the necessary orders—and behold, Mr. Delamayn was in Parliament!

In the House of Commons the new member and Mr. Vanborough met again.

They sat on the same bench, and sided with the same party. Mr. Delamayn noticed that Mr. Vanborough was looking old and worn and gray. He put a few questions to a well-informed person. The well-informed person shook his head. Mr. Vanborough was rich; Mr. Vanborough was well-connected (through his wife); Mr. Vanborough was a sound man in every sense of the word; but—nobody liked him. He had done very well the first year, and there it had ended. He was undeniably clever, but he produced a disagreeable impression in the House. He gave splendid entertainments, but he wasn't popular in society. His party respected him, but when they had any thing to give they passed him over. He had a temper of his own, if the truth must be told; and with nothing against him—on the contrary, with every thing in his favor—he didn't make friends. A soured man. At home and abroad, a soured man.

VII.

Five years more passed, dating from the day when the deserted wife was laid in her grave. It was now the year eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

On a certain day in that year two special items of news appeared in the papers—the news of an elevation to the peerage, and the news of a suicide.

Getting on well at the Bar, Mr. Delamayn got on better still in Parliament. He became one of the prominent men in the House. Spoke clearly, sensibly, and modestly, and was never too long. Held the House, where men of higher abilities "bored" it. The chiefs of his party said openly, "We must do something for Delamayn." The opportunity offered, and the chiefs kept their word. Their Solicitor-General was advanced a step, and they put Delamayn in his place. There was an outcry on the part of the older members of the Bar. The Ministry answered, "We want a man who is listened to in the House, and we have got him." The papers supported the new nomination. A great debate came off, and the new Solicitor-General justified the Ministry and the papers. His enemies said, derisively, "He will be Lord Chancellor in a year or two!" His friends made genial jokes at his domestic circle, which pointed to the same conclusion. They warned his two sons, Julius and Geoffrey (then at college), to be careful what acquaintances they made, as they might find themselves the sons of a lord at a moment's notice. It really began to look like something of the sort. Always rising, Mr. Delamayn rose next to be Attorney-General. About the same time—so true it is that "nothing succeeds like success"—a childless relative died and left him a fortune. In the summer of sixty-six a Chief Judgeship fell vacant. The Ministry had made a previous appointment which had been universally unpopular. They saw their way to supplying the place of their Attorney-General, and they offered the judicial appointment to Mr. Delamayn. He preferred remaining in the House of Commons, and refused to accept it. The Ministry declined to take No for an answer. They whispered confidentially, "Will you take it with a peerage?" Mr. Delamayn consulted his wife, and took it with a peerage. The London Gazette announced him to the world as Baron Holchester of Holchester. And all the friends of the family rubbed their hands and said, "What did we tell you? Here are our two young friends, Julius and Geoffrey, the sons of a lord!"

And where was Mr. Vanborough all this time? Exactly where we left him five years since.

He was as rich, or richer, than ever. He was as well-connected as ever. He was as ambitious as ever. But there it ended. He stood still in the House; he stood still in society; nobody liked him; he made no friends. He was all the old story over again, with this difference, that the soured man was sourer; the gray head, grayer; and the irritable temper more unendurable than ever. His wife had her rooms in the house and he had his, and the confidential servants took care that they never met on the stairs. They had no children. They only saw each other at their grand dinners and balls. People ate at their table, and danced on their floor, and compared notes afterward, and said how dull it was. Step by step the man who had once been Mr. Vanborough's lawyer rose, till the peerage received him, and he could rise no longer; while Mr. Vanborough, on the lower round of the ladder, looked up, and noted it, with no more chance (rich as he was and well-connected as he was) of climbing to the House of Lords than your chance or mine.

The man's career was ended; and on the day when the nomination of the new peer was announced, the man ended with it.

He laid the newspaper aside without making any remark, and went out. His carriage set him down, where the green fields still remain, on the northwest of London, near the foot-path which leads to Hampstead. He walked alone to the villa where he had once lived with the woman whom he had so cruelly wronged. Yew houses had risen round it, part of the old garden had been sold and built on. After a moment's hesitation he went to the gate and rang the bell. He gave the servant his card. The servant's master knew the name as the name of a man of great wealth, and of a Member of Parliament. He asked politely to what fortunate circumstance he owed the honor of that visit. Mr. Vanborough answered, briefly and simply, "I once lived here; I have associations with the place with which it is not necessary for me to trouble you. Will you excuse what must seem to you a very strange request? I should like to see the dining-room again, if there is no objection, and if I am disturbing nobody."

"WILL SHE END LIKE ME?"

The "strange requests" of rich men are of the nature of "privileged communications," and, in excellent reason, that they are sure not to be requests for money. Mr. Vanborough was shown into the dining-room. The master of the house, secretly wondering, watched him.

He walked straight to a certain spot on the carpet, not far from the window that led into the garden, and then opposite the door. On that spot he stood silently, with his head on his breast —thinking. Was it there he had sent her for the last time, on the day when he left the room forever? Yes; it was there. After a minute or so he roused himself, bowed to the company, absent manner. He said it was a pretty place, and expressed his thanks, and looked back before the door closed, and then went his way again. His carriage picked him up where it had set him down. He drove to the residence of the new Lord Hindlemere, and left a card for him.

Then he went home. Arrived at his house, his secretary reminded him that he had an appointment in ten minutes' time. He thanked the secretary in the same dreamy, absent manner in which he had thanked the owner of the villa, and went into his library alone. The person with whom he had made the appointment came, and the secretary sent the valet on pretense to knock at the door. There was no answer. On trying the lock it proved to be turned inside. They broke open the door, and found him lying on the sofa. They went close to look—and found him dead by his own hand.

VIII.

Drawing fast to its close, the Prologue reverts to the two girls—Nellie, in a few words, how the years passed with Anne and Blanche.

Lady Lundie more than redeemed the solemn pledge that was given to her friend. Preserved from every temptation which might lure her into a longing to follow her mother's example; trained for a teacher's life, with all the arts and all the advantages that money could procure, Anne's first and only essays in governess were made, under Lady Lundie's own roof, on Lady Lundie's own child. The difference in the ages of the girls—seven years—the love between them, which seemed, as time went on, to grow with their growth, favored the trial of the experiment. In the double relation of teacher and friend to little Blanche, the girlhood of Anne Silvester the younger passed safely, happily, successfully, in the modern sanctuary of home. Who could imagine a contrast more complete than the contrast between her early life and her mother's? Who could see any thing but a death-bed delusion in the terrible question which had tortured the mother's last moments—Was the end like Me?"

But two events of importance occurred in the quiet family circle during the lapse of years which is now under review. In eighteen hundred and fifty-eight the household was enlivened by the arrival of Sir Thomas Lundie. In eighteen hundred and sixty-five the household was broken up by the return of Sir Thomas to India, accompanied by his wife.

Lady Lundie's health had been failing for some time previously. The medical men, consulted on the case, agreed that a sea-voyage was the best change needful to restore their patient's wasted strength—exactly at the time, as it happened, when Sir Thomas was due again in England. For his wife's sake, he agreed to defer his return, by taking the sea-voyage with her. The one difficulty to get over was the difficulty of leaving Blanche and Anne behind in England.

Appealed to on this point, the doctors had declared that a sufficiently critical time of life they could not sanction her going to India with her mother. At the same time, near and dear relatives came forward, who were ready and anxious to give Blanche and her governess a home—Sir Thomas, on his arrival, engaging to take his wife back in a year and a half, or, at most, in two years' time. Assailed in all directions, Lady Lundie's maternal willingness to leave the girls was overruled. She consented to the parting—with a mind secretly depressed, and secretly doubtful of the future.

At the last moment she drew Anne Silvester on one side, out of hearing of the rest. Anne was then a young woman of twenty-two, and Blanche a girl of fifteen.

"My dear," she said, simply, "I must tell you what I can not tell Sir Thomas, and what I am afraid to tell Blanche. I am going away, with a mind that oppresses me. I am going away, I shall not live to return to England; and, when I am dead, I believe my husband will marry again. Years ago your mother was named as her death-bed, about your future. I am uneasy, now, about Blanche's future. I promised my dear dead friend that you should be like her own child to me—and it quieted her mind. Quiet my mind, Anne, before I go. Whatever happens in your future, promise me to be always, what you are now, a sister to Blanche."

She held out her hand for the last time. With a full heart Anne Silvester kissed it, and gave the promise.

IX.

In two months from that time one of the forebodings which had weighed on Lady Lundie's mind was fulfilled. She died on the voyage, and was buried at sea.

In a year more the second misgiving was confirmed. Sir Thomas Lundie married again. He brought his second wife to England toward the close of eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Time, in the new household, promised to pass as quietly as in the old. Sir Thomas remembered and respected the trust which his first wife had placed in Anne. The second Lady Lundie, wisely guiding her conduct in this matter by the conduct of her husband, left things as she found them in the new house. At the opening of eighteen hundred and sixty-seven the relations between Anne and Blanche were embarrassed by no difficulties of any kind. The prospect in the future was as fair as a prospect could be.

At this date, of the persons concerned in the tragedy of twelve years since at the Hampstead villa, three were dead; and one was self-exiled in a foreign land. There now remained living Anne and Blanche, who had been children at the time; and the miserable sailor who had divorced the elder in the Irish marriage—once Mr. Delamayn: now Lord Holchester.

The Story.

FIRST SCENE.—THE SUMMER-HOUSE.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

THE OWLS.

In the spring of the year eighteen hundred and sixty-three there lived, in a certain county of North Britain, two venerable White Owls.

The Owls inhabited a decayed and deserted summer-house. The summer-house stood in the grounds attached to a country seat in Perthshire, known by the name of Windygates.

The situation in which the Owls made their skilfully chosen in that part of the county where the fertile lowlands first begin to merge into the mountain-tracts of the north. The mansion-house was intelligently laid out, and luxuriously furnished. The stables offered a desirable combination of size and the gardens and grounds were fit for a prince.

Possessed of these advantages, at starting, Windygates, nevertheless, went the road to ruin in due course of time. The curse of litigation fell on landed lords. And the Owls knew, from years an interminable lawsuit coiled itself closer and closer round the place, sequestering it from human habitation, and even from human approach. The mansion was closed. The garden became a wilderness of weeds. The summer-house crumbled piecemeal, creeping plants and the appearance of the creepers was followed by the appearance of the birds of night.

For years the Owls had reigned undisturbed on the property which they had acquired by the oldest of all existing rights—the right of taking. Throughout the day they slept undisturbed in solemn, with closed eyes, in the cool darkness shed round them by the ivy. With the twilight they issued in search of food. At the time they would best a field like a setter dog, and drop down in an instant on a mouse unaware. Or, pretty, she was plump, she was fair. She was not the least embarrassed by her prominent position. She was dressed in the height of the fashion. A hat, like a cheese-plate, was tilted over her forehead. A balloon of light brown hair soared, fully inflated, from the crown of her head. A cataract of beads poured over her bosom. A pair of cock-chafers in enamel (frightfully like the living originals) hung at her ears. Her scanty skirts shone splendid with the blue of heaven. Her ankles twinkled in striped stockings. Her shoes were pronounced by connoisseurs to be "Watteau." And her heels were of the height at which men shudder, and ask themselves in agony whether an otherwise lovable woman), "Can this charming person straighten her knees?"

The good lady thus presenting herself to the general view was Miss Blanche Lundie—once the little rosy Blanche whom the Prologue has introduced at a tender age, at the present time, eighteen. Position, excellent. Money, certain. Temper, quick. Disposition, variable. As a whole, a child in boundless time—with the merits of the age we live in, and the failings of the age we live in—and a substance of sincerity and truth and feeling everything is all.

"Now then, good people," cried Miss Blanche, "silence, if you please! We are going to discuss politics at croquet. Business, business, business!"

Upon this, a second lady among the company assumed a position of prominence, and asserted her claim to attention. She had just spoken with a look of mild reproof, and in a tone of benevolent protest.

The second lady was tall, and solid, and fivefand-thirty. She presented to the general observation a round face, an obstinate straight nose, a chin, magnificent dark hair and eyes, a serene splendor of fawn-colored apparel, and a busy grace of movement which was attractive at first sight, but inexpressibly monotonous and wearisome on a longer acquaintance. This was Lady Lundie's second, now the widow (after four months only of married life) of Sir Thomas Lundie, deceased. In other words, the step-mother of Blanche, and the only female person who had taken the house and lands of Windygates.

"My dear," said Lady Lundie, "you might have their manners improved by a young lady's lips. Do you call Croquet, 'business'?"

"You don't call it pleasure, surely?" said a gravely ironical voice in the back-ground of the summer-house.

The ranks of the visitors parted before the last speaker, and disclosed to view, in the midst of that modern assembly, a gentleman of the bygone time.

The manner of this gentleman was distinguished by a pliant grace and courtesy unknown to the present generation. The attire of this gentleman was composed of a many-folded white cravat, a close-buttoned blue dress-coat, and nankeen trowsers with gaiters to match, ridiculous to the present generation. The talk of this gentleman ran in an easy flow—revealing an independent habit of mind, and exhibiting a carefully-polished opacity of the satirical retort-courteous, and disliked by the present generation. Personally, he was little and wiry and slim—with a bright white head, and sparkling black eyes, and a wry twist of humor curling sharply at the corners of his lips. At his lower extremities, he wisely decided the doubtful question of age known as "a club-foot." But he carried his lameness, as he carried his years, gayly. He was socially celebrated for his very cane, which was a snuff-box artfully let into the knob at the top—and he was socially dreaded for a hatred of modern institutions, which expressed itself in sayings out of season, and which always showed the same fatal knack of hitting smartly on the weakest point. His name was Sir Patrick Lundie; brother of the late baronet, Sir Thomas; and inheritor, at Sir Thomas's death, of the title and estates.

Miss Blanche, taking no notice of her stepmother's reproof, or of her uncle's commentary on it—pointed to a table on which croquet-balls and hoops were laid ready, and recalled the attention of the company to the matter in hand.

"Come, ladies and gentlemen," she resumed. "And Lady Lundie heads the other. We choose our players turn and turn about. Mamma has the advantage of me in years. So mamma chooses first."

With a look at her step-daughter—which, being now apparently pacified, "I would send you back to the nursery, miss, if I could!"—Lady Lundie turned, and ran her eye over her guests. She was a woman who made up her mind, beforehand, what player to pick out first.

"I choose Miss Silvester," she said—with special emphasis laid on the name.

At that there was another parting among the crowd. To us (who know her), it was Anne who now appeared. Strangers, who saw her for the first time, saw a lady in the prime of her life —a lady plainly dressed in unpretending materials, whose manners, slowly and confronted the mistress of the house.

A certain proportion—and not a small one—of the men in the lawn-party had been brought there by friends who were privileged to introduce them. The moment she appeared on the scene, the second lady became interested in the lady who had been chosen first.

"That's a very charming woman," whispered one of the strangers at the house to one of the friends of the house. "Who is she?"

The friend looked at the lawn.

"Miss Lundie's governess—that's all."

The moment during which the question was put and answered was also the moment which brought Lady Lundie and Miss Silvester face to face, in the presence of the company.

The stranger at the house looked at the two women, and whispered again.

"Something wrong between the lady and the governess."

The friend looked also, and answered, in one emphatic word:

"Evidently!"

There are certain women whose influence over men is an unfathomable mystery to observers of their own sex. The governess was one of those women. She had inherited the charm, but not the beauty, of her unhappy mother. Judge her by the talent set up in the illustrated gift-books and the print-shop windows—and the sentence must have inevitably followed. She has not a single good feature in her face.'

There was nothing individually remarkable about the nose, the mouth, or the complexion. Miss Silvester, seen in a state of repose, was the type of the average height. She was as well made as most women. In hair and complexion, she was neither light nor dark. Her physique generally, just between the two. Worse even than this, there were positive defects in her face, which it was impossible to overlook. A nervous contraction at one corner of her mouth drew up the lips out of the symmetrically right line, when she moved. A nervous uneasiness in the eyes on the same side narrowly escaped presenting the deformity of a "cast." And yet, with these undoubted drawbacks, here was one of those women — the formidable few — who have the hearts of men and the peace of families at their mercy. Miss Silvester—and Anne was more subtle charm, Sir, in the movement, that made you look back, and suspend your conversation with your friend, and set her silently while she walked. She set by you and talked to you—and behold, the commonplace words assumed new meaning, the new turn of your nerves thrill if she touched you by accident, and set your heart beating if she looked at you. She sat by you, and felt her breath on your face. All this, let it be well understood, only happened if you were a man. If you were a woman, in the eyes of a woman, the results were of quite another kind. In that case, you merely turned to your nearest female friend, and said, with unaffected pity for the other sex, "What can the men see in her!"

The eyes of the lady of the house and the eyes of the governess met—and the contrast burst on either side. Few people could have failed to see, what the stranger and the friend had noticed alike—that there was something smouldering under the surface here. Miss Silvester spoke first.

"Thank you, Lady Lundie," she said. "I would rather not play."

Lady Lundie assumed an extreme surprise which passed the limits of good-breeding.

"Oh, indeed?" she rejoined, sharply. "Considering that we are all here for the purpose of playing, that seems rather remarkable. Is any thing wrong, Miss Silvester?"

A flush appeared on the delicate paleness of Miss Silvester's face. But she did her duty as a woman and a governess. She submitted, and so preserved appearances, for that time.

"Nothing is the matter," she answered. "I am not very well this morning. But I will play if you wish it."

"I do wish it," answered Lady Lundie.

Miss Silvester turned aside toward one of the entrances into the summer-house. She waited for events, looking out over the lawn, with a visible inner disturbance, marked over the bosom by the rise and fall of her white dress.

It was Blanche's turn to select the next player. In some preliminary uncertainty as to her choice, she looked about among the guests, and caught the eye of a gentleman in the front ranks. He stood side by side with Mr. Patrick—a striking representative of the school that is among us—as Sir Patrick was a striking representative of the school that has passed away.

The modern gentleman was young and florid, tall and strong. The parting of his curly Saxon locks began in the centre of his forehead, traveled over the top of his head, and ended, rigidly-central, at the ruddy nape of his neck. His features were as perfectly regular and as perfectly unmeaning as human features can be. His expression flowed an immovable composure wonderful to behold. The muscles of his brawny arms showed through the sleeves of his light summer coat. He was deep in the chest, thin in the flanks, firm on the legs—in short, he was a magnificent animal, wrought up to the highest pitch of physical development, from head to foot. Such was Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn—commonly called "the honorable;" and meriting that distinction in more ways than one. He was honorable, in the first place, as being the son (second son) of that unrising solicitor, who was now Lord Holchester. He was honorable, in the second place, as possessing won the highest popular distinction which the educational system of modern England can bestow—he had pulled the stroke-oar in the University boat-race. And, to this, that nobody had ever seen him read any thing but a newspaper, and that nobody but a few friends in the Athenæum in settling a bet—and the picture of this distinguished young Englishman will be, for the present, complete.

Blanche's eye naturally rested on him. Blanche's voice naturally picked him out as the first player for the side.

"I choose Mr. Delamayn," she said.

As the name passed her lips the flush on Miss Silvester's face died away, and a dead paleness took its place. She made a movement to leave the summer-house—checked herself abruptly—and laid her hand on the back of a vacant seat at her side. A gentleman behind her, looking at the hand, saw it clench itself so suddenly that the fingers left the glove on it split. The gentleman made a mental memorandum, and registered Miss Silvester in his private books as "the devil's own temper."

Meanwhile Mr. Delamayn, by a strange coincidence, took exactly the same course with Miss Silvester that she had taken before him. He, too, attempted to withdraw from the coming game.

"Thanks very much," he said; "I could you additionally honor me by choosing somebody else? It's not in my line."

Fifty years ago such an answer as this, addressed by a lady, would have been considered inexcusably impertinent. The social code of the present period it is not something to be offended by. The company laughed. Blanche lost her temper.

"Can't we interest you in any thing but severe muscular exertion, Mr. Delamayn?" she asked, sharply. "Most you always be pulling in a boat-race, or lying over a high jump? If you had a mind, you would want to relax it. You have got muscles instead. Why not have them?"

The shaft in Miss Lundie's bitter wit glided off Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn like water off a duck's back.

"Just as you please," he said, with stolid good-humor. "Don't be offended. I came here with ladies—and they wouldn't let me smoke. I'm dying for my smoke. I thought I'd slip away a bit and have it. All right! I'll play."

"Oh! smoke by all means!" retorted Blanche. "I shall have somebody else. I won't have you!"

The honorable young gentleman looked unaffectedly relieved. The petulant young lady turned her back on him, and surveyed the guests at the other extremity of the summer-house.

"Who shall I choose?" she said to herself.

A dark young man—with a face burned gipsy-brown by the sun; with something in his look and manner suggestive of a roving life, and perhaps of a familiar acquaintance with the sea—advanced shyly, and said, in a whisper:

"Choose me!"

Blanche's face broke prettily into a charming smile. Judging from appearances, the dark Ysog man had a place in her estimation peculiarly his own.

You!" she said, coquettishly. "You are here so long as in an hour's time!"

I ventured a step nearer. "I am coming back," he pleaded, "the day after to-morrow."

"On play with Geoffrey!"

"Might improve—if you would teach me."

"Light you? Then I will teach you!" She turned bright and rosy, to her new pupil. "I choose it, Arnold Brinkworth," she said.

Her again, there appeared to be something unknown to celebrity, which neutralized the less pro ed its effect—not, this time, on Miss Silvester but on Sir Patrick. He looked at Mr. Brinkworth with a sudden interest and curiosity. If the lady of the house had not claimed his attention at the moment he would evidently have spoken to the dark young man.

But it was Lady Lundie's turn to choose a second player on her side. Her brother-in-law was a person of some importance; and she had her own motives for ingratiating herself with the head of the family. She surprised the whole company by choosing Sir Patrick.

"Herman!" cried Blanche. "What can you be thinking of? Sir Patrick won't play. Croquet wasn't discovered in his time."

Sir Patrick never allowed "his time" to be made the subject of disparaging remarks by the younger generation without paying the younger generation a compliment.

"In my time, my dear," he said to his niece, "people were expected to bring some agreeable quality with them to social meetings of this sort. In your time you have dispensed with all that. Here," remarked the old gentleman, taking up a croquet mallet from the ground, "here is one of the qualifications for success in modern society. And here," he added, taking up a ball, "here is another. Very good. Now, learn. I'll play! I'll play!"

Lady Lundie's horn impervious to all sense of irony, smiled graciously.

"I knew Sir Patrick would play," she said, "to please me."

Sir Patrick bowed with satirical politeness.

Lady Lundie," he answered, "you read me like a book." In the astonishment of all persons present under forty he emphasized those words by laying his hand on his heart, and repeating them. "I may say with Dryden," added the gallant old gentleman:

"'Old as I am, for ladies' love unfit,
The power of wishing long remains in it.'"

Lady Lundie looked unaffectedly shocked. Mr. Delamayn went a step farther. He interfered on the spot—with the air of a man who feels himself imperatively called upon to perform a public duty.

"Dryden never said that," he remarked, "I'll bet five to one!"

Sir Patrick kneeled round with the help of his ivory cane, and looked Mr. Delamayn hard in the face.

"Do you know Dryden, Sir, better than I do?" he asked.

The Honorable Geoffrey answered, modestly, "I should say I did. I have rowed three races with him, and we trained together."

Sir Patrick looked round him with a sour smile of triumph.

"Then let me tell you, Sir," he said, "that your Dryden, with a man who died more than two hundred years ago."

Mr. Delamayn appealed, in genuine bewilderment, to the company generally:

"What does this old gentleman mean?" he asked. "I am speaking of Dryden, the Oxford oarsman. Every body in the University knows him."

"I am speaking," echoed Sir Patrick, "of John Dryden the Poet. Apparently, every body in the University does not know him!"

Mr. Delamayn answered, with a cordial earnestness very pleasant to see:

"Give you my word of honor, I never heard of him in my life! Not in my line, Sir, you see. I'm not offended with you." He smiled, and took out his brier-wood pipe. "Got a light?" he said to the friendliest person present.

Sir Patrick answered, with a total absence of cordiality:

"I don't smoke, Sir."

Mr. Delamayn looked at him, without taking the slightest offense.

"You don't smoke!" he repeated. "I wonder how you get through your spare time?"

Sir Patrick closed the conversation:

"Sir," he said, with a bow, now, "you may wonder."

While the little skirmish was proceeding Lady Lundie and her step-daughter had organized the game; and the company, players and spectators, were beginning to move toward the lawn. Sir Patrick stopped his niece on her way out, with the dark young man in close attendance on her.

"Leave Mr. Brinkworth with me," he said. "I want to speak to him."

Blanche issued her orders immediately. Mr. Brinkworth was accordingly left to stay with Sir Patrick until she wanted him for the game. Mr. Brinkworth wondered, and obeyed.

During the exercise of this act of authority a circumstance occurred at the other end of the summer-house. Taking advantage of the confusion caused by the general movement to the lawn, Miss Silvester suddenly placed herself close to Mr. Delamayn.

"In five minutes," she whispered, "the summer-house will be empty. Meet me here."

The Honorable Geoffrey started, and looked relively at the visitors about him.

"Do you think it's safe?" he whispered back.

The governess's eyes answered, boldly, with fear or with anger, it was hard to say which.

"I insist on it!" she answered, and left him.

Mr. Delamayn knitted his handsome eyebrows as he looked after her, and then left the summer-house in his turn. The rose-garden at the back of the building was solitary for the moment. He took out his pipe and hid himself among the roses. The smoke came from his mouth in fits and starts. He was not usually the gentlest of masters—to his pipe. When he hurried that confidential servant, it was a sure sign of disturbance in the inner man.

PARAGUAY.

THE so-called republic of Paraguay is in reality a despotism, ruled by a tyrant who has no parallel in modern times but Ali Pasha; and the allies have addressed themselves to his destruction with a zeal and effect which are very likely to bring about the extermination of his subjects en masse.

When this man's reign began, Paraguay was a fertile country; the old Jesuit settlement called the Missiones, in particular, was a rich and beautiful province, cultivated for its productiveness. Comfortable homesteads and innumerable herds of cattle were to be seen there, but now it is a desolate wilderness, without an inhabitant; and in the other parts of the country, where population still exists, the people are in the extremity of want and misery. The rivers of Paraguay present the flat and desolate appearance peculiar to the giant streams of the great continental valleys of America. Marshes, estuaries, and alligators have undisputed lodgings on the banks, and long lapses of distance lie between the towns: for instance, after leaving Corrientes, there is not a town for three hundred miles. Asunction, the capital city, is comparatively regular, lawful, and unbiished, the fine old Spanish houses having been replaced by buildings more to the taste of Lopez, a certain number of which are in every direction. Public buildings are falling into decay before their sun half built, and ruin is written on every thing. Every thing is so-called Public Property, but the books were nearly all theological, and few persons were ever seen reading there. Lopez, however, found a characteristic use for the books—he had them cut up for rocket and squib cases.

The Paraguayans are a handsome people, and the native costume of both sexes is beautiful, but it is abandoned almost entirely to the use of the lower classes. The men are very ignorant, especially the women; and their lives are wretched, according to our ideas, though it is to be remembered they like them or did like them, until they came to learn the unmitigated misery of prolonged and merciless war. Lopez has always been in the worst political condition possible to its institutions for the time being; so bad, that its probable ultimate condition with which "people who know" credit the allies, and which Lopez has certainly done his best to forward—would really appear to be the best thing that could happen to it. Francia, the first President of the Republic after the Spanish yoke had been thrown off, did much good, and he was a ruthless tyrant, who might have been the model monster had there been no Lopez. Terribly severe and cruel, he governed by a constant fear of assassination and revolt, he became, in his later years, a moody, bitter, and cruel tyrant, but he found Paraguay a single joyous hour. Francia ruled alone, and with irresponsible power, for twenty-six years, and died on the 20th of Sept. 1840, a man who died nearly two hundred years ago."

Mr. Delamayn appealed, in genuine bewilderment, to the company generally:

"What does this old gentleman mean?" he asked. "I am speaking of Dryden, the Oxford oarsman. Every body in the University knows him."

"I am speaking," echoed Sir Patrick, "of John Dryden the Poet. Apparently, every body in the University does not know him!"

Mr. Delamayn answered, with a cordial earnestness very pleasant to see:

"Give you my word of honor, I never heard of him in my life! Not in my line, Sir, you see. I'm not offended with you." He smiled, and took out his brier-wood pipe. "Got a light?" he said to the friendliest person present.

Sir Patrick answered, with a total absence of cordiality:

"I don't smoke, Sir."

Mr. Delamayn looked at him, without taking the slightest offense.

"You don't smoke!" he repeated. "I wonder how you get through your spare time?"

Sir Patrick closed the conversation:

"Sir," he said, with a bow, now, "you may wonder."

While the little skirmish was proceeding Lady Lundie and her step-daughter had organized the game; and the company, players and spectators, were beginning to move toward the lawn. Sir Patrick stopped his niece on her way out, with the dark young man in close attendance on her.

"Leave Mr. Brinkworth with me," he said. "I want to speak to him."

Blanche issued her orders immediately. Mr. Brinkworth was accordingly left to stay with Sir Patrick until she wanted him for the game. Mr. Brinkworth wondered, and obeyed.

During the exercise of this act of authority a circumstance occurred at the other end of the summer-house. Taking advantage of the confusion caused by the general movement to the lawn, Miss Silvester suddenly placed herself close to Mr. Delamayn.

"In five minutes," she whispered, "the summer-house will be empty. Meet me here."

The Honorable Geoffrey started, and looked relively at the visitors about him.

"Do you think it's safe?" he whispered back.

The governess's eyes answered, boldly, with fear or with anger, it was hard to say which.

"I insist on it!" she answered, and left him.

Mr. Delamayn knitted his handsome eyebrows as he looked after her, and then left the summer-house in his turn. The rose-garden at the back of the building was solitary for the moment. He took out his pipe and hid himself among the roses. The smoke came from his mouth in fits and starts. He was not usually the gentlest of masters—to his pipe. When he hurried that confidential servant, it was a sure sign of disturbance in the inner man.

PARAGUAY.

THE so-called republic of Paraguay is in reality a despotism, ruled by a tyrant who has no parallel in modern times but Ali Pasha; and the allies have addressed themselves to his destruction with a zeal and effect which are very likely to bring about the extermination of his subjects en masse.

When this man's reign began, Paraguay was a fertile country; the old Jesuit settlement called the Missiones, in particular, was a rich and beautiful province, cultivated for its productiveness. Comfortable homesteads and innumerable herds of cattle were to be seen there, but now it is a desolate wilderness, without an inhabitant; and in the other parts of the country, where population still exists, the people are in the extremity of want and misery. The rivers of Paraguay present the flat and desolate appearance peculiar to the giant streams of the great continental valleys of America. Marshes, estuaries, and alligators have undisputed lodgings on the banks, and long lapses of distance lie between the towns: for instance, after leaving Corrientes, there is not a town for three hundred miles. Asunction, the capital city, is comparatively regular, lawful, and unbished, the fine old Spanish houses having been replaced by buildings more to the taste of Lopez, a certain number of which are in every direction. Public buildings are falling into decay before their sun half built, and ruin is written on every thing. Every thing is so-called Public Property, but the books were nearly all theological, and few persons were ever seen reading there. Lopez, however, found a characteristic use for the books—he had them cut up for rocket and squib cases.

The Paraguayans are a handsome people, and the native costume of both sexes is beautiful, but it is abandoned almost entirely to the use of the lower classes. The men are very ignorant, especially the women; and their lives are wretched, according to our ideas, though it is to be remembered they like them or did like them, until they came to learn the unmitigated misery of prolonged and merciless war. Lopez has always been in the worst political condition possible to its institutions for the time being; so bad, that its probable ultimate condition with which "people who know" credit the allies, and which Lopez has certainly done his best to forward—would really appear to be the best thing that could happen to it. Francia, the first President of the Republic after the Spanish yoke had been thrown off, did much good, and he was a ruthless tyrant, who might have been the model monster had there been no Lopez. Terribly severe and cruel, he governed by a constant fear of assassination and revolt, he became, in his later years, a moody, bitter, and cruel tyrant, but he found Paraguay a single joyous hour. Francia ruled alone, and with irresponsible power, for twenty-six years, and died on the 20th of Sept. 1840, a man who died nearly eight. He was buried in the Iglesia de la Incarnacion, the oldest church in Asuncion, in a tomb built on the side of the choir. The next morning the bricks were found scattered around in all directions, and his body had disappeared. What became of it remains a secret: the trembling people believed the Evil One had carried it away during the night. It is said that the allegators could have solved the mystery. The terrible dread his very name inspired did not die with him.

"A mi muerte," he said, "nadie," will never willingly speak of 'el muerto,' as they call him, and to this day will look round fearfully if they do be mentioned, and only to intimate friends will tell tales of his cruel deeds and supernatural wisdom." The implicit obedience to which he caused the people rendered them passive in the hands of his successors. They were perfectly submissive to Don Carlos Antonio, one of very low birth and mixed blood, who was a tolerably good governor, for a Spanish American ruler not cruel, and, though rapacious, rude, and overbearing, tolerably just. He died in 1862, and his son Francisco was "elected" as his successor. On this occasion he appears to have inaugurated his career of crime.

"The election was but a farce. The deputies from the many partidos of the country met in the capital, and sat in the Cabildo, which was surrounded by a strong body of troops, commanded by the very man who acted their part; and of course all free action, or even discussion, was out of the question. One member, it is true, had the temerity to say that the office of President was declared by the 'organic law' of the country not to be hereditary, and that therefore Don Francisco was not eligible; but he was listened to in ominous silence. Another suggested that the present was a good opportunity for modifying the laws of the country 'when he was angrily told to hold his tongue by Lopez himself, who reminded the deputies that they had not met to consider the laws of the country, but to elect a new President. That same night both disappeared, and have not been heard of since. It is almost superfluous to add that the next day 'the citizen Francisco Solano Lopez' was unanimously chosen 'Gefe Supremo y General de los Exercitos de la Republica del Paraguay.'

There was much formal joy; and many forced festivals, which were the sums of misery, were held throughout the country; and the new President began immediately to increase the army, having already under his own salary to a much larger sum than his father's. There are those who believe that Lopez inaugurated the war with moderate personal motives from the first, and give the following explanation, which introduces us to the remarkable heroine of this strange story: "From Paris, in 1857, Lopez returned, and imported two novelties—the French uniform for the army, and a mistress for life. On the latter a most fatal step in his life, as that lady occupied, eventually, a very prominent place in Paraguayan affairs, and was, I believe, by her evil counsels, the remote cause of the terrible war which has utterly depopulated the country. She is of Irish parentage, but was born in France, and was married to a surgeon in the French army, who still lives, so I will not give his real name; that by which his wife is known in Paraguay is Madame Eloisa Lynch. She is a tall, stout, and remarkably handsome woman; and I could well believe the story, that when she landed in Asuncion, the simple natives thought her charms were of more than earthly brilliancy, and her dress so numerous that they had no words to express the admiration they both excited. She had received a showy education—spoke English, French, and Spanish with equal facility; gave capital dinner-parties, and could drink more Champagne without being affected by it than any one I have ever met with. A clever, selfish, and most unscrupulous woman, the influence she exercised over a weak, so impetuous, so weak, and so vain as Lopez was immense. With admirable tact, she treated him with the utmost respect and deference, while she could justify it with him as she pleased, and virtually was the ruler of Paraguay. She had two ambitions—to become the first, in every hum; the second, to make him the 'Napoleon of the New World.' The first was a difficult one, for the husband, being a Frenchman, would not sue for a divorce; but should the second succeed, it would not be very hard, perhaps, to procure a dispensation, and her exalted position would be changed for a secure one. Therefore, she gradually but individually imbued Lopez from the idea that he was the greatest soldier of the age, and flattered the vain, credulous, and greedy savage into the belief that he was destined to raise Paraguay from obscurity, and make it the dominant power of South America."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MORE WINE OR SOME WITTIES!—An English clergyman went to a dinner party at a dinner for a number of clerical friends. "May I ask, Sir," demanded the waiter, gravely, "whether you belong to High Church or Low Church?"

"Neither, my man," cried the clergyman, "do my friends' opinions matter to you?"

"Yes, Sir, they do," rejoined the waiter, "if High Church, I must provide more wine; if Low Church, more witties."

POPULAR DIET IN UTAH—Spare rib.

A lady, out with her little boy and girl, bought the boy a rubber balloon, which escaped him, and flew up in the air. Presently, seeing tears in his eyes, she said: "Never mind, Neddy; when you die and go to heaven you'll die it."

SILENCE.—"My dear," said Mr. B——, to his wife, after a dinner party, "your conscience indicated the conscience of having done a good action." "I have just conscience of having done a good action." "Well, I declare," said Mrs. B——, looking round upon her husband, and frowning with an expression of injured innocence, "just to think of the selfishness of some people! Considerate! There, you have been and had your life insured, while your poor wife has not had a farthing spent on her. It's just what I would expect of you."

It is said—ironically, perhaps—that blacksmiths forge and steel every day.

People who let the grass grow under their feet—Aeronauts.

Editors ought to be able to live cheap—they get "board" for nothing.

In ex-devil of a country printing-office was questioned as to the duties of a "printer's devil." He replied, "I carry in clean water, carry out dirty water, steal wood, lie, and numerous other articles."

POPPING CORN.

We were popping corn,
And I thought
It danced about,
And it danced up high.
The embers were hot
In their deep bed,
And it went up brown
And it came down white.

Ah, many a time are the embers hot,
And the brown corn leaps when it is hot,
Yet forth from the fervent, fiery light
Comes only freedom's self-same gift of white.

A student was under examination once, at the College of Surgeons, when a hypothetical case was submitted, in which the operation of tying the carotid artery was required. At last came the crisis: "Now, Sir," said the C. U., "what would you do?" "Sir," replied the pupil of Esculapius, "I would send for you."

A sufferer complains that squeaking boots "murder sleep" in church.

"Mamma," said a little French girl, "do cats have souls?" "No, my dear, certainly not." "Then shall I have to have my cat's soul always in heaven with mine." "Oh, no, my dear, a moment's reflection." "Why, of course, then cats' souls must be in heaven to catch the rats' souls."

The following notice was posted on a large box, which was left in front of the great through lines of a railroad a few days since: "Dangerous explosives. Be careful how you handle the box with care, as it contains nitro glycerine, Greek fire, gun cotton, and two live gorillas." The box was broken.

Lines taken from a hymn-book, which a young lady incautiously left behind her in a chapel:

"Ask ye what great thing I know;
Dear, dear, what shall I do!
I can not listen at a door,
Unless he listens too!

He might have come as well as not!
What pleasure have fellows are!
I'll bet he's fast asleep at home,
Or smoking cigars!

The following is the latest marriage ceremony as suggested for marriages of convenience: Priest to bridegroom, "Do you take this woman to be your wife under any delusion?" "No." "Are you bald?" "Yes." "Any teeth?" "No." "Do you wear flannel?" "Yes." "You believe in rheumatism and have faith in gout?" "Yes." "You are utterly bored and incapable of being amused?" "Yes." "You care for nobody but yourself?" "Certainly not." "Ring for your bride!" "Naturally not." "Very good; then you two are united in the name of the law. Make her happy, as she will others."

An old tobacco chewer finds that the Bible sustains his favorite habit. He quotes: He that is filthy, let him be filthy still.

"Now I saw in my dream, that at the end of the valley lay blood, bones, ashes, and mangled bodies of men, even of Pilgrims that had gone this way formerly; and, while I was musing what should be the reason, I espied, a little before me, a cave, where two giants, Pope and Pagan, dwelt in old time, by whose power and tyranny the men, whose bones, blood, ashes, etc., lay there, were cruelly put to death. By this place Christian went without much danger, whereat I somewhat wondered: but I have learned since, that Pagan has been dead many a day; and as for the other, though he be yet alive, he is, by reason of age, and also of the many shrewd brushes that he met with in his younger days, grown so crazy and stiff in his joints, that he can now do little more than sit in his Cave's mouth grinning at Pilgrims as they go by, and biting his nails because he can not come at them.

"So I saw that Christian went on his way; yet, at the sight of the Old Man that sat in the mouth of the Cave, he could not tell what to think, especially because he spoke to him, though he could not go after him, saying, 'You will never mend till more of you be burnt!' but he held his peace, and set a good face on it, and so went by, and catched no hurt."—BUNYAN'S Pilgrim's Progress.

"The governments of Europe which recognize the Roman Catholic Church as the State Church, generally expect that the Council will take some new action on questions directly affecting the relation of the Church to the State, and that claims will be asserted which not a single government is likely to accept or officially to recognize."—Daily Papers.

THE SALE OF INDULGENCES.

ABUT three centuries and a half ago Pope LEO X., finding himself in rather straitened circumstances, and unable, in consequence, to gratify his luxurious tastes, resolved to replenish his exhausted purse by the sale of indulgences for sin on a scale never ventured on before, veiling the true reason for this step under the pretext that funds were wanted to complete the church of St. Peter, at Rome. Three head-commissioners were appointed to superintend the business in different parts of Europe, with a host of subordinates to work under their direction among the people. One of these subordinates, TETZEL by name, soon achieved an unenviable notoriety by the shameless manner in which he drove his corrupting traffic among the German peasantry. He must have been corrupt, indeed, to surpass his fellows in wickedness. All vied with each other in shameless wit and scandal. MENZEL relates, in his "History of Germany," that a monk, by the name of ISELIN, carried about with him a feather which he declared had been plucked from the wing of the Archangel Michael! Having had the misfortune to lose this at the village of Aldingen, he procured a handful of hay from the tavern barn, and gave out that it came from the stall in which the infant JESUS was cradled at Nazareth. Among the people who pressed about him was the hostess of the inn, who kneeled and kissed her own hay as a precious relic. Another seller of indulgences exclaimed to a crowd of listeners at Baden: Ecce volant!—(See, they fly!)—pointing to a cloud of feathers thrown out of the church-tower by a confederate, which he assured the gaping crowd were souls released from purgatory.

Indulgences were granted for the commission of the worst of crimes. By the present of a magnificent horse an officer procured indulgence not only for himself but for a band of five hundred soldiers under his command. TETZEL himself carried about with him a picture representing the Prince of Darkness torturing souls in the lake of fire; and had a couplet engraved on his money-box, setting forth that, as soon as the chink of the coin was heard inside, the soul for whom it was paid was released from torment. He became so lost to shame that he would sell indulgences for the commission of murder, or any other capital crime, for any sum he could squeeze out of a customer. But his popularity was of short duration. The Imperial Government took alarm at the constant outflow of money from Germany into the papal coffers; and decreed that two-thirds of the immense sums raised by the sale of indulgences should be retained to assist in defraying the expense of campaigns against the Turks. The common people also, who, fortunately for the interests of morality and religion, were far better than the priesthood of the time, soon learned to regard TETZEL and his fellows with dislike and suspicion; and even before LUTHER'S open exposure of his wickedness his influence among them was rapidly declining.

*

TETZEL, it would seem, had overacted his part, and brought himself into disgrace with his superiors. The infamy of his proceedings at length became so notorious that a commissioner was sent from Rome to examine into his conduct. Dreading the inquiry, TETZEL refused to appear when summoned before the commissioner at Altenburg, on the ground that he had been warned against the adherents of LUTHER at that place; but afterward, at Augsburg, he was subjected to a rigid examination by the commissioner, by whom he was severely reprimanded for his immorality, threatened with the displeasure of the Holy Father, and with expulsion from his order. The commissioner appears to have been horror-struck with the results of his investigation. He wrote to a friend that he had detected TETZEL in many immoralities, and should report him at Rome for censure. This was in 1518. TETZEL immediately sought refuge in flight. His terror brought upon him a severe illness, from which he never recovered. He died the following year in the Dominican cloister at Leipsic.

Our engraving, from a picture by Professor HEBERLIN, of Stuttgart, represents the monk TETZEL in the heyday of his popularity. A group of soldiers are studying the license they have just bought. Peasant women press toward him for the coveted indulgence which money alone can procure, or to purchase the release of some departed soul from purgatory. The very beggars hail his approach; for TETZEL'S wares cost him nothing, and he will gauge his price to the condition of the purchaser. The picture derives additional interest from the fact that, in view of the meeting of the Œcumenical Council at Rome on the 8th of December, the Pope has this year decreed an indulgence in the form of a jubilee, promising plenary indulgence and remission of sins to all the faithful who shall recite, in designated places before the meeting of the Council, a certain number of prayers "for the conversion of souls, and the peace, tranquillity, and triumph of the Roman Catholic Church."

THE SALE OF INDULGENCES BY TETZEL.—[FROM A PAINTING BY PROFESSOR HAEBERLIN, STUTTGART.]

IN THE FALL.

The old autumnal stillness holds the wood;
Thin mist of autumn makes the day a dream;
And country sounds fall faint, half understood
And half unheeded, as to sick men seem
The voices of their friends when death is near,
And earth grows vaguer to the tired ear.

At soft gray dawns and softer evening ends
The air is echoless and dull with dews;
And leaves have fallen, and whosoever wends
His way through woods is aware of altered hues
And alien tints; and oft with hollow wind
The clustered hazel-nuts rattle to the ground.

Now comes the faint warm smell of fresh-built ricks,
And empty fields look up at empty skies,
And sounds drain sidelong from the burning quicks,
And low across the stunted stubble flies
The whirring lapwing, till the wings have grown
A murmur—then, a memory alone.

Now, haply on some sunless afternoon
When brooding winds are whispring to the leaves,
Shrill twitter'd half-notes fill the air, and soon
From farm-house thatch and cozy cottage eaves
The circling swallows call their eager brood
And straight fly south, by unseen unknown woods.

A certain sadness claims these autumn days—
A sadness sweeter to the poet's heart
Than all the hundred joys and lively ways
Of riper suns: old wounds, old woes, depart;
Life culls a truce, and nature seems to keep Herself a-hush to watch the world asleep.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book II.

CHAPTER VIII.

HUGH WILL NOT BE AMBITIOUS.

About the middle of June Mr. Frost departed for Italy. He was only to be away a fortnight at first. He would then return to London; and, if all went well, would go back to Naples in the autumn.

He had been to Gower Street several times before leaving England. He had spoken to Hugh and to Veronica, and had said that if matters succeeded with the company who were employing him he should be able to offer Hugh a splendid chance of distinguishing himself.

"But," said Hugh, "this great company will have a great number of their own. I shall only be subordinates, of course, to do the drudgery, and the big man will get the credit. I do not say that that is unfair. Big men have to earn their bigness, mostly, and I am the last fellow in the world to grudge them what they've earned. Besides, I do not want to be wandering about the Continent. I have served my apprenticeship and learned my trade, and now I want to try to make a home for myself and a place in the world. I am not ambitious—"

"A man ought to be ambitious," said Mr. Frost.

"There might be a good deal to be said on that subject. But at all events, a man ought not to say he is ambitious if he isn't."

His mother and Mr. Frost succeeded, however, in persuading Hugh to remain somewhat on the turf in his present position. He was engaged by Digby and West at a weekly salary, and no permanent arrangement had yet been come to. He would let things go on as they were for a while.

Zillah had gained a reprieve, but her anxieties remained unabated. At the best, she had trouble before her. If all went well, and her money—Hugh's money—were restored by the end of the year, it would still devolve on her to find for him some explanation as to this accession of fortune.

Her son's love and respect were very precious to her: even as her husband's had been. She knew that Hugh inherited his father's stern hatred of deception. What would he say when he knew that his mother had concealed so important a matter—and one which he surely had a right to have made acquainted with from the years? And if he asked her, "Mother, why have you done this?" how should she answer him?

She was a woman of acute and observant intelligence in most cases. In all that concerned her only son she was, of course, peculiarly quick to see and to understand. She knew that Hugh had fallen in love, and that his love was not the light, boyish fancy that Mr. Frost had tried to persuade her it would prove to be. Hugh had said no word to her on the subject, but there needed no words to convince her that such was her son. But she had a kindly regard for the girl. She admired and approved her. She was not grudging or unjust because this stranger with the deep blue eyes and golden hair had become paramount in Hugh's thoughts. She knew Hugh to be steadfast and true; and she was well assured that neither lover nor wife would push herself from her place in her son's love and respect. But as she watched Hugh's growing love for Maud, the thought of falling from her own high homestead place in his regard grew more and more painful and intolerable to her. Hugh had implicit faith in his mother's purity and goodness. She was his high model of womanhood; and he had often said to her, "I only hope my wife may be as good as my mother! I can't wish for any thing better." But could he still say so when he knew—?

There was a little human jealousy within her breast which made her feel that to humble herself now before Hugh, and say to him, "My son, I have sinned. Forgive me!" would be to yield to that other woman whom he loved a too absolute supremacy; to abdicate in her favor the sole pride and glory of her life. She did not hate Maud for stealing Hugh's heart. The wife would be nearest and dearest; that she was resigned, if not content, to bear. She would still be his honored mother. But she thought she would come to hate Maud if Hugh ever were to diminish by one iota his tribute of filial reverence. And all this time Maud knew no more of the position she occupied in the thoughts of the mother and son than we any of us know of the place we hold in each other's minds.

After the party at Mr. Lovegrove's Maud had seriously begged Hugh not to take her to any similar gathering again.

"I would not say this, dear Aunt Hilda," said Maud, "if I thought that you derived any gratification from the society of those people. But I have watched you the other night, and I am—I am sure—that you looked very weary and uninterested."

"Not uninterested—a long way my pet was there. I like to see a way admired, Maud."

"Admired! Dear Aunt Hilda—"

"Well I know, I grant ye, that the folks there were not of the best position to associate with. And if I were but in my rightful and proper position, what a delight it would be for me to receive to tea the very people we born to live in! But as to presenting, my dear child, sure how would I go to court in a street where the living is Gower Street? I don't say any thing against it, and some of the old family mansions are in dreary places; but, after all, you know, there would be a degree of incongruity about attempting to entertain, or any thing of that sort, in a lodging of this kind; and ye know, my dear, I'm living low enough for the necessaries of life as it is. Some women would run him into debt. But I couldn't bring myself to do that—from a moderate necessity: not to mention that I'd have to bear all the bullying and annoyance, seeing that he's safe and comfortable at sea beyond seas!"

Maud endeavored to persuade her aunt that it was no feeling of pride which rendered her unwilling to go to Mr. Lovegrove's. She disclaimed such a sentiment with much warmth. No; it was simply that the people had been those with whom she objected to her. That might be partly her own fault, but the fact remained so.

Maud did not speak of the anxiety of suspense about Veronica made it irksome to her to see strangers. It was a subject that could not be mentioned before any one else. Veronica had left us the weeks were on, and no answer came to her letter, her heart sank. She had scarcely even aware how much hope had been given up within her on the receipt of Veronica's letter, until she began to measure the depth of her disappointment as the days rolled by and brought no further communication.

In the old days at Shipley Maud would have enjoyed the oddity and rareness of the society she had met at the Lovegroves'. But now such enjoyment was impossible to her. She was conscious of nervously dreading a chance word which might touch on the still recent shame and sorrow that had befallen them all, as a wounded person starts away from the approach of even the gentlest hand lest it should lay itself unawares upon his hurt.

Mr. Frost's sudden mention of his proposed journey to Italy had startled Maud. She had not seen though she told herself how absurd and weak it was to be so disturbed. Hundreds of people went to Italy every summer, and one of the few people she knew were likely enough to do so. But in the frequent silent direction of her thoughts to Veronica she had not been able to associate her entirely with the word "Italy," as though that country held but one figure for all men's observation.

The question persistently presented itself to her mind: Did Mr. Frost know the story of Veronica? Was he aware who the man was with whom she had fled?

Something a little forced and unnatural in Mr. Frost's manner of discussing the subject of his approaching journey had struck her. Why should he have selected her to speak respectfully of Hugh Lockwood's prospects? Had he had any purpose in his mind of sounding her respecting her feelings toward Veronica, and of making her the excuse for giving her the information that he was bound for Italy?

The impossibility of discussing this matter with her aunt, and the necessity she was under of shutting herself up from the consolation of sympathy or companionship respecting it, made her morbidly sensitive. She brooded and tormented herself.

At last she took a resolution: she would speak to Mrs. Lockwood. That the latter had learned the whole story from her Aunt Hilda, she was well convinced. If Mr. Frost knew so much so, Mrs. Lockwood would have heard it all from Hugh. Mr. Frost was the Lockwoods' old and intimate friend. Maud would speak to Mrs. Lockwood. One afternoon after their aunt dismissed the sole down stairs, leaving Lady Zillah asleep according to custom, Maud sat at the open door was answered by Mrs. Lockwood's soft voice, saying, "Come in," and she entered.

Mrs. Lockwood sat at the table, with an account-book before her. She looked, Maud thought, old and haggard.

"Do I disturb you, Mrs. Lockwood? Please say so, if I do; and I will take another opportunity—"

"You don't disturb me in the least, my dear Miss Desmond. I have just finished my accounts for the month. Do sit down and tell me what I can do for you. There is nothing the matter with my lady?" she added, hastily, looking at Maud's face.

"Nothing, nothing. Do not let me startle you. I only wished to take the liberty of speaking to you in confidence—may I?"

Mrs. Lockwood took off the spectacles she was wearing, passed her hands over her forehead and eyes, and answered, quietly, "Pray speak."

Her manner was not tender nor encouraging, nor even very cordial; but it nerved Maud better than a too great show of feeling would have done. In a few words she told Mrs. Lockwood what Mr. Frost had said to her at the Lovegroves' about his journey to Italy, and so forth.

"Now what I wanted to ask you was this," said Maud: "You know Mr. Frost well, and I do not; do you think he had any special motive in saying all this to me, a total stranger?"

"Any special motive?" repeated Mrs. Lockwood, musing, and looking, for her, singularly embarrassed.

"I mean—what I mean is this, Mrs. Lockwood: the story of the sad sorrow and affliction that has befallen the home that was my home from the time I was a little child until the other day, is known to you. I am aware that there is, no doubt it is known to many, many other people. Is Mr. Frost one of those who know it? And did he mean to leave any thing or tell any thing about Veronica when he spoke to me of going to Italy?"

"Oh," said Mrs. Lockwood, drawing a long breath and then covering her mouth with one white, delicate hand. "You were not thinking of yourself, then, Miss Desmond?"

"Of myself? What could Mr. Frost's plans be to me, or why should he care that I should know them?"

"It was of Hugh he spoke, I thought."

"Ah, yes—I should naturally almost. He spoke to me as of something that it concerned me to know! I think of Veronica so constantly, and I am obliged to be so thoughtless up from Aunt Hilda so jealously, that perhaps I grow morbid. But I thought you would forgive my speaking to you."

"As to Mr. Frost, I can answer you in two words. He knows from the Lovegroves that you have left Mr. Lovegrove's house because his daughter ran away under particularly painful circumstances. But if your aunt has been discreet (is she discreet?) and Zillah plainly showed that she knew it was so), "neither the Lovegroves nor Mr. Frost know the name of the man she ran away with. It has been a subject of gossip, truly, but not in the circles of society where the Lovegroves move. John Oakley has acted so long out of England that he is almost forgotten."

"Thank you, Mrs. Lockwood," said Maud, absently.

"I infer from what you say that you have some reason to believe that your guardian's daughter is in the south of Italy?"

"Oh yes, I forgot that you did not know. I had a letter from her."

Mrs. Lockwood raised her eyebrows and looked at Maud attentively.

"I know I can trust you not to mention this to my aunt. You understand how impossible it is for me to speak of Veronica to her. Aunt Hilda is kind—she is, and yet, on that subject, she speaks with a harshness that is very painful to me."

"Lady Zillah has been infamously treated."

"You must understand, if you please, Mrs. Lockwood, that I have told Mr. Levincourt of my letter. He has heard from Aunt Hilda."

"You were very fond of this young lady?" said Zillah, with her eyes observantly fixed on Maud's changing face.

"Yes," answered Maud. Then the tears gathered to her eyes, and for the moment she could say no more.

"Your fondness has not been destroyed by this miserable business?" pursued Zillah.

Maud silently shook her head, and the tears fell faster.

"Would you see her and speak to her again if you could? Would you hold out your hand to her?"

Mrs. Lockwood, as she spoke, kept her mouth concealed beneath her hand, and her eyes on Maud's face.

Maud was aware of a certain constraint in the latter woman's tone. She thought it sounded disapproving, almost stern.

"Oh, Mrs. Lockwood," she cried, in much agitation, "I love her too much to be hasty! You have such a lofty standard of duty; your son has told me how excellent your life has been; he is so proud of you. He could not be hard upon her. If the good have no pity for her, what will he, come of her? I do not defend her. She failed in her duty toward her father; but she had been most basely and cruelly deceived, I am sure of it!"

"Deceived by her great love and faith in this man?" said Zillah, unwaveringly preserving the same look and attitude.

Maud paused a moment, and drooped her head. "She—she—trusted him," she murmured.

Zillah removed her hand from her mouth, and clasping both before her, rested them on the table before her. When her mouth was no longer concealed, she cast her eyes down, and ceased to look at Maud while she spoke.

"See now, Miss Desmond," said she, in her soft voice, "how compassion begins a fiend out in this world! Once I knew a girl—little more than a child in years—very ignorant, very unprotected, and very friendless. She was not a handsome, haughty young lady, living in a respectable home. This girl's associates were all low, vile people. She was poor, a pretty widow or wicked, but she loved with her whole childish, inexperienced heart, and she fell. She was most basely and cruelly deceived—I quote your words. It was neither vanity nor vainglory that led her astray—nothing but simple, blind, misplaced affection. Well, nobody pitied her, nobody cared for her, nobody helped her. If you, or any educated nurtured young lady like you, had met her in the street, you would have drawn your garments away from the contamination of her touch."

"No, no, no! Indeed you wrong me! If I had known her story I should have lifted her from the bottom of my heart."

Zillah proceeded without heeding the interruption. "And all her sufferings—they were acute—I knew her very well—could not atone. Her fault (I use the word for want of a better. Where fault lay, God knows—perhaps He cares!)—"

"Oh, Mrs. Lockwood!"

"Do I shock you? That girl's fault pursued her through life—still pursues her—"

"Is she alive?"

"Alive? Yes. I think she is dead, that girl. Her ghost walks sometimes. But another woman, in some respects a very different woman inherits her legacy of trouble and shame and sorrow. That seems hard. But if you tell me that all life is hard; that we are blind to what is true bone or false, and, as for utter any other fatalist doctrine, I can understand the reason and sequence of it. But when you preach to me that 'Conduct makes fate,' that we reap as we sow, and so forth, I point to these two cases. The one an innocent—yes, an innocent—child; the other a well-educated, proud, beautiful, beloved young woman. The loving-hearted child is crushed and tortured and forsaken. The—forgive me, but I speak what you know to be true—the selfish, vain, arrogant, ambitious lady commits the same sin against the world, and is rich, petted, and pampered. The rough places are made smooth for her feet. People cry 'How sad!' A lady! A lady's misfortune! A gentleman! Her friends hold out their hands to take her back. Even you—a pure, fresh, young creature like you—are ready to forgive her. Ready to forgive and caress her with angelic sweetness and pity."

Maud could not help perceiving that Mrs. Lockwood was mentally visiting on Veronica the hard usage of the poor betrayed young girl she had spoken of. It seemed as though in proportion to the pity that she felt for that young girl, the grudging of every spiritual gift was bestowed on Veronica. Maud felt it very strange that it should be so; and she had almost a sense of guilt herself in thinking so unkindly of her aunt. But her intellect was too clear for self-delusion, and, albeit most unwillingly, she could not but understand the spirit of Mrs. Lockwood's words, and be repulsed by it.

"I think—" said Maud, gently, and turning her pale face full on Mrs. Lockwood, "I am young and inexperienced, I know, but I do think that having loved one suffering person very much should make us tender to other sufferers."

"Sufferers!" repeated Mrs. Lockwood, with a cold contempt, and closed her mouth rigidly when she had spoken.

"Yes," answered Maud, firmly. The color rose very faintly in her cheek, and her lips were stone. "My unhappy friend is a sufferer. Not the less a sufferer because there is truth in some of the words you have said. Pride and ambition do not soften such a fall as hers."

Again Maud could not help perceiving that Mrs. Lockwood was balancing Veronica's fate against the fate of the betrayed young girl; and that she was making strange comparisons. The suggestion that Veronica's haughty spirit could be tortured by humiliation.

"There would be a grain of something like justice in that," said Zillah, under her breath.

Maud withdrew with a pained feeling. Her mind had at first been relieved at the mere fact of uttering the name of one who dwelt so constantly in her thoughts. But Mrs. Lockwood's manner had so repelled her that she had utterly resolved never again to approach the subject of Veronica's fate in speaking to her. But to her surprise the topic seemed to have an inherent attraction for Mrs. Lockwood. Whenever she found herself alone with Maud she was sure, sooner or later, to come round to it.

Once she said, after a long pause of silence, during which her fingers were busied with needle-work and her eyes cast down, "If that poor young girl—she is dead now, you know—could have had a friend like you, Miss Desmond, years and years ago, it might have gone differently with her. It would have given her courage to know that there was a pure-hearted woman pitied rather than blamed her."

"I should think all honest hearts must be filled with compassion at her story," answered Maud, in a low voice.

"Do you think a man's heart would be? Do you think that, for instance, my—my son's would be?"

"Surely! Can you doubt it?"

"Poor girl! She was so ignorant of the world! She knew there was a great gulf between her and such as you are. She had never lived with people. Poor child! She was shamed from her as the inhabitants of the moon might be. If she had had a friend like you, Miss Desmond, their poor girl who is dead, it would have given her courage, and it might have gone differently with her."

GOVERNMENT AMONG HORSES.

When left to themselves, however well domesticated horses may have been while in a state of servitude, they soon return to that wild freedom characterizes their unrestrained freedom. But a regular form of government is soon developed, even with a small number of individuals, which assumes marked proportions and exactness as the colony multiplies. As among men, one male gains an ascendency over all the others, and by general consent becomes commander-in-chief. A large, powerful stallion is at the head of this, which he retains even to old age, notwithstanding the hot blood, spirit, and magnificent muscularity of large numbers of young stallions, whose flowing manes and tails indicate the restlessness of their condition.

Another curious circumstance is this, viz., that the stallion in command for the time being is, with a few exceptions, the father of a large proportion of the whole troop. At his death a terrific conflict of heels decides who shall be the successor and controller of the harem.

On the vast plains of South America, it is a magnificent exhibition to see a noble old veteran stallion patrolling his four thousand horses in line, and then, by a sign only known to wild horses, dismiss them for the day, when they scatter at all points of the compass. That is a stampede, and hence the origin of that word.

THE PLIGHTED TROTH.

On the sands, the yellow sands,
Sat two lovers musingly,
Chirping light each other's hands,
Sadly looking toward the sea.

"I must sail in yonder ship,"
Said the youth unto the maid;
"Ere to-morrow's sun shall dip,
From my sight the shore will fade;

"But my heart with thee will dwell,
As it dwells by thee to-day,
And I shall not bid farewell
To return and ever stay."

Then the maiden whispered low,
"I shall think of thee, dear love;
Joy may yet give place to woe,
Still my heart will constant prove."

* * * * *

Years have come, and years have fled,
Since the lovers made their vow;
Fence rose and roses were shed—
But they are united now.

'Neath the ocean's ruthless wave,
Buried deep, the sailor lies;
O'er the sands the grass-grown grave
Soft and low the night-wind sighs.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

SUNDAY has not been generally observed in France by a complete cessation from labor. But now the working-classes have begun to claim an entire holiday, and some decisive measures are being taken to secure this object. The newspaper compositors of Havre signed an agreement to cease their work on Sunday at the beginning of November; and it is said that compositors of Paris and other cities of France will do the same. Mechanics, clerks, and laborers in general favor the movement, which is warmly approved by the religious portion of the community.

The New York Society of Practical Engineers at a recent meeting discussed the subject of "Railway Disasters." Their causes, and the means of prevention. A properly-constructed compound rail, safety brakes, safety couplers, safety axles, properly-constructed cars, suitable care in signaling and telegraphing—these were some of the details considered. A new method of stopping trains by the vacuum system was explained and recommended. It was remarked that the penalty of railroad corporations was the great cause that prevented the adoption of efficient invention for prevention of accidents. When the public really awoke to a thorough sense of the criminal insecurity attendant on our traveling arrangements, remedies will be devised.

On Wednesday of last week the bronze statue erected over the Hudson River Railroad Depot, in honor of Commodore Cornelius Vanderbilt, was put up with appropriate ceremonies. A large number of invited guests were present, and the prominent exercises were a prayer by Bishop Janes, an address by Mayor Hall, and a poem written for the occasion by William Henry Walker. The statue, of art, which has before been described in detail to our readers, covers an area of 2125 square feet, measures about 150 feet in a straight line, and is 61 feet in extreme height, weighs nearly 100,000 pounds, and cost over $500,000. The statue itself, which is the centre of a very elaborate bass-relief, which ingeniously illustrates the achievements of Vanderbilt, in connection with remarkable inventions of the present century, and also appropriately portrays the growth and prosperity of our Republic. Commodore Vanderbilt, the President of the New York Central and the Hudson River railroads, has been most successful in accumulating wealth; but this tribute, as well as a mere act of benevolence to immense riches. The remarkable traits of character which have made him a prominent man in private are worthy of cultivation in young and old; and this memorial will serve to remind all that energy and perseverance do pay unrewarded.

Certain English students are carrying their spirit of experimental investigation a trifle too far. At Rossall College, in Lancashire, one of the masters, Hogan, by name, was observed to put something into a sugar-basin at breakfast-time, and shortly afterward to make tender inquiries after the health of Mr. Selby, a master connected with the establishment, who, fortunately for him, had not been quite touched, for on examination it was found to contain arsenic. Mr. Hogan declared that he only put the arsenic into the sugar out of curiosity, that he wanted to make an experiment, and considered Mr. Selby the likeliest person to experiment upon; it further appears that he had more arsenic in his possession. Under these circumstances the authorities of the college permitted young Mr. Hogan's father to take him away from the establishment.

Outside of Yuval, on the resident population of about 150,000, New York city is probably the greatest centre of Mormon operations. Here is the grand depôt of their emigration department; and Mormon agents and elders are constantly passing through the city on business of various kinds. Moreover, there is a regularly organized Mormon Branch Church in Williamsburg, which is, however, only a mere resting-place for a few stationary saints, who are abiding here chiefly for the purpose of assisting those converts who arrive, and before they can leave for headquarters. Scattered throughout various parts of Europe are Mormon "Conferences," comprising in the aggregate 16,000 persons. Converts are added from time to time, and when a company is ready to emigrate it is taken in charge by one of Brigham Young's agents, and brought directly to New York.

Dr. Joseph Jones, Secretary of the Southern Historical Society, estimates that the grand total of deaths in the Southern army during the entire war did not fall short of 200,000.

Somebody has made the distressing discovery that very few college-graduates marry, and proposes that undergraduates marry to remedy the difficulty. It is said that one-fourth of the graduates of Yale have never married.

"Be kind enough, my dear cousin," said the Emperor to Prince Napoleon, "to take this letter and look into my private cabinet. It will detain you only a short period, and I desire much to have a conversation with you." The Prince entered the cabinet, but the door remained ajar. Some dispatches were just then brought to the Emperor, and he waited a few minutes after which he said to the Minister, "Eh, bien! Monsieur, and what new news have you to tell me to-day?" "Ah, sire," said the Minister, "Paris is excited about the extraordinary speech which his Imperial Highness has made to the Senate. It is revolutionary in its character, and injurious to the government." The Emperor remained a few seconds silent. "What a pity that you did not send the Prince to Mexico in the place of your harmless Maximilian, who was the best friend of France!" "Sire, the Mexican throne have delivered you, by this time, from the most dangerous enemies of France." "Pst!" said the Emperor, rising with his half-closed eyes toward the door of the cabinet where the Prince waited. It was too late. Prince Napoleon suddenly appeared at the door. With a strange, half-furious, half-sarcastic look, he measured the Minister with a contempt of his piercing eyes, bowed low to him, and stepped back again into the cabinet. The Minister was struck dumb with astonishment and terror, while the Emperor, without saying a word, quietly continued to turn his cigarette between his fingers. Such is the life of Paris people, the like of which is continually floating through that great metropolis.

What a crisis was that! A fisherman of Montereau, France, captured a fish not long ago which was found to contain a magnificent breast-pin, ornamented with thirty precious stones—diamonds, rubies, sapphires, and emeralds of extraordinary beauty. The breastpin is valued by Paris jewelers at the fabulous sum of $300,000.

George Peabody was strongly opposed to fraud in all its nature as well as large forms. The conductor on an English railway once overcharged him a shilling for fare. He made complaint to the directors, and had the man discharged. "And," said he, "that I could not afford to pay the shilling, but the man was cheating many others, and I thought the punishment would be oppressive." It is related of him that about twenty-five years ago he was so much pleased with an American lady visiting London that he offered her his hand and fortune, which were accepted. Learning a short time thereafter that the lady was a confirmed believer of fact of which she had kept him in ignorance—he rebuked her lack of sincerity, and broke off the engagement.

It is a significant fact that in answer to a recent advertisement in one of the morning papers for a nightwatchman no less than two hundred applications were received. Is this an index of the number who are destitute of employment?

The Lancet treats the subject of rowing at length, showing that instead of the back being the oarsman's strong muscles, the arms are the chief agents, and that the great muscles of the buttock, the glutei of the anatomists. According to this authority, the rowing action is composed of two movements, the first is the erection of the trunk from its stooping to a perpendicular position; and this is known as the erector spinæ, but by those powerful corde above-named, which we use whenever we raise ourselves from the stooping to the standing. The second great movement is the work of the biceps and its assisting muscles, by which the arms are drawn in from reaching to something less than a right angle. Upon the question whether the body should be straightened and the arms bent simultaneously or successively the authorities differ. Although time is gained by doing two things at once, the muscles of greatest power, which have the force of the body is hampered by the double action; and that the glutei, which do the heavy work, will command with greater facility if applied to the one action and alone, than if they divide the available power of the body with the arms also.

The Wall Street brokers, in a spirit of fun and mischief, unveiled a burlesque statue at the same hour that the genuine bronze statue of Commodore Vanderbilt was receiving due honors. The Stock Exchange was the scene of the wildest merriment during the ludicrous ceremonies. The proceedings were interrupted in the very beginning of his speech by a face-to-face introduction of the Commodore to his statue, which was acknowledged with the grace of a prima donna. Humorous allusions to the "Railroad King" and his Gospel were frequently interjected. The programme included the singing of sundry jolly songs. The statue itself was the object of the greatest good feeling toward the Commodore.

Since the withdrawal of Five Hyacinths from the order to which he belongs, he has shielded to the barefooted Carmelites to preach in public.

M. Catacazy, the new Minister from Russia to the United States, was formerly Secretary of Legation at that time the representative from Russia at the court of Greece. It is said that he recently called on Admiral Worden in the capacity of Minister to the United States in spite of the Emperor, with whom he is the favorite, during the Admiral's visit to Constantinople. He is a man of intelligence and eloquence, and possesses in a marked degree the peculiar characteristics of the Muscovite.

The grandfather of the late Lord Derby originated the great race called by his name. He was a great sporting peer of his day, and continued on the turf up to the time of his death, which occurred at the age of eighty. The late Earl was a man of valuable horses, and his death is an event in the sporting world. The family seat at Knowsley, in Lancashire, has had a race-horse breeding stud on it for a century, and many distinguished horses have been bred there.

Sainte-Beuve, the celebrated critic, never fought but one duel. He quarreled once with a Mr. Dubois, and a meeting was appointed. Sainte-Beuve arrived on the ground with an ancient flint-lock pistol and an umbrella, and as it began to rain, he at once unfurled the latter hopping up and down with impatience and vehemently protested, but Sainte-Beuve declared that he had no objection to being killed, but he did not intend to get wet. So the duel went on, Sainte-Beuve holding up his umbrella all the time. Four shots were exchanged without injury to either combatant.

The pleasant ways in which a scrupulously regulated diet affects the physical as well as the moral man are infinite. A certain philosopher found that when he ate moderately, and had brought himself into sound health, the same shoes were easy which had been tight. He ordered a pair of shoes. He had a pair rather smaller than usual, which afforded him the opportunity of making his observations with great scrutiny. He found purposely tried excess of diet, he found them so painful as to be unbearable on the feet. He grew more perfectly easy and comfortable when he ate only that happy quantity—enough. He traces even corns to indigestion.

The Exeter Hall Lenten Lecture has just appointed a new Professor of Horticulture—Miss Mary Hovey. This is a new field for woman's labors; but doubtless there are women who have the skill and gracefully. We trust Miss Hovey's gardens will blossom luxuriantly.

Dean Stanley records in his "History of Westminster Abbey" a wild legend, yet one precious to those who love the Abbey. A drunken fisherman, resting on his oars, saw a great multitude of angels descending, each carrying a lighted candle. Attended by this brilliant train, Edward the Confessor consecrated the House of God. When the ceremony was over he returned by the way he came, but not till, along with an injunction that the Thames should pay tithe of salmon to the monks, he warned his ferryman to abstain henceforth from fishing on the Lord's day.

THE NEW OVER-COAT.

It was Christmas-day, but the festivities of that occasion scarcely existed for the Harford family. The mother was ill, and there was no home. it seem like Christmas; but her drunken husband had just slammed the door behind him, while she, her daughter Ruth in a blow, turned to her boy, Fred, who had sunk down by the fireside, and given himself up to melancholy thoughts.

While sitting thus, Fred formed a resolution. He would go to the city and find employment; he would be the family's benefactress, and afford that help and comfort to his poor mother which she could look for from no other source.

Fred carried out his determination. Two years passed by, and he was to come home to spend Christmas. It was early in the morning when he reached the city, and resolved to write to his mother in a novel manner. He commenced one of those old-fashioned carols, which he had many a time sung with the little ones at home. Not a jot cared he whether he awoke the whole neighborhood or not with his resonant manly voice, so that he awoke his mother, and so that she recognized his voice. That was all he cared for. Mrs. Harford was already awake. Thoughts of her boy had made her sleepless, and she had heard the swift footsteps changing rhythm, and then stop, and then sing suddenly at her door, when the singing began; and altogether it made her heart leap, for she fancied she knew the voice, and how well she knew the carol! But the voice? It might be her boy's, but if so, how changed—how deep and manly! As the words met the carol, during the singing of which she had hastily dressed herself, trembling over herself almost in her haste, and opened the door which awoke the children in the next room, though it did not awake her husband, who was sleeping off a drunken fit, and it would have taken something a little less noisy than boozing cannon to arouse him.

In a moment she was at the door, and mother and son were in each other's arms. After a long embrace Fred moved away to look him up and down, and after a fond survey, she said, "How you are grown, Fred! and how well you look! And that fine over-coat! How did you manage to get it out of your small earnings, after what you've sent me? I am sure I have told Ruth that you did not leave yourself a penny scarcely."

"You needn't have been afraid, mother. Why, I've got plenty, too! look here. I gave fifty shillings for it."

"Is, Fred! how ever did you manage it?"

"I'll tell you by-and-by, mother. Now please help me off with my great-coat; for my hands have got the frost in them to-night. I had half a mind to bring the whole Arctic Ocean for that, thinks I, it would soon be lodged at uncle's—easy come, easy go, you know—so I decided rather to tell father how to get one as I got this: he'll prize it all the more for getting it so."

How merrily the breakfast-time passed, and what a happy day Fred proved to spend! The sunshine was come into the house at last; it lighted up the faces of the sad mother and her children, and made all bright. Toward nine o'clock the merry hubbub in the house awoke Mr. Harford; and learning that Fred was come, he set himself to the dreaded task of getting up.

Presently the church-bells began to chime, and Fred proposed that they should go to their house of worship. "I shall be glad to see the familiar old place again," he said. All the children would go, and Ruth and Fred wanted the father to go too. He refused quite decidedly at first; it was out of the question, he said, and he never went to church now. "All the more reason why you should go to-day, father," urged Fred.

"But I've got nothing fit to put on," said the father.

"Yes, you have," said the wife; "your best coat is up stairs."

"How came it there?" he asked, in astonishment.

"I'll tell you about that now," said Mrs. Harford; "but you just sit down and make yourself easy, and go out with Fred this once. We may never meet together on a Christmas-day again, you know."

"Look at Fred's coat—what a beauty!" cried Susie, as Fred took it from a peg behind the door.

"Why, Fred, you look as though you were getting on in the world," said his father. "How did you manage to get that and your watch too?"

"You must know I haven't spent a farthing of my wages on them," said Fred.

"Then how in the world did you get them?"

"The price of half a pint of beer a day for nearly three years got these for me," said Fred.

"All the fellows at our place are allowed half a pint a day. I told master that I'd rather have it, and he liked to make me any allowance for my not having it, he might; or if I just leave it out say nothing about an allowance. His said he liked to encourage young fellows to be abstainers, and he would put three half-pence a day. That has been faithfully given me for about two years and nine months, and has been transferred into six pounds ten shillings in my pocket. With that, you see, I have been well able to buy my watch and coat, and to send home some little Christmas gifts last year, as well as to bring these."

"Who'd ever ha' thought that three halfpence a day saved would have run up to that in less than three years?" said Mr. Harford, thinking dolefully of the many pence, and not only pence, but whole shillings, he had spent day after day during that time and for years before—sixpences that made many pounds, which would have bought him coats, watch, and perhaps a house too—so many had he squandered. Ned was trying to get up a sum of the same kind in mental arithmetic, though with lower figures than those which came to his father's mind; and both began to sink in self-reproach, and both felt that they had been foolish in the highest degree.

"You did well—you did well, Fred," said his father, with a sigh.

Then Mr. Harford and his children went to church. When they returned Mrs. Harford seemed much surprised to see her husband returning with the rest; and she bustled about with a glad face to get her Christmas dinner, just as in the happy days of long, long ago.

Mr. Harford managed to eat a very good meal, and felt the better for it. When it was over, and oranges and other good things brought by Fred were handed round, the children ate quite passed away, and he playfully helped the children to make wonderful things with oranges. By-and-by he leaned back in his chair, and said, "I can't believe it's me sitting here at home like this—something like the poor fellow as our parson was reading of this morning, who was sitting 'clothed, and in his right mind.'"

"Ah, it does n't a good to see you," said his wife, with gladness in her eyes.

He looked down at his coat to avoid her glance, and said, "This may look tidy, missis, but it don't keep the cold out; I was regular nipped coming home from chapel."

"You ought to have a great-coat like Fred's," she replied.

"You might easy get one, as he did, afore next winter."

"What! a new half-pence a day? 'Course I could, and I'll begin," he said.

"But I did something more than that, father," said Fred. "I made a bargain with master to give on saving for a month or two, and then let it all go."

"What did you do?"

"Why, I just kept right away from the public houses. They're the places to keep one from having a six-pence in one's back: they strip you, if you frequent them; but they'll never clothe you. You'll begin to save three half-pence a day for a great-coat, Ned, and as you say, I'll give you the other thing? If you only would, I'll tell you what you'd get besides. Why, good boots, good hat, a watch in your pocket, clothes for the youngsters, good food and plenty of it, a comfortable, happy home and wife, health of body, and a clear and peaceful mind."

"Surely, surely!" chimed in Mrs. Harford, in a half-sad, half-hopeful tone.

"And only one thing robs you of all that, father. You know what it is, and how to conquer it, too; our minister told it all to us yesterday this morning. God gives the victory over all evil, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Only we must not be still, and keep fighting to our Captain; we must strive and struggle hard to overcome, relying on His help. You remember that he said all that, father?"

"Yes, I minded it well. It seemed all for me. I thought then, if I could only begin striving I might overcome. Others—hundreds and thousands of others—have fought against this cursed habit of drinking, and overcome it."

"So may you," said Mrs. Harford. "Why, you've begun already, James. Think! you haven't had a drop to-day! All you've got to do is just to go on as you've begun, that's all."

"That 'll be enough, I guess, as the days go on. Still, folks say as the first step is the hardest, and I've taken the first, you say?"

"Yes, yes."

"Ah, well I feel it too. Fred, my boy, if we all live till next Christmas we'll have a dinner of our own buying, please God, and not of yours; and if you come to see us, I'll have as respectable a great-coat on as you."

THE NEW OVER-COAT.—[SEE PAGE 765.]

"And I too," said Ned, standing up very straight to give emphasis to his words. "No more o' my tin shall go into the publics, not if I know it. I knows a trick o' getting the value of it now, as I didn't think of afore I saw Fred's great-coat."

So, to make a long story short, it came to pass that Fred's great-coat was an instrument chosen to work quite a revolution in Harford's home. Did you ever know a man give in who commenced climbing upward and onward, with a strong determination, and relying upon God for strength and assistance? Never.

No, he did not give in; and the happy Christmas-day which they spent on the occasion of Fred's memorable visit was the first of a long series of happy ones. The sunshine that he brought did not fade away; it brightened and brightened into a perpetual glow of comfort and peace.

Fred did come home again on the following Christmas, and walked to chapel with his parents and brothers and sisters; but he was not the only one that went out of the house with a great-coat on his back that day: there were two others who had got them in the same way as he got his. He wore the same one that he had appeared in on his first visit. "It still looks almost as good as new," he said, "and I shall keep it tidy as I can. It has been the means of doing so much good that I have a sort of strong affection for my first great-coat which I could never have for any other."

"THE BUTT—SHOOTING A CHERRY."—[FROM A PAINTING BY W. MORRAOTT, R.A.]

"THE BUTT—SHOOTING A CHERRY."

OUR illustration sufficiently explains its own meaning. At first sight of the subject the stickler for the dignity of art might complain at the triviality of the incident represented. But the subtle observation of the painter, his delightful geniality, and the exquisite finesse with which he has caught all that is most characteristically boylike in gesture and expression, raise the picture into a region of purest humor, infinitely higher than the vulgar, coarse, and often brutal comicality of many of the old Dutch masters. The painter, like the poet and novelist, who enlarges the range of our sympathies, deserves the gratitude of all human kind; and in the moral, as in the physical, world there are inexhaustible materials for wonder and pleasure, in the lowly as in the elevated. Besides, in the realm of boyhood may we not find many analogies full of suggestiveness with more advanced life? How often, for instance, do we not see "children of a larger growth," greedy for gain, ready to become the "butt" of all kinds of indignities for the sake of a chance advantage—like the butcher-boy in the picture? Look at him; how anxious he is to aid the marksman—how, for steadience, he plants his feet wide asunder; how, to facilitate the aim, he protrudes his head and gapes his widest to catch the cherries. His eyes he protects with his fingers, but little he cares for the ridiculous smears on his cheeks from stray shots, which, of course, are more visible in the painting. Boylike, again, how totally oblivious in the excitement of the game are the urchins of the errands on which they were sent—the one for his orders, the other with his basket of linen. The fun affords unmixed enjoyment to the cherry-selling girls, for does not the sport entail a rapid consumption of their wares? The only individual of the group who entirely preserves his gravity is the dog, and that evidently because he is not quite sure whether he should not resent the mysterious liberties taken with his master. Of the picture itself—its admirable composition, its faultless drawing, consummate delicacy of handling, and brilliant, gem-like coloring—we need not speak; suffice it to say that it was executed at the zenith of the master's powers, as indicated by the date, 1848, of its exhibition at the Royal Academy—that is, two years after the exhibition of the famous "Choosing the Wedding Gown."

MOHAMMED'S PORTRAIT.

MOHAMMED was of middle height, rather thin, but brond of shoulders, wide of chest, strong of bone and muscle. His head was massive, strongly developed. Dark hair—slightly curled—flowed in a dense mass down almost to his shoulders. Even in advanced age it was sprinkled by only about twenty gray hairs—produced by the agonies of his "Revelations." His face was oval-shaped, slightly tawny of color. Fine, long, arched eyebrows were divided by a vein which throbbed visibly in moments of passion. Great, black, restless eyes shone out from under long heavy eyelashes. His nose was large, slightly aquiline. His teeth, upon which he bestowed great care, were well set, dazzling white. A full beard framed his manly face. His skin was clear and soft, his complexion "red and white," his hands were as "silk and satin"—even as those of a woman. His step was quick and elastic, yet firm, and as that of one "who steps from a high to a low place." In turning his face he would also turn his full body. His whole gait and presence were dignified and imposing. His countenance was mild and pensive. His laugh was rarely more than a smile. "Oh, my little son!" reads one tradition, "hadst thou seen him thou wouldest have said thou hadst seen a sun rising." "I," says another witness, "saw him in a moonlight night, and sometimes I looked at his beauty and sometimes looked at the moon, and his dress was striped with red, and he was brighter and more beautiful to me than the moon."

In his habits he was extremely simple, though he bestowed great care on his person. His eating and drinking, his dress and his furniture, retained, even when he had reached the loftiest of power, their almost primitive nature. He made a point of giving away all "superfluities." The only luxuries he indulged in were his noble arms, which he highly prized, certain yellow boots, a present from the Negus of Abyssinia, Perfumes, however, he loved passionately, to the most sensitive of smell. Strong drinks he abhorred.

His constitution was extremely delicate. He was nervously afraid of bodily pain, he would sob and roar under it. Eminently temperate in all common things of life, he was gifted with mighty powers of imagination, elevation of mind, delicacy, and refinement of feeling. "He is more modest than a virgin behind her curtain," it was said of him. He was most indulgent to his inferiors, and would never allow his servant to be struck, or scolded, whatever he did. Ten years, said Anas, his servant, was I about the prophet, and he never said as much as "Fie" to me. He was very affectionate toward his family. One of his boys died on his breast in the smoky house of the nurse, a blacksmith's wife. He was very fond of children. He would stop them in the streets, and pat their little cheeks. He never struck any one in his life. The worst expression he ever made use of in conversation was, "What has come to him?—may it be covered with dust!" Was this all mild? When asked to curse some one he replied, I have not been sent to curse, but to be a mercy to mankind. "He visited the sick, followed any bier he met, accepted the invitation of a slave to dinner, mended his own clothes, milked his goats, and would be "grieved," relates summarily another tradition. He never first withdrew his hand out of another man's palm, and turned not before the other had turned. His hand, we read elsewhere —and traditions like these give a good index of what the public expected their prophet to be—was the most generous, his breast the most courageous, his tongue the most truthful; he was the most faithful protector of those he protected, the sweetest and most agreeable in conversation; those who saw him were suddenly filled with reverence, those who came near him loved him; and who described him would say, "I have never seen his like either before or after." He was of great taciturnity, and when he spoke he spoke with emphasis and deliberation, and no one could ever forget what he said. He was, however, very nervous and restless withal, often low-spirited, downcast as to heart and eyes. Yet he would at times suddenly break through his melancholy, become gay, talkative, jocular, chiefly among his own. He would then delight in telling amusing little stories, his wife's, and his own, like to romp with the children and play with their toys —as, after his first wife's death, he was wont to play with the cubs his new baby-wife had brought into his house.

PHOTOGRAPHIC WONDERS.

SURELY light never will have revealed all its marvels! Every year, if not every day, it is telling us something which we had not known before, something calculated to excite our surprise and admiration.

Plates can now be engraved, and are engraved, for printing without any draughtsman and without any engraver. The thing has been done in more ways than one in past years, by the combination of photography with electrotyping—photography to produce the drawing, electrotype to produce the engraving; but now a method has been devised without any electric or galvanic agency whatever. Chemistry is the engraver, and chemistry is the very simple process of solution or dissolving. The process is not for producing a book engraving, such as the engraved lines of a steel plate, but a relief or roller engraving, such as a wood-cut block. Light, dissolution, and pressure; let us see how they respectively do their work.

The photographic picture is taken upon sensitized glass, just as in the ordinary carte de visite, producing a negative from which any number of positives may be taken. The picture may be a portrait, a landscape, a group of persons, an architectural façade, or what not—any thing, provided it assumes the form of a glass negative. The negative obtained from this is not upon sensitized paper, but upon a thin film of gelatine, combined with bichromate of ammonia. When light has been allowed to pass for a sufficient length of time through the negative to the positive, it shows its action in a peculiar way on the film; wherever the light is the strongest (as in the high lights of the picture), the film is rendered insoluble; wherever it is the weakest (as in the shadows), the film remains easily soluble, wherever it is intermediate (as in the half-tints), the gelatine becomes partially soluble. All is the bichromate of ammonia that renders the gelatine susceptible to these peculiar varieties of effect. We may add that the darker light more furnishes a wonderful aid in taking the positives, rendering the photographer independent of times and seasons, day and night, bright days and dull days.

We have, then, a positive picture, taken upon a film of gelatine containing bichromate of ammonia. This film being next placed in warm water, the substance dissolves away in the unequal degree just intimated; it becomes thinner in the parts least acted on by the light; the parts most acted on are scarcely dissolved at all; while the medium degrees of action produce medium degrees of dissolving or thinning. What is the total result? The film has become a sort of bas-relief; there is a picture of raised parts and depressed parts, owing to variations in the thickness of the film; and these variations are so beautifully graduated as to produce all the tints and half-tints from high lights to deep shadows.

The pressure, which next ensues, is not the least curious part of the operation. It seems scarcely conceivable that a thin film of gelatine should receive the impress of the two steel plates; the group is placed in an hydraulic press, and a great pressure is brought to bear upon it. This pressure amounts to as much as forty tons, even for a small picture, and rises to two hundred tons (nearly half a million pounds) when the dimensions are large. We might suppose that the enormous pressure would crush the delicate film into undistinguishable fragments. Nothing of the kind. The protuberances or raised parts press themselves bodily into the surface of the lead, producing a sunken or intaglio effect in all the places where the film presents a raised or convex surface, and vice versâ. It is wonderful to see how perfect is this action upon the plate, the picture appearing almost as if the work had produced it. And it is scarcely less wonderful that the thin film of gelatine will bear twenty or thirty of these pressures, transferring the picture to twenty or thirty plates, before being worn out.

Lastly comes the printing. If the lead plate were inked in the ordinary way with inking-rollers, and passed through an ordinary printing-press, the print would evidently present a mass of inside of black and white, without any gradations or half-tints whatever: this would result naturally from the peculiar mode in which the plate is prepared. An ink or color, however, is got ready, consisting of water and gelatine mixed with some kind of pigment or color. This ink, instead of being lightly applied by means of a roller, is poured as a liquid all over the plate; and pressure of the proper kind and to the proper degree is applied, sufficient to squeeze out all the superfluous ink; and the paper is allowed thus to remain under the gelatine ink for an hour, or slightly solidified. The print, when removed, is dipped in a fixing-bath, which renders the ink permanent.

Another curiosity in recent photographic art is an accident, not a design—a peculiarity in the negative which was not supposed in producing negatives and positives. A photographer, taking a photograph with a pellicle instead of a glass, left it not with the usual portrait of the sitter, but at some little distance a copy, phantom, ghost, or double of it—projecting nothing whatever in a startling effect, and one not likely to be very pleasant to the sitter, especially if of a superstitious turn of mind. Some curiously similar cases in, and left no room for the creations of marvelmongers. Upon investigation, it was shown that these phantoms (if we may so call them) present two different varieties, and spring from two different causes. (1.) A photographic image is sometimes so deeply impressed on a glass of the negative by the action of light, that the subsequent cleaning of the glass plate, even with strong acids, will not entirely remove the picture. When such a plate is used for receiving another picture, the original image faintly makes its reappearance. (2.) When a sitter has sat not the "double" or "fetch" of the sitter in the second picture; it is a very faint photograph of the person on the second plate, and contains a fully developed photograph of some other person; and the photographer, having carefully repeatedly, produces very startling Pepper-like ghost effects. (2.) When a lens has inequalities in its substance, due to an imperfect process of casting, or when it is subjected to unequal pressure in different parts, it acquires the property called double refraction, whereby images of the object being produced by it at the same instant. This explains the production of the double or fetch phantom. An English photographer has made the matter accidentally. When he took a carte de visite portrait with a particular lens, there could be seen on the ground-glass screen of the lens in the usual way, but at some little distance another and a fainter image—a second portrait of the same person.

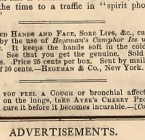
In both these cases science set the matter right by showing that, in the first instance, there was a faint picture beyond a faint image of a former picture; and that, in the second instance, the lens of glass was subject to the influence of what is called double refraction. Thus two ghosts have been "laid," and rational explanations given of seeming mysteries. In a few years to come, science will probably recollect a little incident some half a dozen years ago, in which a photographic curiosity, instead of being regarded as such on scientific data, was made instrumental to a trading dodge. An announcement appeared in one of the papers, that to the sitter for a photographer took his own portrait, no one else being present in the room; that, besides his own form, there appeared on the picture the image of a young girl twelve or thirteen years old; and that this image was the portrait of a cousin of his, who had been dead several years. The young lady appeared to be sitting in the same chair as the photographer himself, as a sort of "dissolving view." The outline of the upper part of her body was well defined, though dim and shadowy; the chair was distinctly seen through the body and arms, as also was the table, upon which one arm rested; below the waist (which was apparently attired in a dress with low neck and short sleeves), the image faded away in a dim mist, which simply clouded the lower part of the picture. Now it has been clearly ascertained that all this would really occur under certain conditions. If the glass negative had been already used for a portrait of the young lady, and if it had been insufficiently cleaned before the second application in the camera, precisely such a double picture might result—the fully developed portrait of the photographer being superposed, as it were, on a faint portrait of the young girl. All this is curious and instructive; but it led at the time to a traffic in "spirit photographs."

CRAPPED HANDS AND FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured at once by the use of Dr. Benson's Cimoline Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 20 cents.—HEDDEN & CO., NEW YORK.

WHEN YOU FEEL A COUGH or bronchial affection creeping in the lungs, Dr. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, and cure it before it becomes incurable.—(ADVT.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

$10, $12, $15, $20, $25.



Watches and Imitation Brazilian and Australian Diamond Jewelry. Styles Oriole Gold Chains, $3 to $10 each. Call or send for Price-List.

JOHN POGUE,
No. 79 Nassau St., N.Y.

SIX PINTS

OF ANNIHILATION, for Catarrh or Colds in the head, or a pint of PAIN PAINT, sent, free of express charges, on receipt of $5; or a gallon of PAIN PAINT for $20, donation strength. Address R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y. Remit by express, or Post-Office money order, money is registered letter. Small bottles sold at all Drug Stores.

EVERY CONSUMPTIVE AND INVALID
SHOULD IMMEDIATELY USE
WINCHESTER'S
HYPOPHOSPHITES,
THE BEST AND ONLY SUCCESSFUL REMEDY FOR THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION!
AND ALL
Diseases of the THROAT and LUNGS.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
J. WINCHESTER & Co., Proprietors, 36 John St., N.Y.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,
Nos. 75 and 77 Spring St., corner Crosby.
ESTABLISHED 1850.
Wholesale and retail manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, SPRING MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c., suitable for city and country residences.
ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

Four Months sent free of THE BEE-KEEPERS' JOURNAL and National Agricultural,

It is a large Illustrated, double-size, eight-page paper, containing Five different Departments—Bee-Keeping, Agriculture, Home and Fireside, Ladies' and Youths' Departments, making it the cheapest and best Journal paper in America, for only $1 a year. One sample copy Sent Free to any applicant. Send to all enterprising Bee-Keepers. Address

H. A. KING & Co., 37 Park Row, N.Y.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S
Establishment for the sale of
HOUSE FURNISHING
Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at
1172 Broadway, cor. 28th Street.
Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Wares of their own manufacture. The household articles requiring Replating done on short notice. They are also prepared to contract for Bell Work and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

WATERS'
NEW SCALE PIANOS.
With Iron Frame, Overstrung Bass and Agraffe Bridge.
Melodeons and Cabinet Organs.
The best manufactured. Warranted for 6 years.
Prices Low for Cash, or Installments. Organs—Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New 7-octave Pianos, $275 and $300; second-hand Pianos, $60 upward. Second-hand Instruments, $40 upward. Monthly installments received. Warerooms, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y. HORACE WATERS.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR
PRIEST and NUN.
Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 1504 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

DOSEY'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.
A Complete Catalogue now ready. Sent free. Containing the NEW HALF-DIME Edition of the Best Songs. Sold every where, or specimen number mailed for Five Cents.—648 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and commentary upon, the events of the times. It will treat of every topic, Political, Historical, Literary, and Scientific, which is of interest to the people. In No. 475, for November 30, was commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscriptions will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870 for $4 00.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

HARPER'S BAZAR is a Journal for the Home. It is especially devoted to all subjects pertaining to domestic and Social Life. It furnishes the latest Fashions in Dress and Ornament, Letters from Paris, and out-door Amusements; contains Stories, Essays, and Poetry—in short, is in brief, calculated to make an American Home attractive.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Number for December commences the Fortieth Volume of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. Such a circumstance is contemplated in the general character of the Magazine, the Devoted to which will fail to avail themselves of any suggestions which may add to its present interest or permanent value. Especial interest and attention will be given to the departments of Popular Science and Art, and the Editor upon these subjects will be profusely illustrated. It is proposed that the various Historical Departments shall give a complete résumé of the times. The Easy Chair will comment upon topics relating to social life and manners. The Book Table will criticise the important books of the day. The Monthly Record will note all important political events. The Drawer will present the facile and anecdotic element.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in the English language. Thus the ample space at the disposal of its conductors will enable them to entertain fully of all the topics embraced in their plan.

The Publishers feel themselves warranted in speaking and anticipating for the future a continuance of the favor which has been accorded to them in the previous in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or, two of the above for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be prepaid by the quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions will commence with the Number next after receipt. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber desires to begin with the Current Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the first Number issued after the receipt of the order. It is understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Volume next after the receipt of the order.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will please to state with what Number they wish their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is also necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred. In the absence of these, money should be sent in Registered Letters.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS in great variety. Published by P. P. WELL, Manufacturer and Importer, 663 Broadway.

A FINE PRESENT!—The new HALF-DIME Songs and Nine Views, $3 00; a fine Stereoscope, with Box and Twelve Views, $5 00.

NASBY'S PAPER.

The Toledo Blade.

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns filled with News from all parts of the World; Choice original and selected Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit and Humor; a Commercial Department, a Religious Department, a Young Folks' Department, and an Agricultural Department, all prepared expressly for the Blade. It has a large National Newspaper circulation, and the constant aim of the Proprietors to make the Blade a live National Newspaper and not a paper for the East, the West, the North, or the South, but for The Whole Country.

PETROLEUM V. NASBY, P. M.

No humorous literature of the age has been more universally read, or more quoted than the utters of "Petroleum Nasby." Aiming always at the correction of some evil, combining profound philosophy and unanswerable arguments with the keenest wit and richest humor, the "Confidrit & Postmaster" Preacher has become famous wherever the English language is read. These letters are written expressly for the Blade, and will be continued regularly in its columns.

A NEW STORY.—Mr. LOCKE (Petroleum V. Nasby), is now engaged on a new story, entitled "Paul Dunbar, or, LOST AND FOUND. A Story of the Great Rebellion. This thrilling story will be published in the columns of the Blade during the coming year, and of itself will be pronounced by every reader worth many times the subscription price of the paper.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten and over, $1 50 each, and an extra copy to every person getting up a Club.

PAY! PAY! PAY! We pay liberally, in Cash, all who assist us in extending the circulation of the Blade.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent at every Post-Office in the United States. Send for our Specimen Copy and Terms.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Send for a copy, and at the same time give us the address of a dozen or so of your friends, at as many different Post-Offices, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid. Address

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is an exact counterfeit of gold, and cannot be told from gold except by the touch. It has precisely the appearance of gold, and is as durable as gold. It has seriously occupied the attention of the gold men, and has not only baffled both the detectives and the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

Price, only $10 to $25.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, free, on demand.

Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., with privilege to examine.

Address J. HIGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 44 Nassau Street, New York.

Impaired Digestion.

All the organs of the body are, so to speak, the pensioners of the stomach. In that living laboratory is prepared the nourishment required to sustain them, and by the veins and ducts connected with the digestive apparatus, that nourishment is conveyed to every part of the system. Upon the quality and quantity of this element of life, and upon the manner in which its distribution is performed, physical health mainly depends; and as the mind inevitably sympathizes with the body, the vigor of the one is absolutely necessary to the well-being of the other.

It is because

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

accomplishes this double object that it enjoys a reputation as a preventive and curative never heretofore attained by any medicinal preparation. But its direct beneficial operation upon the weak or disordered stomach is not the only consideration. It is the most comprehensive of all known remedies. It tones, strengthens, and regulates the discharging as well as the assimilating organs; gently moving the bowels, promoting healthful evacuation through the pores, counteracting the fever from its torpor, and inducing harmonious and natural action in the whole animal machinery. Its curative results are not produced by any of the reactionary drugs which are used so lavishly by the mineral practice, founded by Paracelsus, but by mild, safe, and agreeable vegetable agents intermixed with a pure and mellow stimulant which diffuses their influence through the system and renders their sanitary properties active and effective.

"A good Agricultural Library"
May be found in the volumes of the

NEW ENGLAND FARMER.

So says the Watchman and Reflector.

Our subscribers will find much besides, in return for their money.

Terms: $2 50 a year for the Weekly, or $1 50 for the Monthly. Send stamp for specimens and premium list.

R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

$2500 to $3000 PER YEAR.

An Agent is wanted in every town in the Union to make and sell an article of daily consumption in every family. It is entirely new. Sale perpetual as flour.

Address LOUIS CORLENTE,
Middletown, Md.

$10. $20.
$15. $25.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Oroide). These justly celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established, as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Horizontal Watches, $10, equal in appearance, for time to Gold Watches worth $100. Full Jeweled Levers, $15, equal to $150 Gold ones. Full-Jeweled Levers, extra fine and superior finish, $25, equal to $200 Gold ones.

We have just commenced making a very fine American Watch, full jeweled, Patent Lever, chronometer balance, adapted to heat, cold, and position, 45 minutes down weight, equal in appearance and for time to a Gold Watch costing $150.

We charge only $25 for these magnificent Watches, and our readers are in both cases "pents" and insides" sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $2 to $5 each, all kinds of Jewelry, such as can be had with the price.

CALIFORNIA DIAMONDS.

We are now making Jewelry of the California Diamonds. These are real stones of great brilliancy and sharpness, and can not be distinguished from the precious stones, even by good judges. They are particularly brilliant at night by artificial light, do not scratch or become dull by use, and retain their brilliancy for an indefinite time. The following are the prices:

Ladies' and Gents' Finger Rings, single stones, one carat ..... $8 each
Gents' Pins, single stone, according to the size of the stone ..... $5 to $6
Ladies' Cluster Pins $7 50
Ladies' Cluster Earrings $7 50

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free.

Goods sent by Express to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

FRENCH CLOCKS,

BRONZES,
FANCY GOODS,
Musical Boxes, Fans,
Opera Glasses,
FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,
PARIS AND VIENNA
NOVELTIES,
WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,

No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York.

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜3

S. W. GEERY,

IMPORTER,
Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Fine Wines, Cigars, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly I. A. Geery, New York.
Established in 1806.

The selection of Choice Teas and Fine Wines has been the especial study of this house for years.

My stock comprises some of the Oldest Cognacs in the country.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing in particular demand by Family Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

MASON & HOADLY'S METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.

A new work which has been thoroughly tested in private teaching, and which has proved to be of the highest value in the following respects: The necessary material to train pupils in the most thorough manner. A method by which any one may become master of the instrument, and to such an aim at only moderate proficiency it is made easy. A self-instructor. Containing the ACCENT EXERCISES invented by Mr. Mason, and found in no other work.

By WM. MASON and E. S. HOADLY.

Price, with either American or Foreign Fingering, $4 00. Postage paid, on receipt of price.

O. DITSON & CO., Boston;
C. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

A GENTS WANTED for our new work; sells to all classes, without regard to politics, religion, or occupation. Now Ready

Our Home Physician.

A new Handy-Book of Family Medicine. By George M. Beard, A.M., M.D., Professor of the Institute of the City of New York. This is new work, written up to date. Sold by subscription only. Price, $2 50. Dogmas exposed. Send for 16-page circular.

J. B. FORD & CO., 658 Broadway, N. Y.;
TREAT & LILLEY, 117 So. Clark St., Chicago, Ill.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machines. The best machine in the world. Now on sale on both sides. First machine on trial. For further particulars, address

THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE Co.,
Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.

WANTED-AGENTS.—To sell the American Knitting Machine. Price $25. The simplest, cheapest, and most durable Knitter ever vented. Will knit 30,000 stitches per minute. Liberal inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

$200 to $800 PER MONTH made by any man or woman in any town manufacturing and selling Rubber Moulding and Weather Strips for Doors and Windows. Instructions and Price-List of Materials furnished. Rex Brasstreet, Boston, Mass.

THE SOPRANO. A Musical Story. By Jane G. Kingsford. Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 00. LORING, Publisher, Boston.

$25 A DAY.—$2 new articles for Agents. Samples free. H. S. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

The Companion is an eight-page weekly paper—practical in its character, wide-awake, and entertertaining.

It gives a great variety of reading, interesting alike to young and old—and has for contributors such writers as

Rev. Edward E. Hale, Harriet Beecher Stowe,
Mrs. Louisa Chandler Moulton, "Sophie May,"
Miss E. Stuart Phelps, Mrs. Helen C. Weeks, together with many other well known and popular authors. Subscription Price $1 50. Send for a specimen copy to

PERRY MASON & CO.,
Publishers Youth's Companion,
151 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!
NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH
AND MODE OF TREATMENT.

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It consists of the concentrated inhalation of hermes liquidus—they are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing, and powerful curatives. Relief and comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in due course of time. It penetrates through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at the fountain head—removes all the wretched symptoms, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the passages, offensive matter discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat, hawking, spitting, sneezing, dizziness, loss of memory, dimness of vision, and restores the sense of taste and smell. Under this treatment the whole loathsome malady in all its forms forever, and cures the most hopeless cases. Send a Stamp for a pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, office 11 Ann St., N. Y.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with employment at their own homes, the whole of the time, or for their spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex readily earn from 50c. to $ per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion, one of the largest and best family newspapers publishedsent free by mail. Address, with your full address, plainly and distinctly, G. STINSON & CO., Augusta, Maine.

THE DOLLAR WATCH.—A perfect timekeeper, will be sent to any address, postpaid. Cased in pure Oroide of Gold, enameled dial, glass crystal, solid and brass works. Usual watch size. Made entirely of metal, and in elegantly-finished Oroide case. Entirely reliable and durable. A "dollar" gem of ingenuity." This is no useless compass. Warranted five years. Satisfaction guaranteed. Single sample, in neat case, mailed prepaid for only $1, three for $2, by addressing the sole manufacturers,

MAGNETIC WATCH CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

"A SPLENDID PAPER."

SO SAYS ONE OF OUR EXCHANGES OF THE

NEW YORK OBSERVER.

$3 00 PER ANNUM.

SAMPLE COPIES FREE.

SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

MAPLE LEAVES, enlarged and improved. The best, the most popular, and the cheapest Sunday-school paper published. Sent from now to the end of 1870 for 50 cents. Send in your subscriptions without delay.

O. A. ROORBACH, 102 Nassau St., New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER,

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, he can do his own printing cheaper, with a saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information sent free. Printers, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimens of work, &c., sent for 25 cents. Address

ADAMS PRESS CO., 53 Murray Street, New York.

POCKET REVOLVERS. WEST'S

Are the most reliable weapons made. Self-cocking. A neat, durable weapon; four-inch barrel. Price $1 50, postpaid. Address H. AUSTIN, Elmira, N. Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair or beard to a permanent shade of Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1. For sale by Merchants & Druggists generally. Address MAGIC COMB Co., Quincy, Mass.

THE MEXICAN; or, LOVE AND LAND. A charming poem, illustrated; 1 vol., 16mo, 320 pages, cloth binding. By mail, $1, post free. Address PUBLISHER, Box 153, Brooklyn, N. Y.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either Harper's Weekly, Monthly, or Bazar, $4, and The Packard's Business College, $5, sent to one address for $8, by E. B. WELLS, 209 Broadway, New York.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fuller, N. Y.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by Benjamin Vincent, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the Use of American Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

2.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. By Joseph McCarthy, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbors." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

3.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. Hartwig, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Tropical World of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.

4.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By John S. C. Abbott, Author of "The French Revolution," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

5.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By Edmund Yates, Author of "Kissing the Rod," "Black Sheep," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.

THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE, King of Naples and of Italy. By Jacob A. Abbott, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. Uniform with the above.

7.

ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES.

16mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

Cyrus the Great, Darius the Great, Xerxes, Alexander the Great, Romulus, Hannibal, Pyrrhus, Julius Cæsar, Cleopatra, Nero, Alfred the Great, William the Conqueror, Queen Elizabeth, Peter the Great, Marie Antoinette, Madame Roland, Henry IV., Peter the Great, Queen Hortense, King Philip, Hernando Cortez, Margaret of Anjou, Joseph Bonaparte.

8.

A ROVER ON HORSEBACK; or, A County Family. A Novel. By the Author of "One of the Family," "Carlyon's Year," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

9.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the Civil, Military, Scenery, Antiquities, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, LL.D. The Pictorial Field-Book of Lossing. Vol. II. With 80 Illustrations, exclusive of the Revolution." With 80 Illustrations, exclusive of the Revolution." With 80 Illustrations, exclusive of the Revolution."

FRIEND (to newly-arrived Irishman). "Ah, Mike, me boy, you're just in time to Vote. Come away with me and get Naturalized. Yer may be an Alderman soon yerself, if yer like."

C. G. Gunther's Sons,

502—504 BROADWAY,

Offer a very Elegant Assortment of Novelties in

SEAL AND ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, TURBANS, Boas, Ties, &c.

STEINWAY & SONS'
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANOS.

Recipients of the First Grand Gold Medal of Honor at the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867; the Grand Testimonial Medal of the Paris Société des Beaux Arts, in the same year; the Grand Honorary Gold Medal of Merit, with the Crown and Ribbon, from the King of Sweden and Norway, and the Academical Honors and Membership from the Royal Academies of Science and Arts at Berlin and Stockholm. And also of the First Prize Medalet the International Exhibition in London, 1862, together with thirty-five first-class Premiums in the United States.

Warerooms, Steinway Hall,
Nos. 109 and 111 East 14th Street, New York.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS
SOAP SAPOLIO
211 WASHINGTON St. N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—AGENTS WANTED, $75 to $200 per month, male and female, to sell the celebrated and original Genuine Seven Machine Machine, improved and perfected: it will hem, fell, stitch, tuck, bind, braid and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. For simplicity and durability, it has no rival. Do not buy from any parties selling machines under the same name as ours, unless having a Certificate of agency signed by us, as they are worthless Cast-Iron Machines.

For Circulars and Terms, apply to or address, C. BOWERS & CO., 436 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the sleeping-room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. An experience of nine years without a failure proves that it is perfect, reliable, and satisfactory. Thousands who are using it testify to its merits, as will be seen by a pamphlet obtainable at the office. The public are cautioned against infringement, either in selling or vending. The law will be applied to all such cases. E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N. Y.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.) Baltimore, Md.

£28,000,000.—Lawrence Townley Estate, of Yorkshire, England. According to the opinion of the best lawyers, I am the heir to this Estate. I will sell a few shares at a reduced price to obtain money to prosecute my claim in England. For particulars, address JASIEL LAWRENCE, New York.

Hatter and Furrier.
DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
717 BROADWAY,
offers at low prices:
LADIES' FINE FURS in every variety: SEAL and ASTRAKHAN SACQUES AND TURBANS;
WHITE FOX MUFFS AND BOAS;
CHILDREN'S FURS, GENTS' FURS, &c.
Importer of ENGLISH HATS for Gentlemen's Wear.

AGENTS WANTED for
WILLSON'S
SCHOOL and FAMILY CHARTS.
To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

CUFFROY'S COD LIVER DRAGEES
PREPARED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TRADE MARK.

SENT POSTPAID ON RECEIPT OF PRICE.
SUGAR-COATED PILLS OF
COD-LIVER EXTRACT.
CURES COUGHS, COLDS, CONSUMPTION, &c.
NOT OBJECTIONABLE to the MOST DELICATE STOMACH.
PRICES.—Box of 60 Dragees, equal to one and a half pints of oil, 75 cents; box of 150 Dragees, $1.25; box of 340 Dragees, $2.00.
Physicians having cases where cod-liver oil is indicated, will obtain better results by the use of the Dragees than with cod-liver oil.
For full particulars, containing medical scientific reports, physicians' certificates, &c., &c., send for pamphlet to WARD, SOUTHERLAND, & CO., Wholesale Agents, 126 William Street, New York.

WILLIAM KNABE & CO.'S
(ESTABLISHED THIRTY-TWO YEARS)
GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT PIANOS.
BALTIMORE, MD.

These Instruments have been before the public for thirty-two years, and upon their excellence alone attained an UNPURCHASED PRE-EMINENCE which pronounces them UNEQUALED for their Tone, Touch, Workmanship, and Durability.
They have been awarded Sixty-five Gold and Silver Medals at different Fairs over other competitors.
All of their Square Pianos have their New Improved
Overstrung Scale
and
Upper Three Octaves Agraffe.
Warerooms . . . . . { 650 Broadway, New York; 69 Washington Street, Chicago, Ill.
J. BAUER & CO., General Agents.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. MERCH, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; H. D. MUNSON, Zanesville, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Pittsburgh, Pa.; C. REMBE, Pittsburgh, Pa.; L. B. POWELL, Scranton, Pa.; CLEVEY & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HAMMER, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; H. S. MAGEE, Rochester, N. Y.; H. DUREY, Buffalo, N. Y.; HEDSTROM & HOWE, Syracuse, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; COREY BROS., Providence, R. I.; C. M. LOCKIE, New Haven, Conn.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C. W.; E. FELBER & BRO., St. John, N. B.

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES
AT
JOHN ADAMS & CO.

For Ladies.

Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Merino Hosiery,
Kid and Castor Gloves.

For Misses.

Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Patent Union Dresses,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Cashmere Hosiery,
Roman and Fancy Sashes.

No. 637 Broadway.

A BALSAMIC HAIR RENEWER.

Mr. WM. MASSON, of Bergen City, Hudson County, New Jersey, says: "For a number of years, my hair has been falling out, but since using BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS the falling has ceased, and the hair has become vigorous and strong."

AGENTS.—ORODE GOLD.—AGENTS. $20 a day made easy. ORODE GOLD PAT. FOUNTAIN PEN. Indestructible. Writes 4 pages with one dip. Sells at sight—looks like 16-carat Gold. Sample box, by mail, for 75 cents, postpaid. Also other novelties. CITY NOVELTY CO., 404 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
C. A. STEVENS & CO.,
40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York,

are offering
A choice selection of Diamonds, Pearls, Sapphires, and other Gems, mounted in the most artistic manner. Also, Fine Jewelry of every variety. Watches from the best American and European manufacturers.
Silver and Plated Ware, a choice selection constantly on hand.
Particular attention given to the Resetting of Diamonds, and the manufacture of Silver Ware for Testimonials and Weddings, from original designs.
AGENTS for the SALE OF WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO. of MARION, New Jersey. Send for Circular.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.
(Patented June 1, 1858.)

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful
SIMPLICITY,
DURABILITY,
and CHEAPNESS.
Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.
☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜
SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.
Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, bind, braid, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $15. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., OR ST. LOUIS, MO.
CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

FOR THE BIOGRAPHY OF
GEORGE PEABODY,
and a representation of the Portrait presented to him by Queen Victoria, see "BOURNE'S LONDON MERCHANTS," published by Harper & Brothers.

FAMOUS LONDON MERCHANTS. A Book for Boys. By H. R. FOX BOURNE. With Portrait of George Peabody and 24 Illustrations. 18mo, Cloth, $1.00.
☞ Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of $1.00.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

TO THE LADIES.—One week's time, plenty of salary guaranteed, will pay for a first-rate SEWING MACHINE. Address COREY D. KELSEY, 120 Lexington Ave., New York.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
45 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

GOODALL'S PLAYING CARDS
New patterns. Victor & Manger, Sole Ag'ts, 110 Reade St.

Send for terms of 'Linden Hall,' Lititz, Lancaster Co., Pa.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 675.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

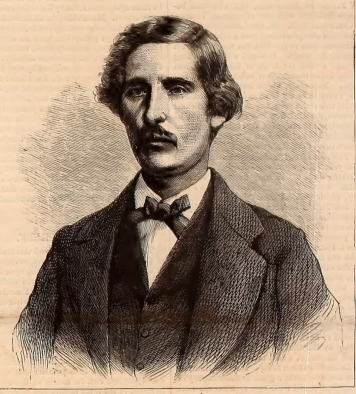
SEÑOR MIGUEL ALDAMA,

PRESIDENT OF THE CUBAN JUNTA.

THE character and standing of the members of the Cuban Junta, in this city, are a guarantee to the friends of the Cuban cause that its interests will not be allowed to suffer. The Junta consists of six members besides the President. These are, HILARION CISNEROS, CARLOS DEL CASTELLO, FRANCISCO ESTEES, JOSE M. MORA, MANUEL MARQUEZ STERLING, and J. M. MESTRE. Three of these have been distinguished members of the Havana bar. The others have gained equal distinction in eminent business positions.

The newly-chosen President of the Cuban Junta, Señor MIGUEL ALDAMA, is a gentleman of about fifty years, of very dark complexion, sharp black eyes, active, bold, and full of the American spirit. He owns five of the largest and most valuable estates in Cuba, which estates lately employed 3000 or 4000 negroes and Chinamen. Besides these, he owns the grandest private residence in Havana, and a large share of the Havana Railroad, most of which property, to the amount of several millions, has recently been confiscated by the Spanish Government. Señor ALDAMA has always been prominent among the revolutionary spirits of Cuba. A few years ago General SERRANO offered him, by order of Queen ISABELLA, the title of Marquis of Santa Rosa, which honor he declined. He was, until exiled, President of the Havana Insurance Company, and a member of the Council of Administration of the Island of Cuba. In January his splendid mansion in Havana was sacked by the Volunteers of the Spanish army; and his other property, before the Spanish Government seized it, was pillaged by the troops without let or hindrance. Señor ALDAMA enters upon his duties at a time when the cause of Cuban independence in this country is sadly in need of an efficient leader. His friends predict for him signal success.

Besides the portrait of President ALDAMA, we also give on this page a representation of the burning of a plantation by the Cuban insurgents. This work of devastation is now being carried out on the largest possible scale, and is one of the marked features of the war as at present carried on by the Cubans, who find that their only chance of success depends upon the destruction of the enemy's supplies. They are doing what SHERIDAN did in the Valley of the Shenandoah, and what SHERMAN did in his march through Georgia and the Carolinas.



SEÑOR MIGUEL ALDAMA, PRESIDENT OF THE CUBAN JUNTA, NEW YORK CITY. [PHOTOGRAPHED BY S. A. COHEN, HAVANA.]

SLEEP AND DEATH.

"To love life without fearing death," said Hufeland, is the only means of living happy and dying at a good old age. People who dread death seldom attain longevity. If death presents itself to us under a repulsive and terrifying aspect, it is solely owing to our habits and prejudices having perverted our feelings. Montaigne justly said that it is the darkening the room, the faces full of grief and desolation, the moaning and crying, that make death terrific. Civilization, by investing death with the most lugubrious associations that it can conjure up, has also contributed to rendering it a hideous spectre. It is the reverse with the patient. In nine cases out of ten death is not only a relief, but almost a sense of voluptuousness. Sleep daily teaches us the reality of death. "Sleep and death are twins," said the poets of antiquity. Why, then, should we fear death, when we daily invoke its brother as a friend and a consolation? "Life," said Buffon, "begins to fail long before it is utterly gone." Why, then, should we dread the last moment, when we are prepared for its advent by so many other moments of a similar character? Death is as natural as life. Both come to us in the same way, without our consciousness, without our being able to determine the advent of either. No one knows the exact moments when he goes to sleep, none will know the exact moment of his death. It is certain that death is generally a pleasurable feeling. Lucan used to say that life would be unsupportable to man if the gods had not hidden from him the happiness he would experience in dying. Tullius Marcellinus, Francis Suarez, and the philosopher La Mettrie, all spoke of the voluptuousness of their last moments. Such are the consolations which philosophy presents to timid minds that dread death. We need not say what much higher and loftier consolations await the Christian who is firm and steadfast in his faith, and has before him the prospect of eternal life.

THE CUBAN INSURGENTS BURNING PLANTATIONS.

RECEPTION.

O meadow that lies right under the skies,
Open all night and day!
I wish I were listening half so well
To hear what the listeners say.
So quick to welcome what they let fall,
So ready with thanks as true,
I never should lack any good at all
If my heart were like you!

Blossoming sweet and full to meet
Every smile of the sun,
Growing glad with a brighter green
Wherever the waters run;
Garnering up into golden grain
All the light and the dew,
I never should have any day in vain
If my heart were like you!

CARL SPENCER.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1869.

JOURNALISM.

THE Morals and Manners of Journalism is the subject of an article, by Mr. RICHARD GRANT WHITE, in the December Galaxy, which presents very fairly some of the chief difficulties of journalism. The theory of true journalism he thinks plain. It is candor, good faith, and decency. But he also thinks that the consideration accorded to a journalist of acknowledged ability is not one of unmingled respect. This arises from the fact that an editor is believed to grind his own axes, shielding his friends and smiting his enemies. The pressure upon him to do this, Mr. WHITE's own experience probably teaches him. Here, for instance, is editor Smith's bosom friend, the poet Brown, who has just published a little volume of fugitive verses. A review of it appeared in Smith's paper which was very severe, which even denied that Brown was a poet. Mr. Brown instantly quarreled with editor Smith, and really felt personally aggrieved. "If your friend," he said, bitterly, "won't praise your book, who will?"

It is unquestionably true that a great deal of the current amount of criticism upon every subject is regarded with great suspicion by the public. The critics, despite Jonkins, are generous and friendly men, and it is very hard for them to blight young hopes, even by a truth-telling that seems unkind. Mr. WHITE says truly that the ideal editor must know neither personal friend nor enemy in his paper. But the position of a journalist upon such a condition is one of the most difficult conceivable. The root of the difficulty is in human nature. If editor Smith sincerely likes the poet Brown, and enjoys his companionship, it is plainly one of the severest acts of discipline to which he can subject himself to sacrificing publicly that in which Brown is not a poet. What man likes to tell in private his honest opinion of the performances of his friends? But to step to the front-door with a speaking-trumpet, and halloo them to the street, seems to be a very superfluity of frankness.

But, as Mr. WHITE truly says, the editor has made a contract of honor with the public. He has asked its support upon the condition that he shall tell the truth. He has invited confidence. It is dishonorable in him, therefore, to yield to personal partiality or persuasion. He must do what WASHINGTON did as President—express the opinion regard as a man, if he has it, but add that as President he can have no private regards. There is a duty of the public, also, in this matter, which we hope Mr. WHITE will enforce in one of the articles of his series. If it is dishonorable in the editor to be influenced in his statements by personal preference, it is dangerous in individuals to appeal to him upon personal grounds. If editor Smith is dishonest when he says that Brown's poems are delightful, what is Brown, who does not ask that the truth shall be told about his book, but that it shall have "a kind notice?" And so with every enterprise and advertisement.

The editor, indeed, should say to his advertisers what the Philadelphia anti-slavery merchant said to his Southern customers, in the good old days of darkness and shame, who told him that they would buy enormously of him if he would only hold his condemned abolition tongue—"Gentlemen, I sell my goods, not my principles." The editor sells space in his paper for an advertisement and its presentation to his thousands of readers; he doesn't sell his opinion that Tom's bitters are better than Jack's; and if Tom and Jack will not advertise in the paper unless the editor will say that he likes each better than the other, which is the substance of such praise, it is because they do not really think the paper a good medium for advertisement. The request is, therefore, an insinuation against the paper; and if the paper is very truly say that, as each advertiser has an equal claim to demand a puff, to yield to any one would be to concede a principle that, in making the paper a mere advertisement-sheet which nobody would care to see, would ruin its value as an advertiser.

Mr. WHITE will continue his treatment of the subject; and his views both of the duty of an editor and the necessity of a stricter general regard to it, in order to deepen and purify the influence of journalism, will certainly have the support and sympathy of every journalist who respects and comprehends his profession.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE great work which has just been finished in Egypt probably takes most of the world by surprise. The long talk about the Suez Canal had become so vague that there was something almost startling in the announcement that the work was done, and that the Emperor of Austria, the Empress of France, the Prince of Prussia, a Prince of Italy, and a multitude of smaller potentates and representatives, would take part in the ceremony of opening the canal. The real hero of the work, however, is not an emperor or king, but a French gentleman, M. FERDINAND DE LESSEPS, who was formerly Consul of France at Alexandria, and who then became intimate with the subsequent Viceroy, MOHAMMED SAID. M. DE LESSEPS says, what had been always evident, that a canal from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea was a short cut around the world. It would abolish the long voyage around the Cape of Good Hope, and bring India thousands of miles nearer to Europe. NAPOLEON, whose imagination was always dazzled by the East, and who dreamed of a vast Oriental empire, hoped that the old canal between the Red Sea and the Nile could be opened, but the report of his engineers asserted that the level of the Red Sea was thirty feet above that of the Mediterranean.

This statement remained unchallenged until the year 1846, when some French engineers working upon the isthmus discovered the mistake. Instantly measures were taken for a survey, which political events interrupted. But at last M. DE LESSEPS received the authority to undertake the work, and he invited the great powers to form an International Commission to prosecute it. England, under the cabinet of Lord PALMERSTON, resisted. That minister, who was much more British than wise, sneered at the enterprise as a bubble. But a Company was organized, with a capital of $40,000,000, of which France took $10,000,000, and in April, 1859, the work began. In May, 1863, the expenses had reached $7,067,000, and there were 20,000 laborers employed. The difficulties seemed insuperable, and the Porte offered to finish it and reimburse the previous outlay to the Company. There was a long legal discussion, which ended in the decision of LOUIS NAPOLEON to support M. DE LESSEPS. The Emperor made a grant to the Company of $16,800,000, and from that moment the work went steadily on. As fast as the canal was finished it was opened to traffic, and was used by the British Government to forward supplies during the Abyssinian war.

Through what disheartening difficulties M. DE LESSEPS has pushed his way, only those who have followed the enterprise can know. But his long night of doubt ends in a splendid morning. The consequences of his success are evident, and if any account of the canal will be dry, it is one that tends to break down so rapidly the barriers of distance which separate nations and retard civilization. The canal is a hundred miles longer than the hundred and twenty-eight feet wide, and twenty-six feet deep; and its entire cost is $35,000,000. Already Europe is preparing to pass through it. Russia, England, France, Austria, Italy, and Spain are adapting their steamers to the canal traffic, and a commercial company is organized in the United States to trade with the East through the canal. The victory is great, and not its least part is that it undoubtedly abolishes Cape Horn, by securing a similar passage through the Isthmus of PANAMA.

ST. DOMINGO.

MRS. TOODLES thought that brass knockers were handy to have in the house, and that a good-plate warmer Cornhill Magazine thought to be inexpressibly convenient if a daughter should chance to marry a gentleman of that name. St. Domingo is a handy island, but what do we want of it? We are virtually pledged in honor to pay the sum stipulated by treaty for St. Thomas; and the accession to our population of the Free Dames there would be unobjectionable. But why add to this the population of St. Domingo, and presently, of course, the rest of the island? The population of the half of the island which is the subject of the supposed negotiations is about 160,000, and its revenue during the last year is said to have been $800,000. The Bay of Samana, which was the object that first attracted the attention of Mr. SEWARD, is upon the Dominican coast—a historic point, for it was from the mountains behind it that TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE and DESSALINES saw the French fleet that NAPOLEON had sent to reduce the islanders again to slavery—the movement that led to the most heroic struggle for liberty.

Whenever a political community in our neighborhood voluntarily proposes annexation to the United States the proposition should be most carefully considered, and if it be a truly spontaneous movement, should lead to some kind of alliance. But negotiations of the kind that must be presumed in the case of St. Domingo can not be regarded as spontaneous acts. The people of St. Domingo probably know and care nothing about annexation, and the authority of BAEZ to treat for any body but himself is very doubtful. There is no reason nor necessity in our own situation for enlarging the present domain of the United States; while to annex part of a foreign island, peopled by those who are aliens in every respect, and whose accession merely increases the ignorance and the incoherence of our own population, certainly can not be considered a stroke of wise statesmanship. Such an act neither enriches nor strengthens us. And, plainly, if we are anxious for a rapid increase of the utterly foreign element in the population, the swift current of the irresistible Chinese immigration ought to satisfy us.

Whatever opinion the public must, of course, be submitted to the Senate, and will undoubtedly be thoroughly considered by it and the country in every aspect. Meanwhile, the administration of General GRANT is so entirely free from Buncomb, and its foreign policy has been so sagacious, that we can very patiently await the lifting of the veil from the Samana mystery. Mr. FISH is not likely to be seduced by any chimera of manifest destiny, nor do his official fingers burn to pluck the fruit of territorial acquisition before it is fully ripe. Still less is the Administration capable of preparing a pretext to seize a point in the West Indies to annoy or to threaten Spain. If it means war it will say war. It has no object like the extension and defense of slavery, which was the secret of the continental policy of the Democratic administrations. Its desires are for undisturbed prosperity and peaceful progress of the country; and we await with curiosity an argument to show that those objects will be promoted by the annexation of St. Domingo.

THE GRAIN TRADE.

THE vicissitudes which attend this trade are of great interest to this country, seven-tenths of whose population are engaged in agricultural pursuits. Hence the various grain outlets of the Atlantic coast, and from San Francisco on the Pacific side of the Union, there has recently been poured into the markets of Great Britain a large amount of wheat than at any previous time. The cable telegram has been employed in the unusual service of announcing these important movements.

The total of wheat and flour received there from all countries in September and October was 4,000,000 cwt. in excess of the quantity received in the two months last year. From the United States, for September alone, Great Britain received of wheat 1,423,000 cwt., and of flour 136,000 cwt., against 184,937 of wheat, and 30,674 of flour, for September, 1868.

The British returns of imports for the nine months ending September 30, 1869, are not less remarkable than the others. They imported from the United States in that period 7,938,818 cwt. of wheat, and 968,555 cwt. of flour, against only 1,487,000 cwt. of wheat, and 1,083,000 of flour, for the equivalent period in 1868. We reversed positions with Russia, hitherto the larger exporters of grain to England. For the nine months ending with 1869 Russia furnished 4,763,704 cwt. of wheat, although in 1868, for that period, she had forwarded 7,142,034.

But the most significant result to the United States is this, that although her most important competitors were crippled with the same drought which prevailed over England, the value of our shipments of wheat, for the first eight months of 1869, is stated in the foreign market at only £3,548,158, while the inferior quantity in 1868 received a valuation of £4,596,570.

Wheat has recently fallen in England, notwithstanding the need of increased imports, to a price lower than the average for several years, which is explained thus: "The famine which has prevailed in the wheat trade of late, and the check which has recently been given to an upward movement, are due," says the London Chamber of Commerce, "to our large importations, and in a great measure to the abundance which exists in the United States."

But in the Number of Agriculture this reason is given: "The potatoes appear to be every where unsound, and are being forced upon the market in large quantities. This has had an unfavorable effect upon the grain trade, but the present depression upon the market induced by this cause will undoubtedly be followed by a reaction."

The fall in price was unquestionably due in part to the several causes mentioned; but it was also owing to the fall in gold at New York, which affected the currency price of wheat in the proportion in which gold fell. This point is beginning to be understood by those who produced their wheat at high currency prices, although they can command for the gold received from the foreigner who buys wheat only a low currency price. The principal agency for putting down the price of gold is the Treasury department; and yet the quantity of paper currency is not diminished in the same proportion, or, indeed at all. The fall in gold can not be permanent unless the paper currency is reduced to an equivalent extent—a boon scarcely to be expected from Congress at the coming session.

The circumstances were all favorable for rewarding our farming interest with remunerative prices. The Secretary of the Birmingham, England, a highly respectable authority, in their grain circular of the 4th of November, say: "The accounts as to the yield of the wheat crop have become very unfavorable, has progressed, and millers complain that the new wheat works weak, and that even the white sorts do not grind a good color."

The defect in potatoes and wheat is one of the effects of the drought of last year, which, although it gave to wheat some qualities which in the moist climate of England are not ordinarily imparted, yet prevented the full maturity of most vegetable products. New seed potatoes and wheat should have been used in the cause of such as were immature. This caution will be more necessary next year, and particularly as to potatoes, which probably owe their existence to disease in part to the partial use of small, and consequently defective, tubers for planting.

But there are other difficulties which need to be taken into view. At a meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, held on the 2d of November in London, Mr. GARDINER, of Tan Rent, near Ripon, "that, in the opinion of the Council, the corn averages, as at present taken, are fallacious, and that the buyers' returns should be limited to purchases from growers only." Mr. CLARE SEWELL READ, who seconded the motion, and in doing so thought it right and proper for the purchasers to make the returns. "If the growers were obliged to make the returns, he was afraid that they would be more unsatisfactorily made than they were at present." The Chairman, CLARE S. READ, M.P., said that "the present averages were made up from the best samples, which frequently were published two or three times over." It may be feared if the Gazette averages are fallacious, that the estimates as to the quantity of grain produced, which are voluntarily made, have like defects.

It is thus be seen that in England the accuracy of important returns is impeached by the Central Chamber of Agriculture, composed of picked men; that this crop and that of the potato are defective in quality—that has heretofore been shown to be so as to quantity; and that the price of wheat at Mark Lane is lower than the average, although it is more important than ever for the grain year will be required. Before the condition of their present crop of wheat was known, it was supposed that the millions of bushels of it would be sold and need to be imported between the late and succeeding harvests.

On looking at the situation in this country it will appear to be equally anomalous. The drought along the Atlantic coast, which commenced in June, continued until about the occurrence of the autumnal equinox. The rains then experienced were severe in some of the Eastern States, but light over the residue of the coast, and stock had to be fed from winter fodder six or seven weeks earlier than usual. This drought affected the corn crop and the pasturage in a most serious manner; and it appears also that the corn crop in the Far West was very light, and that, by reason of severe storms occurring in harvest-time, the wheat then being gathered was severely damaged. California, instead of having the 6th crop at first reported, will not have, as later and reliable estimates show, more than two-thirds.

The breaks in the railroads occasioned this fall checked the transfer of wheat to the seaboard, and caused it to herd during the detention of cargoes; but yet, with the certainty of an unusual foreign demand for the United States, and of a probable inability on the part of Russia and some other grain-growing States to offer their usual competition, wheat has steadily risen in this market. On the closing of the canals for the winter—when the stock in market and its condition may be known—the price of our exportable product will be firmer.

The demand for currency to go to the South and West, to be used in the prosecution of their growing industries—which is still in progress—is also to the difficulty which speculators experience in carrying gold. And as no foreign country requires it from us, but, on the contrary, our bonds are taken abroad in advances, it has not been difficult to lower the price of gold, especially on the eve of shipments of cotton and grain, which must go forward in large quantities.

But it is competent for our foreign creditors to change the state of things at their pleasure, and although no immediate motive for doing so is at present apparent, we are satisfied that if that portion of the farming interest which is able to do so shall cultivate what the "Country Gentleman" calls the beneficent disposition to hold on to part of their produce, they will benefit themselves and the country.

THE CLEVELAND TY

The Convention at Cleveland to form an American Woman's Suffrage Association is not another sign of the depth and extent of the feeling upon the subject. There has been a very general impression among the friends of the cause that it has been unnecessarily prejudiced in the public mind by a thousand follies that have been associated with it, but which have no essential relation to it. The foolish practice of calling a convention to discuss a grave political question, and then permitting every body to discuss every thing, has retarded and turned to ridicule the most serious efforts of the most earnest persons. Undoubtedly the action of the Cleveland Convention will tend to hold the movement strictly to its purpose. And the purpose is a repudiation of the national debt, nor defeat of the Fifteenth Amendment, nor an eight-hour law, nor any thing but a removal of the political disabilities of women.

These subjects may all be worthy of the most careful consideration, and it may be desirable to form societies and hold meetings to discuss them and to affect public opinion; but if a free-trade convention should allow the apostles of Shakerism to occupy their time, or if the meetings to secure an eight-hour law should surrender their platform to discussions upon temperance, nothing but confusion would ensue. Even the old Abolitionists, who seemed to think that a law to make speech another's right of any body to say any thing at any time and any where, could not quite hold to their own rule, and finally removed by force from their meetings Father Lamson and Abby Folson, whose freedom of speech enslaved the speech of every body else. A movement like that for the admission of women to political equality requires the most thoughtful consideration, which it certainly will not receive so long as it is incessantly associated in the public mind with the most ludicrous vagaries of folly or insanity.

The advantage of a reasonable method in presenting the subject was seen at the late meeting at Hartford. The speakers were previously invited, and they came prepared. The intention of the meeting was not general discussion, but a conference; and although much of the work was done in the manner proposed, the meeting adjourned. Any thoughtful person who read the Hartford speeches would see at once that there was much light and reason in them than in those of any of our ordinary political conventions. Indeed, one such meeting in which intelligent women take part is the best and powerful argument for the cause. Already the most intelligent opponents of the movement, represented in New York by the Tribune and the Evening Post, admit that women will have political equality whenever they vote for it, or whenever a majority of women ask for it. This shows, at least, an intellectual state of very serious hostility, although it is not easy to say precisely what it means, unless it is a mere begging of the question by assuming that a majority of women never will ask.

What number of women, and where, are to be polled upon the subject, or what is to be considered an authentic expression of their wish, is nowhere stated. Meanwhile there is an equal reluctance or inability to mention why the political disability of one intelligent and competent citizen should depend upon the whim of another who may be both ignorant and incapable. We shall be disappointed if the Cleveland Convention does not have the question of the political equality of women distinctly and impressively before the American people.

TWO GLIMPSES OF THE SOUTHERN STATES.

The darkest picture of the condition of the Southern States since the war is that drawn by Mr. Parker Pillsbury, one of the original uncompromising abolitionists, who has lately made a journey in the South, and has written an account of his impressions for the Independent. Some of the Democratic papers immediately seized upon Mr. Pillsbury's testimony, as if it implied repentance of his course, and condemnation of the anti-slavery movement for disturbing the tranquillity of the palmy days of peace and the old régime, when a seventh of the population of the country were denied every right, and reduced to brutishness, and the fundamental principles and constitutional guarantees of the government were utterly despised and outraged in half the country. But Mr. Pillsbury takes care to explain that the sad condition of the colored population at the South is directly due to slavery, and that in his opinion the Democratic party and the Church were the chief upholders of slavery. He finds the gloomy situation, therefore—the present ruin, as he considers it, of the region he has seen—the most conclusive justification of all that he and his friends formerly said about slavery; and were the work of agitation to be done over again, he would speak still more strongly—and Mr. Pillsbury's voice was never weak—of the accursed system that dishonored the nation, caused the war, and almost hopelessly degraded its victims. The Democratic supporters of the good old system of slavery will not be much comforted by Mr. Parker Pillsbury.

Sad as the southern colored people are, considering the terrible tragedy of their late condition, Mr. Pillsbury considers it highly complimentary to human nature that they are not worse than they are. In fact, Mr. Pillsbury thinks that the old relation of the races substantially continues at the South. The Northern settlers, he says, are generally of a poor kind. They despise the colored population as much as the old slave-masters. Labor is as disreputable as ever, and the colored people are forced to work for wages that forbid the least improvement of their condition, or to starve. Drunkenness is apparently universal, and Mr. Pillsbury remarks that "intemperance, in public men is not looked for, not expected, not even desired." But he adds: "And this is as true here in Washington as further south or further north." Of course, all this must be taken as a very rapid and a very rough generalization. But it is useful as showing how much is to be done in the Southern States before they will be in any degree upon the general level of civilization with the rest of the country. Mr. Pillsbury finds the one encouraging hope, a severe system of common schools in the schools. And it is interesting to consider, with his dismal description of the general condition, the facts just presented by the Superintendent of Public Instruction, the General Superintendent of Schools among the Freedmen.

The whole number of day and night un-Sectarian schools among the Freedmen under regularly reported to the Superintendent or known by him, is 4424; the total number of teachers is 9503; and of pupils of all kinds, 252,405. This is the largest number ever known, and is a decided increase upon the corresponding six months of the last year. In the schools regularly reported the number of pupils is 204,253, of which 192,227 were slaves before the war. The whole number of schools regularly reported is 3314, and of these the freedmen sustained wholly 1581, and in 1733 the owners of 759 of the buildings in which the schools are held; while the Bureau furnishes but 773. Most of the schools are conducted upon the most approved system, and of the advanced schools 312 are reported as graded. In Virginia, money from the Peabody fund has assisted the colored schools; and Virginia leads in the new Constitution provision for free public schools, which, in the judgment of the Commissioner, should be her safety and her glory. And in the year 1869 there were in Virginia a gain of 50 schools, owned by the freedmen alone. In North Carolina there has been a gain of 56 schools and 25 Sabbath-schools, with 2 orphanages. In Georgia there is a gain of 105 schools and 4525 pupils. In Mississippi there is a gain of 67 schools and 2975 pupils. In Tennessee there is a gain of 30 schools and 4343 pupils. South Carolina, Florida, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas all show improvement; but Alabama lags. Kentucky has been unwisely passed by, and the prospects of the schools are most encouraging.

This picture, if not too rosy—and there is no reason to suppose that it is so—is a very agreeable companion to that of Mr. Pillsbury. The teachers in these schools, modest, diligent, unknown, are doing a work which will tell results won in the field, and to renew the Union upon eternal foundations, than any other class of persons in the country. Indeed, the free schools are the great work of the popular government. There is no interest so vital to the general welfare; and it is of the last importance that they should be carefully watched every where, and diligently guarded from the fatal touch of sectarian ecclestastical influence.

METROPOLITAN ART MUSEUM.

The Art Committee of the Union League Club recently invited Professor Comfort, of Princeton, to deliver an address upon the general subject of Museums of Art, in the hope of an interesting public at the subject that a metropolitan museum may be established in New York. Mr. Bryant, always associated with humane and liberal movements, presided in person at the meeting, and the selection of the orator was especially fortunate, as Professor Comfort is carefully studied in Europe the subject upon which he came to discuss.

It is a little remarkable that, with the indication of rich men among us to devote their wealth to public advantage, and to have done it there has as yet been no great public gallery founded that should rank with the Astor Library. It is not indeed easy to buy the pictures that the metropolitan museum of art must contemplate not only pictures, but every form of the fine arts—sculpture, mosaics, bronzes, vases. Indeed, there is one kind of collection which is peculiarly practicable for an American gallery. If the best pictures can be but slowly procured, the finest statues in the world are accessible to us in casts, and casts are copies so perfect that they reproduce the originals. Whoever remembers the Dresden collection of casts will perceive what is possible in New York.

But there is another class of objects in such a museum which would be of the highest immediate practical value. A complete collection of the smaller remains of art, as they are called, would show us the important truth which is wholly forgotten in this country, but toward the perception of which criticism indicates a reaction, "the highest art is not truly for ornament, but for use. A masterly and delightful exposition on this fact was made by the late Cardinal Wiseman in England, in a lecture delivered some years ago, which has been recently republished here by the friendly care and interest of Mr. Clarence. The Cardinal called his discourse the Identity of the Artist and the Artisan; and in a series of historical illustrations, most felicitously drawn, he showed that the truth that the artisan not only designed, but personally wrought their finest works, and that many of the most celebrated objects of art were of common household use.

The Cardinal imagines a museum of art amply stored with the most precious remains—statues, mosaics, urns, utensils of every kind, which we rail off and protect under glass. Let us suppose these all to have been owned by one rich man two thousand years ago in Italy, and now to be his descendant. He would certainly arrange all to their proper places: this to the garden, that to the kitchen, the other to the chamber and the dressing-room, the mosaic to the vestibule, and the whole museum of what it is as a multitude of things to be admired would disappear into a variety of conveniences to be used.

Or again, here are exquisite objects from Herculaneum and Pompeii. They were, of course, the most common, the most familiar articles in the ordinary houses. We infer from the fact that none others are found, and that, if there were time to escape with any treasures, the most valuable would have been taken and not these common articles. They seem to us, as we look at them, so graceful, so beautiful, that we preserve them for admiration in galleries, or place them for the ornament of our modern rooms. Suppose now that New York should be suddenly buried in the mud of the streets, as will very probably happen, and an Pompeii was lost in the ashes of Vesuvius. Then suppose that, after two thousand years, curious antiquarians from the most enlightened of nations there should open our kitchens and closets, and are so captivated with the grace and charm of our pots and pans, and cups and glasses, that they bear them away delightedly. Not merely as specimens of that of an extinct people, but as objects of imperishable beauty. Should we not, if we were there to reflect, wonder what must be the æsthetic condition of a people who thought our kettles and tureens so beautiful that they must be preserved for admiration? And if so, what must the Pompeiian think of the taste of the 19th century?

The young man who is longing to become an artist, but who does not dream that the house painting and the wall decorator are entitled to that name, should not only recall Benvenuto Cellini and Luca della Robbia, but should piously remember that the common works of art are the mere painting and decoration of ceilings and wall hangings. Some of his most exquisite labor was imitation of the older and more perfect art of decoration in the Golden House of Nero. Go, young seeker, study the Stanze of Raphael in the Vatican, and the frescoes of Michael Angelo in the Sistine Chapel, the Tommy and mosaics and the Pompeiian lamps, and remember that art is not only a pretty patch upon daily life, but an integral part of it. If the admirable efforts of Professor Comfort and the gentlemen of the Art Committee shall result in founding an ample museum which shall serve to remind us that the high office of art is to make us beautiful, they will deserve more gratitude than if they had found a new gold mine, or had annexed a foreign island to their country.

NOTES.

Attorney-General Hoar has written a plain letter to Mr. Edward L. G. Spalding, whose "Financial History of the War" we recently commended: in which he says, that "we should have borrowed money as we did our armies, regarding the volunteers and the greenbacks alike as necessities of war, to be disposed of with as fair a proceeds at the return of peace." The only way to treat the subject, in his view, is a steady and persistent contraction—a painful process, but the result in delay does not make less painful. In the clouds and whirlwinds of speculation upon the subject of a return to specie payments one thing only is clear, that no plan will ever be generally approved in which the burden of contraction is not borne by those who have their own responsibility, and trust to the ultimate success of his policy, whatever it may be, to compel the approval of the country.

Mr. Ezra Cornell has given the use of some land at Ithaca for a horticultural school for girls, to be directed by Miss Mariwedel, formerly Principal of the School of Industry for girls at Hamburg. Mr. Andrew S. Fuller, of New York, has also promised to give seeds and plants. The school is to be co-operative, with a capital of fifteen thousand dollars in shares of five dollars each, upon which no more than five per cent. dividend will ever be declared; all other profits being devoted to the school or to pay back the capital. The purpose of the school is the instruction of girls in the culture of fruits, flowers, and vegetables, and perhaps the care of bees. The duties of study will include botany, the propagation and culture of plants, agricultural chemistry and economy, hygiene, practical drawing, one or more foreign languages, housekeeping, and needle-work. In fact, it is to be a school in which the intention will be to accomplish girls to help themselves. The course of two or three years will be necessary to secure a diploma. The admission-fee will be ten dollars; the instruction will be free to all who can pay by work. The work must depend, of course, upon the subscription to the capital stock, which will be received only by Mrs. Horace Mann, Cambridge; Mr. Cornell, Ithaca; the Rev. James Freeman Clarke, Boston; A. S. Fuller or A. M. Fo. ell, New York.

The Duke of Genoa, who is in danger of becoming King of Spain, is a boy of fifteen, the son of the late Duke, who died in 1855, and the nephew of Victor Emanuel. He is now a pupil of Matthew Arnold in England, and, it is understood, has replied to the offer of the Spanish crown that he could not accept it only if the Cortes elect him by a majority of two-thirds. There is evidently some serious opposition to his election, although he has a very numerous party. If Spain must have a king, however, it is certainly foolish to choose a minor. It is a great pity that a nation which in this age want a King should not select a mature and real one.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

The official returns from New York State show Nelson's majority to be 29,566. The total vote is only 1,054,136, showing a falling off of 68,000 votes with that of last year. The Republican decrease in 109,078; Democratic gain, 41,000.

The Judiciary article of the new Constitution of New York State was adopted by the 600 majority in the recent election.

The Alabama Legislature has ratified the Fifteenth Amendment to the National Constitution. The vote in the House was 72 yeas to 34 nays; in the Senate 26 yeas 09, nays 10.

Both Houses of the Tennessee Legislature have ratified the Fifteenth Amendment.

The expenses of the Treasury Department from January 1, 1860, to August 31, 1869, were $1,140,028.

The capital invested in the cotton mills in Lowell is fully shown in the report of Treasurer Spinner just completed. The following are the actual payments for the past seven fiscal years: 1863, $963,586 21; 1864, $1,119,000; 1865, $1,000,000; 1866, $1,125,000; 1867, $1,440,000; 1868, $2,307,000; 14; 1869, $2,-000,000.

The gale of November 16-17 was very destructive in the Northwest. Over 200 vessels were driven on shore, eight in number, was lost in attempting to reach the shore fifteen miles south of Chicago.

A new building at St. Louis was blown down on the morning of November 21, and fifteen persons were killed under the ruins.

The steamer Sea at Port Sully, Dacotah, destroyed $1,000,000 worth of government property.

During a recent exhibition trial in the Safety Theatre, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on the night of November 15, the cartridge in a gun, fired by a lieutenant Jahns, which was shattered by the ripper of one of the actors in a dancing scene. The panic-stricken audience fled, but before the audience could escape the whole interior was in flames, and many were compelled to jump from the windows of the second story. The bodies of two persons were discovered in the ruins. Fifteen or twenty persons were badly injured.

FOREIGN NEWS.

It is said that, together with M. Ollivier, two other members of the Third Party are to enter the Cabinet. The Journal Officiel denies that any such changes are contemplated.

The organic laws and elections for the Corse Legislatif in Paris began on November 21 without disturbance.

The nomination of the Duke of Genoa to the Spanish throne is regarded as the support of the Emperor to the Cortes. It is reported that the Spanish Government will propose a proposition to establish a penal colony on one of the Spanish islands in the Pacific Ocean. The proposition is the more urged on the ground that the completion of the Pacific Railroad will afford American continent will facilitate communercial relations between Spain and her possessions in the Pacific, and would render the latter more valuable for colonization.

The proclamation for Porto Rico, declaring the island a Spanish province, permitting public meetings in the discussion of the administration, forbidding the discussion of the slavery question, has been submitted to the Cortes.

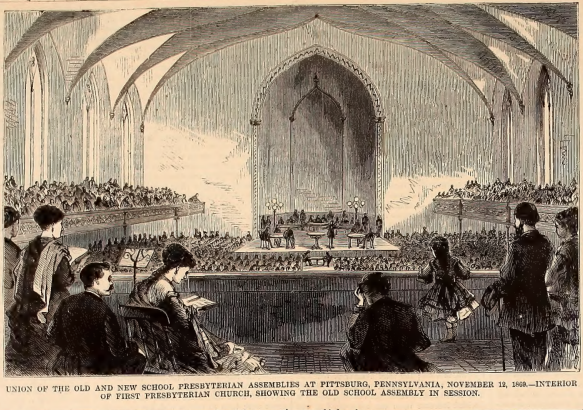
The international scolling match between Walter Brown, of Portland, Maine, and J. H. Sadler, of Saskatoon, took place on the Tyne, at Newcastle, on November 15, and was won by two lengths.

Telegrams from Ismailia, on the Suez Canal, dated November 17, announce the inauguration of the canal. A procession of vessels, headed by the Empress Eugenie's yacht, passed through the opening through the first part of the canal. At the shallowest part the depth is said to be seventeen feet. The canal is reported to be extremely five to thirty feet in other portions. The entire fleet of the Suez Canal Company, on the morning of the 19, the Aigle leading. On the evening of the 18th there was a grand state banquet given by the Khedive on board the Empress's yacht. The fleet consisted of fifty-seven ships, with an average tonnage of one thousand tons each. The vessel of the Khedive was a Russian frigate, which drew seventeen feet and two inches of water. The buildings at Ismailia are decorated with guests and other visitors, and the surrounding country is covered with tents. Invited guests from all who were assembled in numerous numbers. On that portion of the canal which is between the Mediterranean ties of the Chambers of Commerce, members of the press, and others. A statue of M. de Lesseps was also erected at Port Said.

Intelligence of the latest accounts from Paraguay President Lopez had transferred his head-quarters and sent off commissioners to the Brazilian war to report that Lopez had killed his mother, one of his children, and a number of the more southern part of the Victoria Nyanza. His finding of a chain of lakes connected by rivers four to six days' journey, the Tanganyika has encouraged him in the opinion that the Victoria Nyanza, of which Mr. Livingstone promises, and as Sir Roderick Murchison believes, gives the true position of the sources of the Nile as a serious error.

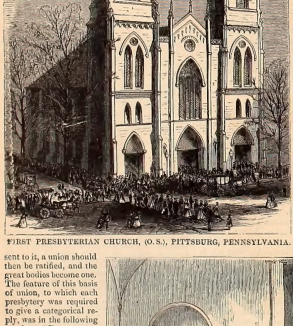
THE PRESBYTERIAN UNION AT PITTSBURG.

THE grandest and most sublime spectacle ever witnessed in the ecclesiastical history of America transpired in Pittsburg on Friday, the 12th of this month. The disastrous division, which took place in 1837, of the Presbyterian Church in this country was brought to a close, and a happy reunion cemented on that day. At the meetings of the two General Assemblies held in New York last May—that of the Old School in the Brick Church on Fifth Avenue, and that of the New School in the Church of the Covenant on Park Avenue—the joint Committee of Conference presented simultaneously to the two bodies a basis of union to be sent down to the various presbyteries of both Assemblies, to be acted upon before the 1st of November. The Assemblies then adjourned, to meet in Pittsburg November 10, to hear the result of this action; and if two-thirds of the presbyteries of each Assembly should have been found to concur, in a body from the Third Presbyterian Church to the First Presbyterian Church, where the Old School Assembly had held its sessions. There the two Assemblies met and formed a procession, the two Moderators leading arm in arm, and each Old School delegate walking arm in arm with one of the New School. This procession, numbering about 1000, moved down Wood Street, Fifth Avenue, Smithfield Street, and Sixth Avenue, to the Third Church. The entire city appeared to have poured forth into the streets to witness this unusual spectacle.



UNION OF THE OLD AND NEW SCHOOL PRESBYTERIAN ASSEMBLIES AT PITTSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA, NOVEMBER 12, 1869.—INTERIOR OF FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, SHOWING THE OLD SCHOOL ASSEMBLY IN SESSION.

The church was soon filled to its utmost capacity. The Moderators—Rev. Dr. JACOBUS, O. S., and Rev. Dr. FOWLER, N. S.—took their places on the centre of the platform, facing the audience, surrounded by the most eminent men of both bodies. Such a meeting had never been assembled in America. Amidst the abundant pledges of affection and co-operation, old men fell into each other's arms and wept; sobs were audible all over the house; and every sentiment uttered was followed with enthusiastic applause. The year of jubilee seemed actually to have come when the two Moderators arose and clasped each other's hands, as a symbolic expression of the union just consummated. Their example was followed by all the members. Hands were every where linked together, and a burst of praise broke forth, like the rushing of many waters, from more than two thousand throats. Addresses were made by the two Moderators, also by Drs. ADAMS, MUSGRAVE, FISHER, and by Hon. WILLIAM E. DODGE and GEORGE H. STUART. The service, interspersed with hymns and prayers, continued for four hours. At 3 o'clock P.M. the meeting was dissolved. May it not be hoped that the example thus shown in the union of the two great bodies of the Presbyterian Church of America will be followed by other Evangelical bodies, until the Protestant Churches of our country shall be a grand unit in spirit if not in ecclesiastical organization.



FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, (O. S.), PITTSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

was found that more than two-thirds—the constitutional number required—had given their consent, and at each of the Assemblies in Pittsburg the result was announced simultaneously, in the following words, viz.: "'This Assembly, having received and examined the statements of the several presbyteries on the basis of the reunion of the two bodies now claiming the name and rights of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, do hereby find and declare that the said basis of reunion has been approved by more than two-thirds of the presbyteries connected with each branch of the Church. Now, therefore we do solemnly declare that said basis of union is of binding force."

Thus was healed a breach that commenced in bitterness thirty-two years ago, and the two bodies, long separated, were again made one. The significance of this action may be seen by looking at the strength of each Church. The Old School branch embraces 142 presbyteries, 2737 churches, 2230 ministers, and 252,555 communicants. The New School branch, 113 presbyteries, 1500 churches, 1800 ministers, 184,687 communicants. United, as they now are, they present an ecclesiastical body having 19 synods, 255 presbyteries, 4327 churches, 4130 ministers, and 437,242 communicants. During the last year these bodies contributed, for the support of public worship, $5,782,950, and gave to various benevolent operations the amount of nearly $1,000,000, making an aggregate of over six millions and a half.

The united Church will immediately organize its forces anew, and use every effort to extend its work and influence. A resolution passed the united body to proceed at once to the raising of $5,000,000 as a thank-offering, to be employed in extending the Church.

The ceremonies on the 12th were very impressive. The New School Assembly proceeded sent to it, a union should then be ratified, and the great bodies become one. The feature of this basis of union, to which each presbytery was required to give a categorical reply, was in the following words: "Do you approve of the reunion of the two bodies now claiming the name and rights of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, on the following basis, viz.: The reunion shall be effected on the doctrinal and ecclesiastical basis of our common standards. The Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments shall be acknowledged to be the inspired Word of God, and the only infallible rule of faith and practice; the confession of Faith shall continue to be sincerely received and adopted as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures; and the government and discipline of the Presbyterian Church in the United States shall be approved as containing the principles and rules of our Polity."

THIRD PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, (N. S.), PITTSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

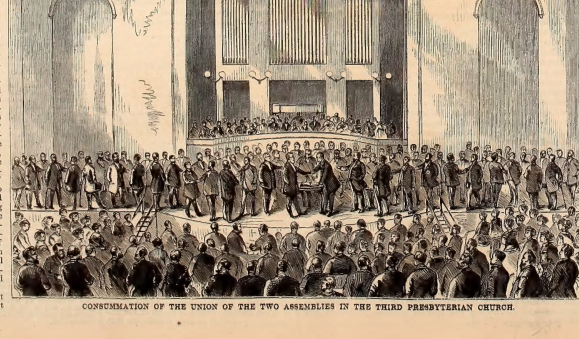
To this overture, sent to the presbyteries, it



CONSUMMATION OF THE UNION OF THE TWO ASSEMBLIES IN THE THIRD PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

THE DISCOVERIES.

BUT two persons were now left in the summer-house—Arnold Brinkworth, and Sir Patrick Lundie.

"Mr. Brinkworth," said the old gentleman, "I have had no opportunity of speaking to you before this; and (as I hear that you are to leave us to-day) I may have no opportunity at a later time. I want to introduce myself. Your father was one of my dearest friends—let me make a friend of your father's son."

He held out his hand, and mentioned his name. Arnold recognized it directly. "Oh, Sir Patrick!" he said, warmly, "if my poor father had only taken your advice—"

"He would have thought twice before he gambled away his fortune on the turf; and he might have been alive here among us, instead of dying an exile in a foreign land," said Sir Patrick, finishing the sentence which the other had begun. "No more of that! Let's talk of something else. Lady Lundie wrote to me about you the other day. She told me your aunt was dead, and had left you heir to her property in Scotland. Is that true?—It is?—I congratulate you with all my heart. Why are you visiting here, instead of looking after your house and lands? Oh! I see; three-and-twenty miles from this; and you've going to look after it to-day, by the next train? Quite right. And—what? what?—coming back again the day after to-morrow? Why should you come back? Some special attraction here, I suppose? I hope it's the right sort of attraction. You're very young—you're exposed to all sorts of temptations. Have you got a solid foundation of good sense at the bottom of you? It is not inherited from your poor father, if you have. You must have been a mere boy when he ruined his children's prospects. How have you lived from that time to this? What were you doing when your aunt's will made an idle man of you for life?"

The question was a searching one. Arnold answered it, without the slightest hesitation; speaking with an unaffected modesty and simplicity which at once won Sir Patrick's heart.

"I was a boy at Eton, Sir," he said, "when my father's losses ruined him. I had to leave school, and get my own living—and I have got it, in a roughish way, from that time to this. I'm plain English, I have followed the sea—in the merchant-service."

"In plainer English still, you met adversity like a brave lad, and you have fairly earned the good luck that has fallen to you," rejoined Sir Patrick. "Give me your hand—I have taken a liking to you. You're not like the other young fellows of the present time. I shall call you 'Arnold.' You mustn't return the compliment, and call me 'Patrick, lamd'—I'm too old to be treated in that way. Well, and how do you get on here? What sort of a woman is my sister-in-law? and what sort of a home is this?"

Arnold burst out laughing.

"Those are extraordinary questions for you to put to me," he said. "You talk, Sir, as if you were a stranger here."

Sir Patrick touched a spring in the knob of his ivory cane. A little gold lid flew up, and disclosed the snuff-box hidden inside. He took a pinch, and chuckled satirically over something thought, which he did not think it necessary to communicate to his young friend.

"I talk as if I was a stranger here, do I?" he resumed. "That's exactly what I am. Lady Lundie and I correspond on excellent terms; but we run in different grooves, and we see each other as seldom as possible. My story," continued the pleasant old man, with a charming frankness which leveled all differences of age and rank between Arnold and himself, "is not entirely unlike yours: though I've not managed to be your match. I was getting my living, in my way (as a cursty old Scotch lawyer), when my brother married against the wishes of his family, and went to live with his wife's sister. Now, as to my sincere regret! All sorts of responsibilities which I never bargained for are thrust on my shoulders. I am the head of the family. I am my niece's guardian; I am compelled to appear at this lawn-party—and (between ourselves) I am as completely out of my element as I could can be. Not a single familiar face meets me among all these fine people. Do you know any body here?"

"I have one friend at Windygates," said Arnold. "He came here this morning, like you, Geoffrey Delamayn."

As he made the reply, Miss Silvester appeared at the entrance to the summer-house. A shadow of annoyance passed over her face when she saw that the place was occupied. She vanished, unnoticed, and glided back to the game.

Sir Patrick looked at the son of his old friend, with every appearance of being disappointed in the young man for the first time.

"Your choice of a friend rather surprises me," he said.

Arnold artlessly accepted the words as an appeal to him for information.

"I beg your pardon, Sir—there's nothing surprising in it," he returned. "We were schoolfellows at Eton, in the old times. And I have met Geoffrey since, when he was yachting, and when I was with my ship. Geoffrey saved my life, Sir Patrick," he added, his voice rising and his eyes brightening with honest admiration of his friend. "But for him, I should have been drowned in a boat-accident. Isn't that a good reason for his being a friend of mine?"

"It depends entirely on the value you set on your life," said Sir Patrick.

"The value I set on my life?" repeated Arnold. "I set a high value on it, of course!"

"In that case, Mr. Delamayn has laid you under an obligation."

"Which I can never repay!"

"Which you will repay one of these days, with interest—if I know any thing of human nature," answered Sir Patrick.

He said the words with the emphasis of strong conviction. They were barely spoken when Mr. Delamayn appeared (exactly as Miss Silvester had appeared) at the entrance to the summer-house. He, too, vanished, unnoticed—like Miss Silvester again. But there the parallel stopped. The Honourable Geoffrey's expression, on discovering the place to be occupied, was, unmistakably, an expression of relief.

Arnold drew the right inference, this time, from Sir Patrick's language and Sir Patrick's unprovided with an issue for some time past. "How hot you are over it, Sir!" he exclaimed, in irrepressible astonishment.

Sir Patrick instantly recovered himself. The genuine wonder expressed in the young man's face was irresistible.

"Almost as hot," he said, "as if I was cheering at a boat-race, or wrangling over a betting-book—eh? Ah, we were so easily heated when I was a young man! Let's change the subject. I know nothing to the prejudice of your friend, Mr. Delamayn. It's the cant of the day," cried Sir Patrick, relapsing again, "to take these physically-wholesome men for granted as being morally-wholesome men into the bargain. Time will show whether the cant of the day is right.

—So you are actually coming back to Lady Lundie's after a mere flying visit to your own property? I repeat, that is a most extraordinary proceeding on the part of a landed gentleman like you. What's the attraction here—eh?"

Before Arnold could reply Blanche called to him from the lawn. His color rose, and he turned eagerly to go out. Sir Patrick nodded his head with the air of a man who had been answered to his own entire satisfaction. "Oh!" he said, "that's the attraction, is it?"

Arnold's life at sea had left him singularly ignorant of the ways of the world on shore. Instead of taking the joke, he looked confused. A deeper tinge of color reddened his dark cheeks. "I didn't say so," he answered, a little irritably.

"THE MAN WAS GEOFFREY DELAMAYN."

Sir Patrick lifted two of his white, wrinkled old fingers, and good-humoredly patted the young sailor on the cheek.

"Yes you did," he said. "In red letters."

The little gold lid in the knob of the ivory cane flew up—and the old gentleman rewarded himself for that neat retort with a pinch of snuff. At the same moment Blanche made her appearance on the scene.

"Mr. Brinkworth," she said, "I shall want you directly. Uncle, it's your turn to play."

"Bless my soul!" cried Sir Patrick, "I forgot the game." He looked about him, and saw his mallet and ball left waiting on the table. "Where are the modern substitutes for conversation? Ah, here they are!" He bowled the ball out before him on to the lawn, and tucked the mallet, as if it was an umbrella, under his arm. "Who was the first mistaken person," he said to himself, as he briskly hobbled out, "who discovered that human life was a serious thing? Here am I, with one foot in the grave; and the most serious question before me at the present moment is, Shall I get through the Hoops?"

Arnold and Blanche were left together.

Among the personal privileges which Nature has accorded to women, there are surely none more enviable than their privilege of always looking their best when they look at the man they love. When Blanche's eyes turned on Arnold, after her uncle had gone out, not even the hideous fashionable disfigurements of the inflated "chignon" and the tilted hat could destroy the triple charm of youth, beauty, and tenderness beaming in her face. Arnold looked at her—and remembered, as he had never remembered yet, that he was going by the next train, and that he was leaving her in the society of more than one admiring man of his own age. The experience of a whole fortnight passed under the same roof with her had proved Blanche to be the most charming girl in existence. It was possible that she might not be mortally offended with him if he asked her to be his wife. He determined that he would tell her so at that auspicious moment.

But who shall presume to measure the abysses that lies between the Interests and the Ascension? Arnold's resolution to speak was as hirsutely settled as a resolution could be. And what came of it? Ask for human infirmity! Nothing came of it but silence.

"You don't look quite at your ease, Mr. Brinkworth," said Blanche. "What has Sir Patrick been saying to you? My uncle sharpens his wit on every body. He has been sharpening it on you!"

Arnold began to see his way. At an immeasurable distance—but still he saw it.

"Sir Patrick is a terrible old man," he answered. "Just before you came in he discovered one of my secrets by only looking in my face." He paused, rallied his courage, pushed on at all hazards, and came headlong to the point. "I wonder," he asked, bluntly, "whether you take after your uncle?"

Blanche instantly understood him. With time at her disposal, she would have led him, like lightly in hand, and led him, by fine gradations, to the object in view. But in two minutes or less it would be Arnold's turn to play. "He is going to make me an offer," thought Blanche; "and he has about a minute to do it in. He shall do it!"

"What!" she exclaimed, "do you think the gift of discovery runs in the family?"

Arnold made a plunge.

"I wish it did!" he said.

Blanche looked the picture of astonishment.

"Why?" she asked.

"If you could see in my face what Sir Patrick sees—"

He had only to finish the sentence, and the thing was done. But the tender passion perversely delights in raising obstacles to itself. A sudden timidity seized on Arnold exactly at the wrong moment. He stopped short, in the most awkward manner possible.

Blanche heard from the lawn the blow of the mallet on the ball, and the laughter of the company at some blunder of Sir Patrick's. The precious seconds were slipping away. She could have boxed Arnold on both ears for being so unreasonably afraid of her.

"Well," she said, impatiently, "if I did look in your face, what should I see?"

Arnold made another plunge. He answered:

"You would see that I want a little encouragement."

"From me?"

"Yes—if you please."

Blanche looked back over her shoulder. The summer-house stood on an eminence, approached by steps. The players on the lawn beneath were audible, but not visible. Any one of them might appear, unexpectedly, at a moment's notice, Blanche listened. There was no sound of approaching footsteps—there was a general lush, and then another bang of the mallet on the ball, and then a chipping of hands. Sir Patrick was a privileged person. He had been allowed, in all probability, to try again; and he was succeeding at the second effort. This implied a reprieve of some seconds. Blanche looked back again at Arnold.

"Consider yourself encouraged," she whispered—and instantly added, with the inerradicable female instinct of self-defense, "within limits!"

Arnold made a last plunge—straight to the bottom, this time.

"Consider yourself loved," he burst out, "without any limits at all."

It was all over—the words were spoken—he had got her in the hand. Again the privately of the tender passion showed itself more strongly than ever. The confession which Blanche had been longing to hear, had not escaped her lover's lips before Blanche protested against it! She struggled to release her hand. She actually appealed to Arnold to let go.

Arnold only held her the tighter.

"Do you love me a little?" he pleaded. "I am so fond of you!"

Who was to resist such wooing as this?—when you were entirely fond of the man yourself, remember! and when you were certain to be interrupted in another moment! Blanche left off struggling, and looked up at her young sailor, with a smile.

Did you learn this method of making love in the merchant-service?" she inquired, archly.

Arnold persisted in contemplating his prospects from the serious point of view.

"I'll go" he said, "to the merchant-service," he said, "if I have made you angry with me."

Blanche administered another dose of encouragement.

"Anger, Mr. Brinkworth, is one of the bad passions," she answered, demurely. "A young lady who has been properly brought up has no bad passions."

There was a sudden cry from the players on the lawn—a cry for "Mr. Brinkworth. Blanche tried to push him out. Arnold was immovable.

"Say something to encourage me before I go," he pleaded. "One word will do. Say, Yes."

Blanche shook her head. Now she had got him, the temptation to tease him was irresistible.

"Quite impossible!" she rejoined. "If you want any more encouragement, you must speak to my uncle."

"I'll speak to him," returned Arnold, before I leave the house."

There was another cry for "Mr. Brinkworth." Blanche made another effort to push him out.

"Go!" she said. "And mind you get through the hoop!"

She had both hands on his shoulders—her face was close to his—she was simply irresistible. Arnold caught her round the waist and kissed her. Needless to tell him to get through the hoop. He had surely got through it already! Blanche was speechless. Arnold's last retort in the art of courtship had taken away her breath. Before she could recover herself the sound of approaching footsteps became plainly audible. Arnold gave her a last squeeze, and ran out.

She sank on the nearest chair, and closed her eyes in a flutter of delicious confusion.

The footsteps ascending to the summer-house came nearer. Blanche opened her eyes, and saw Anne Silvester, standing alone, looking at her. She sprang to her feet, and threw her arms impulsively round Anne's neck.

"You don't know what has happened," she whispered. "Wish me joy, darling. He has said the words. He is mine for life!"

All the stately love and sisterly confidence of many years was expressed in that embrace, and in the one in which the words were spoken. The hearts of the mothers, in the past time, could hardly have been closer to each other—it seemed—than the hearts of the daughters were now. And yet, if Blanche had looked up in Anne's face at that moment, she might have seen that Anne's mind was far away from her little love-story.

"You know who it is?" she went on, after waiting for a reply.

"Mr. Brinkworth?"

"Of course! Who else should it be?"

"And you are really happy, my love?"

"Happy?" repeated Blanche. "I—and that is strictly between ourselves. I am ready to jump out of my skin for joy. I love him! I love him! I love him!" she cried, with a childish pleasure in repeating the words. They were echoed by a heavy sigh. Blanche instantly looked up into Anne's face. "What's the matter?" she asked, with a sudden change of voice and manner.

"Nothing."

Blanche's observation saw too plainly to be blinded in that way.

"There is something the matter," she said. "Is it money?" she added, after a moment's consideration. "Bills to pay? I have got plenty of money, Anne. I'll lend you what you like."

"No, no, my dear."

Blanche drew back, a little hurt. Anne was keeping her at a distance for the first time in Blanche's experience of her.

"I tell you all my secrets," she said. "Why are you keeping a secret from me? Do you know that you have been looking anxious and out of spirits for some time past? Perhaps you don't like Mr. Brinkworth? No? you do like him? Is it my marrying, then? I believe it is! You fancy we shall be parted, you goose? As if I could do without you! Of course, when I am married to Arnold, you will come and live with me. That's quite understood between us—isn't it?"

Anne drew herself suddenly, almost roughly, away from Blanche, and pointed out to the steps.

"There is somebody coming," she said.

"Look!"

The person coming was Arnold. It was Blanche's turn to play, and he had volunteered to fetch her.

Blanche's attention—easily enough attracted on other occasions—remained entirely fixed on Anne.

"You are not yourself," she said, "and I must know the reason of it. I will wait till tonight—and then you will tell me when you come into my room. Don't look like that! You shall tell me. And there's a kiss for you in the mean time!"

She joined Arnold, and recovered her gayety the moment she looked at him.

"Well? Have you got through the hoops?"

"Never mind the hoops. I have broken the ice with Sir Patrick."

"What! before all the company?"

"Of course not! I have made an appointment to speak to him here."

They went laughing down the steps, and joined the guests.

Left alone, Anne Silvester walked slowly to the inner and darker part of the summer-house. A glass, in a carved wooden frame, was fixed against one of the side walls. She stopped and looked into it—looked, shuddering, at the reflection of herself.

"Is the time coming," she said, "when even Blanche will see what I am in my face?"

She turned aside from the glass. With a sudden cry of despair she flung up her arms and laid them heavily against the wall, and rested her head on them with her back to the light. At the same moment a man's figure appeared—standing dark in the flood of sunshine at the entrance to the summer-house. The man was Geoffrey Delamayn.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

THE TWO.

He advanced a few steps, and stopped. Absorbed in herself, Anne failed to hear him. She never moved.

"I have come, as you made a point of it," he said, sullenly. "But, mind you, it isn't safe."

At the sound of his voice, Anne turned toward him. A change of expression appeared in her face, as she slowly advanced from the back of the summer-house, which revealed a likeness to her mother, not perceivable at other times. As the mother had looked, in by-gone days, at the man who had disowned her, so the daughter looked at Geoffrey Delamayn—with the same terrible composure, and the same terrible contempt.

"Well?" he asked. "What have you got to say to me?"

"Mr. Delamayn," she answered, "you are one of the fortunate people of this world. You are a nobleman's son. You are a handsome man. You are popular at your college. You are free of the best houses in England. Your companionship besides all this? Are you a coward and a scoundrel as well?"

He stared—opened his lips to speak—checked himself—and made an uneasy attempt to laugh it off. "Come! he said, "keep your temper."

The suppressed passion in her began to force its way to the surface.

"Keep my temper?" she repeated. "Do you of all men expect me to keep myself? What a memory yours must be! Have you forgotten the time when I was fool enough to think you were fond of me? and when you chose to believe you could keep a promise?"

He persisted in trying to laugh it off. "Mad is a strongish word to use, Miss Silvester!"

"Mad is the right word! I look back at my own infatuation—and I can't account for it: I can't understand myself. What was there in you," she asked, with an outbreak of contemptuous surprise, "to attract such a woman as I am?"

His inexhaustible good-nature was proof even against this. He put his hands in his pockets, and said, "I'm sure I don't know."

She turned away from him. The frank brutality of the answer had its effect on her. It forced her cruelly forced her, to remember that she had nobody but herself to blame for the position in which she stood. She recognized it. She was unwilling to let him see how the remembrance hurt her—that was all. A sad, sad story, but a story which, in one form or another, she had been the sweetest, the most lovable of children. In later days, under the care of her mother's friend, her girlhood had passed so harmlessly and so happily—it seemed as if the sleeping passions might sleep forever! She had had no one to tempt them—no companion—and then, when the treasure of her life was at its richest, in one fatal moment she had flung it away on the man in whose presence she now stood.

Was she without excuse? No: not utterly without excuse.

She had seen him under other aspects than the aspect which he presented now. She had seen him, the hero of the river-race, the first and foremost man in a trial of strength and skill, which had roused the attention of all England. She had seen him, the central object of the interest of a nation; the idol of the popular enthusiasm; the popular man of the day. His eye the arms whose muscle was celebrated in the newspapers. He was first among the best of his fellows. He was first among throats as the pride and flower of England. A woman, in an atmosphere of red-hot admiration, winged with applause, loses her self-control. Is it reasonable—is it just—to expect her to ask herself, in cold blood, What (mentally and intellectually) is all this worth? Is it, even when the man who is the object of the apotheosis, notices her, is presented to her, finds her to his taste, and singles her out? Is it, even then? While humanity is humanity, the woman is not utterly without excuse.

Has she escaped, without suffering for it?

Look at her as she stands there, tortured by the knowledge of her own secret—the hideous secret which she is hiding from the unsuspecting girl, whom she loves with a sister's love. Look at her, bowed down under a humiliation which is unutterable in words. She has taken him to love the surface—now, when it is too late. She rates him at his true value—and the horror and confusion of it at his conduct. Ask her the question: What was there to love in a man who can speak to you on that occasion as he can? Ask her what you as that man is treating you now? you so clever, so cultivated, so refined—what, in Heaven's name, must he be? Ask her if the very sight of him does not overwhelm her with the sense of her own degradation when he leaped the last hurdle at the foot-race, and won it by a head. In the bitterness of her self-reproach she will not even seek for that excuse for herself. Is there no atoning suffering to be seen here? Do your sympathies shrink from such a character as this? Follow her, good friends of virtue, on the pilgrimage that leads, by steep and thorny ways, to the purer atmosphere and the nobler life. Your fellow-creature, who has sinned and has repented—who has been chastised by the Divine Teacher for it—is your fellow-creature, purified and ennobled. A joy among the angels of heaven—oh, we brothers and sisters of the earth, have I not laid my hand on a fit companion for You?

There was a moment of silence in the summer-house. The cheerful tumult of the lawn-party was pleasantly audible from the outside. Outside, the hum of voices, the laughter of girls, the thump of the croquet-mallet against the ball. Inside, nothing but a woman forcing back the bitter tears of sorrow and shame—and a man who was tired of her.

She roused herself. She was her mother's daughter: and she had a spark of her mother's spirit. Her life depended on the issue of that interview. It was useless—without father or brother to take her part—to lose the least chance of appealing to him. She dashed away the tears —time enough to cry, is time easily found in a woman's existence—she dashed away the tears, and spoke to him again, more gently than she had spoken yet.

"You have been three weeks, Geoffrey, at your brother Julius's place, not ten miles from here: and you have never once ridden over to see me. You would not have come to-day, if I had not written to you to insist on it. Is that the treatment I have deserved?"

She paused. There was no answer.

"Do you hear me?" she asked, advancing, and speaking in a gentler tone.

He was still silent. It was not in human endurance to bear his contempt. The warning of a coming storm began to show itself in her face. He met it, beforehand, with an impenetrable front. Feeling nervous about the interview, which he was waiting in the rose-garden now that he stood committed to it, he was in full possession of himself. He was composed enough to remember that he could not put his pipe in its case—composed enough to set that smaller right before other matters went any further. He took the case out of one pocket, and the pipe out of another.

"Go on," he said, quietly. "I hear you."

She struck him out of his hand at a blow. If she had had the strength she would have struck him down with it on the floor of the summer-house.

"How dare you use me in this way?" she burst out, vehemently. "Your conduct is infamous. Have you no eyes?"

He made no attempt to defend it. He looked, with an expression of genuine anxiety, at the fallen pipe. It was beautifully colored—it had cost him ten shillings. "I'll pick up my pipe first," he said. His face brightened pleasantly as he looked at the bowl. Handsome than ever—as he examined the precious object, and put it back in its case. "All right," he added, turning to Anne. "I have it broken it. His attitude, as he looked at her again, was the perfection of easy grace—the grace that attends on cultivated strength in a fine animal. "Now, I put it to your own common-sense," he said, in the most reasonable manner, "is there any sense in bullying me? You don't want them to hear you, out on the lawn there—do you? You women are all alike. There's no harm in a little prudence into your heads, try how one may."

There he waited, expecting her to speak. She waited on her side, expecting him to go on.

"Look here," he said, "there's no need to quarrel, you know. I don't want to break my engagement with you. I don't. I'm not the first son. I'm dependent on my father for every farthing I have: and I'm on bad terms with him already. Look at me, for yourself! You're a lady, and all that, I know. But you're only a governess. It's your interest as well as mine to wait till my father's provided for me. Here it is in a nut-shell: if I marry you now, I'm a ruined man."

The answer came, this time.

"You villain! if you don't marry me, I am a ruined woman!"

"What do you mean?"

"You know what I mean. Don't look at me in that way."

"How do you expect me to look at a woman who calls me a villain to my face?"

She suddenly changed her tone. The savage contempt in Geoffrey—let the modern optimists who doubt its existence look at any uncultivated man (no matter what circumstances), woman (no matter how beautiful), or child (no matter how young)—began to show itself furtively in his face, in his voice, in every thing in his voice. Was he to blame for the manner in which he looked at her, and spoke to her? Not he! What had their fathers—the training of his life (the school or at college) to soften and subdue the savage element in him? About as much as there had been in the training of his ancestors (without the school or the college) five hundred years since.

It was plain that one of them must give way. The woman had the most at stake—and the woman set the example of submission.

"Don't look at me," she pleaded. "I don't mean to be hard on you. My temper gets the better of me. You know my temper. I am sorry I forgot myself, Geoffrey, my whole future is in your hands. Will you do me justice?"

She came nearer, and laid her hand persuasively on his arm.

"Haven't you a word to say to me? No answer? Not even a look? You have ruined a man's reputation. A marked change came over her. She turned slowly to leave the summer-house.

"I am sorry to have troubled you, Mr. Delamayn. I won't detain you any longer."

He looked at her. There was a tone in her voice that he had never heard before. There was a light in her eyes that he had never seen in them before. Suddenly and fiercely, he reached out his hand, and detained her.

"Where are you going?" he asked.

She answered, looking him straight in the face, "Where many a miserable woman has gone before me. Out of the world."

He drew her nearer to him, and eyed her closely. Even his intelligence discovered that he had brought her to bay, and that she really meant it!

"Do you mean you will destroy yourself?" he said.

"Yes. I mean I will destroy myself."

He dropped her arm. "By Jupiter, she does mean it!"

With that conviction in him, he pushed one of the chairs in the summer-house to her with his foot, and signed to her to take it. "Sit down!" he said, roughly. She had frightened him—and fear comes seldom to men of his type. They feel it, when it does come, with an angry distrust; they grow loud and brutal, in instinctive protest against it. "Sit down!" he repeated. She obeyed him. "Haven't you got a word to say to me?" he asked, with an oath. No! there she sat immovable, reckless how it ended —as only women can be, when a woman's mind are made up. He took a turn in the summer-house, and came back, and struck his hand angrily on the rail of the chair. "What do you want?"

"You know what I want."

He took another turn. There was nothing for it but to give way on his side, or run the risk of something happening which might cause an awkward scandal, and come to his father's ears.

"Look here, Anne," he began, abruptly. "I have got something to propose."

She looked up at him.

"What do you say to a private marriage?"

Without asking a single question, without making objections, she answered him, speaking as bluntly as he had spoken himself.

"I consent to a private marriage."

He began to temporize directly.

"I own I don't see how it is to be managed—" She stopped him there.

"I do!"

"What!" he cried out, suspiciously. "You have thought of it yourself, have you?"

"Yes."

"And planned for it?"

"And planned for it."

"Why didn't you tell me so before?"

She answered haughtily; insisting on the respect which is due to women—the respect which was doubly due from him, in her position.

"Because you owed it to me, Sir, to speak first."

"Very well. I've spoken first. Will you wait a little?"

"Not a day!"

The tone was positive. There was no mistaking it. Her mind was made up.

"What's the hurry?"

"Have you eyes?" she asked, vehemently. "Have you ears? Do you see how Lady Lundie looks at me? Do you hear how Lady Lundie speaks to me? I am suspected by that woman. My shameful dismissal from this house may be a question of days for me. Her head sunk on her bosom; she wrung her clasped hands as they rested on her lap. "And, oh, Blanche!" she moaned in thought, the tears gathering again, and falling, this time, unchecked. "Blanche, who looks up to me! Blanche, who trusts me! Blanche, who told me, in this very place, that I was to live with her when she was married! She started up from the chair; the tears dried suddenly: the hard despair settled again, vast and white, on her face. "Let me go! What is death, compared with what a life as it would be for me?" She looked him over, in one disdainful glance from head to foot; her voice rose to its loudest and bitterest tone. "Any thing you would have the courage to die if you were in my place!"

Geoffrey glanced round toward the lawn.

"Hush!" he said. "They will hear you!"

"Let them hear me! When I am past hearing them, what do I care?"

He put her back by main force on the chair. In another moment they must have heard her, through all the noise and laughter of the lawn.

"Say what you want," he resumed, "and I'll do it. Only be reasonable. I can't marry you to-day."

"You can!"

"What nonsense you talk! The house and grounds are swarming with company. It can't be done!"

"I can! I have been thinking about it ever since we came to this house. I have got something to propose to you. Will you hear it, or not?"

"Speak lower!"

"Will you hear it, or not?"

"There's somebody coming!"

"Will you hear it, or not?"

"The devil take your obstinacy! Yes!"

The answer had been wrung from him. Still, it was the answer which she wanted the door to hope. The instant he had consented to hear her her mind awakened to a new sense of resource. A riveting discovery by any third person who might stray idly into the summer-house. She held up her hand for silence, and listened to what was going forward on the lawn.

The dull thump of the croquet-mallet against the ball was no longer to be heard. The game had stopped.

In a moment more she heard her own name called. An interval of astonishment followed—and a familiar voice said, "I know where she is. I'll fetch her."

She turned to Geoffrey, and pointed to the back of the summer-house.

"It's my turn to play," she said. "And Blanche is coming here to look for me. Wait there—and I'll stop her on the steps."

She went out at once. It was a critical moment. Blanche, which had been natural up to the woman, meant money-ruin to the man. Geoffrey had not exaggerated his position with his father. Lord Holchester had twice paid his debts—and had declined to see him since. One more outrage on his father's rigid sense of propriety, and he would be left out of the will as well as kept out of the house. He looked for a moment of retreat, in case there was no escaping unperceived by the front entrance. A door—intended for the use of servants, when picnics and gipsy tea-parties were given in the summer-house—had been made in the back wall. It opened outward, and it was locked. With his strength it was easy to remove that obstacle. He put his shoulder to the door. At the moment when he burst it open he felt a hand on his arm. Anne was behind him, alone.

"You may want it before long," she said, observing the open door, without expressing any surprise.

"You don't want it now. Another person will play for me—I have told Blanche I am not well. Sit down. I have secured a respite of five minutes, and I must make the most of it. In that time, or less, Lady Lucille's solicitions will bring her here—to see how I am. For the present, shut the door."

She seated herself, and pointed to a second chair. He took it—with his eye on the closed door.

"Come to the point!" he said, impatiently. "What is it?"

"You can marry me privately to-day," she answered.

"Listen—and I will tell you how!"

MY NEST.

The shadows lengthen; the twilight is falling:
The labors and cares of the day are ended;
A pence settles over the city's brawling,
Like the mirror'd glow of the sunset splendid.
And sparrow and robin, and skylark and throstle,
Are silent now in leafy recesses:
Calmly and warmly and safely they nestle
In the shadowy bliss of soft caresses.

On the skirts of the city my nest is waiting,
Warm with a love that is grateful and tender;
And the world, with its striving, and sinning, and hating,
Melts in the light of its sacred splendor.
What though my dwelt be poor and lowly?
Love's blessing alone makes the dwelling royal!
Peace, like a cherubim, pure and holy,
Fills every nook with a faith life loyal!

Cosy, warm nest! every bounty and blessing
Linger about thee as years o'er thee gather;
Joys bide within thee; and mercies unceasing
Rain from the bountiful hand of the Father!
Hope's budding promises break without number
Rich sunny fruit-blooms, and burst into blossom
Sweet, be thy glad waking hours, and thy slumber
Calm as the sleep of a babe on the bosom!

JUDGE LYNCH IN INDIA.

"I DARE say, my dear fellow, that with your British notions you does appear strange to you that any law abiding citizen of the United States should for an instant uphold the doings of Judge Lynch; but if for one hour you could be induced that worse evils can be befall a community than an occasional visit from the peripatetic judge, I am sometimes under the impression that I do not think that as many innocent men have suffered from his decrees as from those of the legally appointed common-law judges of England and America. Moreover, during my travels throughout 'Greater Britain,' I have seen cause to regret that Judge Lynch and his code of law of irregular court had not been introduced into other English-speaking countries. For instance, bush-ranging in Australia could not have been reduced to so fine a science had the squatters taken a lesson or two from my friends in Indiana on the speediest method of freeing the country from horse-thieves and murderers.

"Yes, that is all very well, you know, for you who have become so thoroughly American in life and thought; but no Englishman—no regular Englishman, I mean—would ever consent to act the part of Judge Lynch, or the part of a juryman in his court."

The last speaker was evidently what he had styled a regular Englishman; his companion was as undoubtedly of the same race, but in him the salient characteristics had been softened off or the nonel shed, and he might readily be taken by a casual observer for a native of his adopted State.

The two men occupied a seat in a railway carriage that was hurrying across the prairies of Illinois.

"There you are mistaken," replied the elder of the two persons: "and to convince you I will relate a personal experience of lynch-law, in which also I was forced to be a person than your esteemed uncle, General H——.

"It is something more than a quarter of a century since our uncle, then a private, and myself were dining at the house of the Commander of the Bheel Corps in Khandes. Young Sconce of the Engineers, was also a guest on the occasion referred to. We had settled ourselves well down in our Chinese bamboo chairs in the verandahs of the house enjoying our post-prandial cheroots, when a Government peon or messenger suddenly appeared in the inclosure in front of the garden, and, considerably less than the usual amount of salaaming, approached the master of the house, the redoubtable and fiery Assistant Agent. As hurried accents the peon reported that there were then lying, within a mile of our quarters, and on the high-road from Mhow to Indore, the dead bodies of ten men who had been attacked and killed within the last half hour.

"Our quarters had just been deploring the dullness of the season and the lack of all novelty at the station. Here was excitement and novelty with a vengeance!

"The Hindostanee words for two and ten (dó and dás) are so nearly alike in sound that we all thought the evidently frightened peon had inadvertently used the larger number; but on being taken into the house and sharply questioned by Major ——, the peon asserted that he had counted the dead bodies, and that there were ten all lying in a row; that on discovering the nature of the tragedy he had run with all speed to report the circumstance to the Buxrah Sahib, but he could tell no more. Our horses were immediately ordered; and as we were all guests under the same hospitable roof, we armed ourselves and prepared to follow the Agent, whose duty it was, as a magistrate, to examine into the circumstances. Before our horses were ready the whole cantonment was ablaze with excitement; and when we set out to the scene of the tragedy the plain was made light as day by the flare of hundreds of burning pine-torches.

"We found the bodies as described lying in the middle of the road at regular distances. To the experienced eye of an Indian official the whole story was told at a glance. The murdered men were gold carriers from Bombay to Indore, conveying each of them a certain weight of the precious metal in ingots, and the dacoits had surrounded the loins. Marching as they always do in Indian file, they must have been met by the robbers presenting a like number in the opposite direction, and as each came alongside his victim a blow on the bare neck from a sharp heavy tulwar ended the matter. Not a single victim had a cry escaped. In two instances the heads were entirely separated from the trunks. It would be the work of half a minute for the assailants to tear the cumbersome from the corpse and escape into the obscurity of the mooseless night.

"'This is professional work,' said the magistrate, 'and the scoundrels will make for the Nizam's territory: once across the lines they will be safe. Sconce, you'll calling a native officer,' 'pick out the twelve best mounted and lightest men in the troop, and order them to report at my house in half an hour. Captain S——, as brigade-major, you will take charge of the bodies, find out all you can about the murderers. I promise you I won't be much; my duty is to catch the murderers. And now, gentlemen, who of you are inclined for a ride this night on the plain?'

"Of course every officer present volunteered; but as half of them had no horses fit for such an expedition, and as the night would not be spared from duty, the magistrate's companion were reduced to his dinner guests, with the addition of young Dr. ——, the civil service, a noted horseman and hog hunter.

"In less than half an hour the five European and the twelve native officers, with the peon officer at their head, were cantering gently across the plain. It will be observed that no time was lost in idle speculation as to the cause and the where-fore; indeed there was no room for hesitation or doubt. The murders were evidently the work of professional skill, and the question as to the direction of their flight was narrowed down by the necessities of the case to security within the dominions of the Nizam, the independent native ruler of the Deccan. Before starting, however, we had ascertained that the commanding officer of the station had recently crossed a nullah or ditch in the direction we had determined upon taking.

"Looking for both men and horses, the night was cool, and we were able to push on rapidly; no buses but Arabs could have come over the ground at the pace we rode. Arab horses have always a shambling, stumbling action, but they are sure-footed and will not waste time over it as we had ridden fifty miles, not an accident had occured.

"At sunrise we halted for a couple of hours, we white men making our breakfast on crackers and brandy pawee, our escort on parched grain and gool (raw sugar) pawee (water).

"We did not reach the frontier until 3 P.M., receiving then for the first time positive intelligence of the expedition we were following. It was not at fault; the robber band had passed across into native territory about an hour ahead of us, but it seems doubtless safe within the walls of Rattowah.

"We were terribly disappointed. As we attacked our flasks and cold crackers for the second time in twenty hours, we discussed the feasibility of enticing the gang back on to British soil, where we could legally arrest them. But, to shorten my story, I may at once say that our deliberation closed by a unanimous resolution to ride to Rattoon, arrest the murderers, bring them back prisoners, and apologize to the outraged sovereignty of his Royal Highmightiness, the Nizam, afterward.

"As there was no time to be lost, we soon reached the walled village of Rattoon, and were rejoiced at hearing that our prey were all fast asleep in fancied security in the Dhurmsallah, or caravanserai of the place. After consultation with the kotwal (headman) of the village, who pretended to be horrified at the discovery of the character of his guests, sheltering, their resting-place was surrounded, and three of us entered holding drawn swords and cocked pistols in our hands. The din we made aroused the astonished inmates. The Bheel Agent soon enlightened them as to the situation, ordering them to tie the hands of each man, where they were seized and securely bound with the heel-ropes of our horses.

"After this was accomplished silently accomplished, we concluded to take some refreshment before returning to Khandes. It was an unwise resolve, as we subsequently found; we managed to purchase some fowls, rice, yams, and a couple of earthen pots, and two of us set to work to prepare 'a hasty plate of soup.' We were, of course, our own cooks and scullions, for our troopers would have died of starvation before they would contaminate their high-caste fingers by touching our food. Inexpertness made the cooking and cleaning of utensils a long affair, a near sunset before we had managed to get the disjointed chickens into the pot. We were congratulating ourselves on the success of our culinary operations, when our friend Major —— startled us, on his return from a stroll through the village, by saying, 'Gentlemen, we must get out of this without delay. Some infernal rascal, I believe the kotwal himself, has sent a messenger express to the camp of the Nizam's cavalry, only eight or ten miles distant, and if the Rissaldar in command is the man I take him to be, he will be here to secure, not the prisoners—he don't care a button for them—but their golden plunder.'

"This was a dilemma we had not calculated upon. We held a consultation once more, the result of which was the determination to try the murderers by drum-head court-martial on the spot. This, we knew, was a serious business; for although no one gave utterance to the thought, it was evident that the result of such a trial would be the death of the prisoners. In spite of the fierce resolve in our hearts, we could not help laughing at the suggestion of our civilian associate, that, as there was probably no drum to be found in such a place, we might borrow a native tom-tom for the occasion.

"This, as soon as we had organized, the prisoners were brought before it and interrogated as to name, ages, etc. They made no concealment of the crime on the contrary they one and all told us to attend to our own business, as they had attended to theirs. There was no difficulty in finding a verdict—there was more hesitation about the sentence; but, finally, it was agreed that they should all be hanged by the neck. I need not dwell upon the further details. Lariats and trees were plenty; and after waiting ten minutes round the several bodies, we rode off as fast as our exhausted horses could carry us.

"The gold for which the twelve men had risked and lost so much was subsequently transmitted, with a full account of the transaction, to the English Minister or Resident, as he is styled, at the Court of Hyderabad, the city to which the murdered men were journeying when they met the Dacoits.

"There was, of course, a terrible row about the affair. Luckily Sir Charles Metcalfe had not then given to the newspapers a license to discuss such matters. But Sconce and your uncle, Fred, had interest enough to have the business hushed up after the Nizam had accepted a very humble apology.

"I found it convenient to resign my commission, and soon after came to the United States, and settled down in Indiana; but although a resident there for more than thirty years, I have never again acted in the court of Judge Lynch."

OUR SURVIVING EX-PRESIDENTS.

THE death of President Pierce leaves General Grant the only living representative of an elected Chief Magistrate of the country. The two surviving ex-Presidents, Fillmore and Johnson, were both raised to their high official position by the death of their superior associates in office. The history of these two ex-Presidents in their early struggles for the necessaries of life, in their successful resistance to the abandonment of the political party which raised them to power, is similar to a degree that would suggest that the two were studying their destiny under the same unhappy auspices.

Mr. Johnson, made President by the death of Mr. Lincoln, in the first blush of his accidentally acquired honors, promised to be the Moses who was to lead the down-trodden white slave and his to the land of perfect freedom. If he has any record which is really prominent—connected with statesmanship—it is that he forgot his mission, and affected the spirit that gave birth and vitality to the Fugitive Slave Law.

Both these ex-Presidents were born in the most humble positions possible in American society; both struggled into eminence through the severest exertions and by indomitable energy. Both could, and can, remember the bitterness of their own early life; and yet both apparently forgot, while they were in authority, to sympathize with the poor and enslaved toiler.

But this strange parallel does not end here: for, while Johnson, as a boy, was working upon the bench as an apprentice to a tailor, Millard Fillmore, somewhat older in years, was at the same time in New York, was sweating over the mechanical operation of dressing cloth, which could be bleached and garments by the aid of which Senator Johnson was learning in the then desolate regions of Tennessee.

But the following pieces of singular history speak through the strange records that have been preserved for the enlightenment of American youth and the astonishment of an admiring world.

GREENVILLE, TENNESSEE, November 7, 1810.

"This is to certify that I, a my desire this Mr. Andrew Johnson is bound an apprentice to James J. Selby to learn the trade of a tailor, and I do to serve him faithfully until he is 21 years old.

"Andrew Johnson was born in the year 1808, December 29. "MARY DAUGHTRY,

by
"TERRELL DAUGHTRY."

"SEPHINTON (N. Y.), June 18, 1826.

"DEAR SIR,—Feeling disposed to relinquish my study, I find no business to pursue my agreeable with. Therefore I shall take the liberty to inquire of you if you have any journeyman engaged in dress cloth, and if you have not I should like to hire out to you, and would work with you. I could possibly afford it. Please to direct a letter to me at Montville the first opportunity, and let me know the result of your opinion of my request.

"Please accept my unfeigned respects, and present them to your amiable lady, and

"I remain yours,
"Your unworthy friend,
"M. FILLMORE.

"Z. CRENER."

A MODERN TOURNAMENT.

AMONG the honorable exercises formerly in fashion among all persons of note in Europe who desired to gain reputation in feats of arms, from the king to the private gentleman, were tournaments, jousting, tiltings, etc. The word tournament is derived from tourner (to run around), and in those military exercises much agility, both of man and horse, was necessary in riding round a ring, or in wheeling with rapidity and precision.

Our illustration on page 780 is a very good representation of the tournament as it now exists in some of our Southern (especially the border) States. Let us imagine ourselves at one of these exercises. The knights are about to enter the lists, on other side of which are long lines of carriages filled with beautiful women, whose eyes beam with love and pleasure as their gallant favorites, clad in armor, steel or otherwise, and ride hither and thither on richly caparisoned steeds. A Queen of Love and Beauty has been chosen, with Maids of Honor. The knights having retired to the end of the list, are called in order by the Herald, to contest for the prize. The knight who successfully bears away the ring is, upon returning it to the judges as an evidence of his prowess, formally greeted by the gentry, the fair ladies on either side also expressing their approbation by the waving of handkerchiefs and clapping of hands.

The general mode of procedure at a tournament is as follows: A ring, from two to three inches in diameter, is suspended at a height high enough to allow the riders to pass under it, each rider or knight is armed with a long spear, and in his rear (on the ring or full speed), the speed is 100 yards in five seconds. If he carries off the ring he scores one; if he misses it, or is not up to the mark, he scores a blank; if he does not score. Three tilts or courses in succession is the general number tried; the knight who takes the most scores is the victor. Prior to choosing the Queen of Love and Beauty, the next best choosing the Maids of Honor. After the tilting is completed the knights are drawn up in line in front of the judges' stand, who then name the successful gallants and the beauties there to be entitled to. They then proceed to the ladies' stand and make choice of the Queen of Love and Beauty and the Maids of Honor; the whole cavalcade then form in procession, the beauties in a carriage, the gallant knights on horseback, and proceed to the ball-room, where, on a erected a throne, to which the Queen and her maids are conducted; after which the knights, under their distinguishing appellations—such as the Knight, Knight of Columbia, etc., etc.—are presented to the Court of Love and Beauty. This concludes the ceremony, and knights and ladies fair join in the mazy dance.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A GAVOTTARTE treated a voter to ginger-cake; whereupon the voter remarked that he liked it "hot." Gavottarte was around somewhere, and the candidate urged him to "commence on the hot cake." He did so, "fired" and departed; and the up-for-office noted two more votes for himself. "Hot cake in the hot sun," and the throng had gathered at the hotel to compare notes and guess at the return, our verdict: Fired, very much to the surprise of every one, staked into the parlor, bursting for Mr. Cox—Embarrassment was not greater than his admiration of the fellow's honesty.

"Patrick," said a priest to an Irishman, "how much hay did you get this year?" "Well," replied Pat, "I may as well confess to your reverence for the whole stack, for I'm sure I'll not be going to take the rest of it the first dark night."

FULFILLING THE LAW.

Let each man do his duty,
To be a decent man,
And love his brother as himself—
Upon the golden plan;
And if his brother refuse to be
A pretty female woman,
Why, knock him at all the corners of a rascal, and no one will trust you. These are infallible secrets.

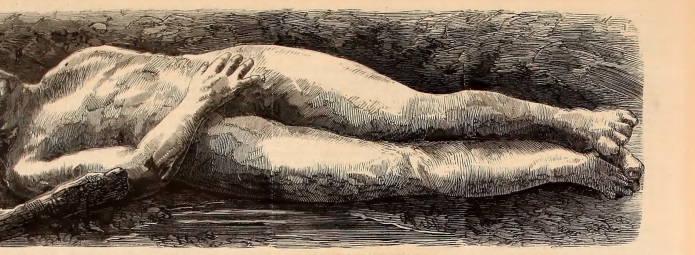
An Irish glazier was putting a pane of glass into a window, when a groom who was standing by began to whistle him, telling him to mind and not drop it out of putty. The Irishman bore the banter for some time, and at last answered his tormentor by—"Look here, be off wid ye, or else I'll put a pane in yer head without any putty."

"Hey a trunk, Pat!" said a dealer. "And what for should I buy a trunk?" rejoined Pat. "To put your clothes in to be sure." "And why so naked?" exclaimed Pat; "not a bit iv it."

ANY EXCUSE IS BETTER THAN NONE.—An Irishman, having accidentally broken a pane of glass in a window, was making his escape on his way to get out of the sight as well as mind; but, unfortunately for him, the window was shut down, and having seized him by the collar, exclaimed, "You villain, you have broken the window!" "To be sure I did," said Pat: "and didn't you see me running home for money to pay for it?"

One Saturday afternoon two well-dressed elderly gentlemen approached Schiller's bust in the Central Park, and after looking at it attentively, were observed to the other: "I believe Schiller was a great novelist, was he not?" "Yes," was the answer; "I believe he was."

An interstate stammerer one day, upon a journey, stopped to dine at a hotel. On attempting to help himself to pepper at the dinner, he found, after a vigorous shaking, that no pepper was forthcoming. He turned round, and, beckoning to the waiter, commenced: "Wa-wa-wa-



THE CARDIFF GIANT—FULL LENGTH FRONT VIEW OF THE FIGURE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. O. GOTT.]

THE CARDIFF GIANT.

On the 16th of October there was discovered on Mr. NEWELL'S farm in Onondaga County, New York, and about thirteen miles south of Syracuse, what was at first supposed to be a petrified human form—a giant of the olden time. The first reports of this discovery excited the greatest interest among all classes, and especially among scientific men. The fossil was found about three feet below the surface while some persons were digging for a well. The soil was a sort of bluish clay mixed with quicksand and black loam, and organic remains were found about the body. The figure, when first discovered, lay in a very easy and natural position, horizontal, partly on the right side, with the right hand resting over the abdomen. Its dimensions were as follow: From crown of head to hollow of foot, 10 feet 2½ inches; crown of head to tip of chin, 1 foot 9 inches; length of nose, 6 inches; width of nostrils, ¾ inches; width of mouth, 4 inches; point to point of shoulder, 3 feet; point of hip to knee-joint, 3 feet; diameter of calf of leg, 9½ inches; diameter of thigh, 1 foot; length of foot, 1 foot 7½ inches; width of palm, 7 inches; diameter of wrist, 5 inches. The veins, eyeballs, muscles, tendons of the heel, and cords of the neck were all fully disclosed.

As we have said, this figure was at first supposed to be a petrified human form. But it was soon found that this theory seemed hardly plausible. Though the figure had the appearance of stone, the outer surface could be shaved off with a knife without dulling the blade. Dr. J. F. BOYNTON visited the figure, and, after a careful examination, pronounced it to be a statue of a Caucasian. The features were finely cut, and excellent artists have remarked the symmetry of proportions characterizing the whole figure.

DR. BOYNTON at first supposed that this statue was carved by the Jesuits who dwelt in this valley between 1520 and 1760. After a more thorough examination he declares it to be of gypsum, and of recent origin. He says, in a recent letter to Professor SPENCER, of the Smithsonian Institute, at Washington:

"I have stated that I thought his 'origin would not carry us back over three hundred years;' but I am not certain that the known principles of chemistry will justify me in asserting that the period between his burial and resurrection was over three years. Its antiquated appearance has been produced not by abrasion, as many have said, but by the dissolving action of water, which, I think, could have been accomplished in a few months. A more careful and accurate calculation, admitting the possible chance of some undiscovered error creeping into the calculation, may show the burial to have taken place about 370 or 371 days ago—as it may have happened between two days."

MR. NEWELL, upon whose grounds the statue was found, is said to have disposed of it for $40,000. The figure has been carried to Syracuse. Its weight is 2990 pounds. If it were solid stone it would not weigh so much by 500 pounds. A recent theory has been started, that it is a cast-iron figure covered with a coating of cement. The head, it is said, gives a ringing sound when struck, like that of a hollow, metallic body. But Mr. PALMER, the sculptor, states that there are marks of sculptor's tools.

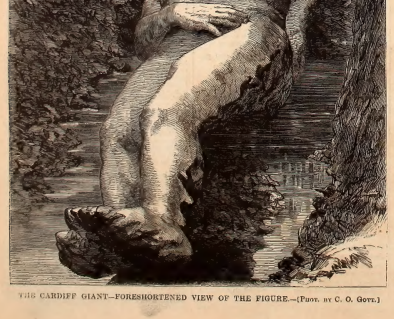
THE CARDIFF GIANT—SHIPMENT OF THE STATUE TO SYRACUSE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. O. GOTT.]

EXERCISE.

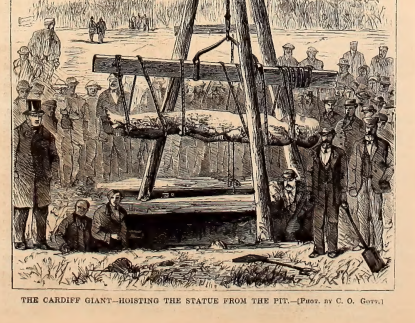
INACTION weakens the body, work strengthens it. The first brings on premature old age, the second prolongs youth—that is to say, as in every thing else, in moderation. The structure of man and his mental nature show that he was not created for inactivity. Almost all those who are quoted for longevity led a more or less active or laborious life. Exercise accelerates assimilation, and with an accelerated assimilation, or process of loss and restoration, the body undergoes a more prompt and complete renovation. The secret of longevity, according to Dr. Noirot, lies in this fact. If women live to a good old age, notwithstanding their sedentary habits, Tissot says this is to be explained by the want of bodily exercise being compensated for by their talking so much. Women are, however, much more lively and cheerful than men, and the most trifling incidents abstract their attention from more serious matters—a state of mind highly conducive to longevity. The most simple, most natural, and most beneficial kind of exercise is walking on foot. Such walks should, as far as possible, be in the open air, and in the morning. Next to pedestrianism comes equitation. No one who can enjoy the use of his legs can, however, envy those who take their so-called exercise in carriages. They obtain the benefit of fresh air and light, but they lose that reinvigoration of the organs, that stimulus to the vital forces, and that increase of warmth which is obtained by foot and horse exercise.

SLEEP.

SLEEP, which is a kind of anticipation of death, is in lifetime a death which restores vitality. It procures the happiness of being born again every day. The better the sleep, the greater the probability of longevity. Night ought to be consecrated to sleep. This is a law of nature which can not be infringed with impunity. Nothing is more prejudicial to longevity than devoting the nights to intellectual or bodily labors. Many literary men, learned men, and artists have died young in consequence of this practice. On the other hand, early rising, after being refreshed by sleep, is as beneficial as late work is the reverse. The amount of sleep necessary for reinvigoration depends upon the age, habits, and constitution of the individual. A new-born infant would perish if kept awake for twenty-four hours. Sleep is even more necessary after mental than after bodily labor. A man who thinks little is always in a kind of torpor. Old age, again, requires less sleep than youth and adult age. As the body is more accessible to deleterious influences at night than by day, the air ought also to be fresh, and the supply plentiful. The stomach should not be loaded. The bed should not be too soft, and, if possible, the head should lie to the north, the feet to the south. The head should never be covered by the clothes; but there should be more outer clothing at night than in the daytime, the temperature of the body not being so high. It is a good thing, on taking off one's day clothes, to lay aside also all thoughts of the past. It is only thus that complete relaxation of the mind, as well as of the body, is secured, and without this unbending of the mental faculties perfect sleep is impossible.



THE CARDIFF GIANT—FORESHORTENED VIEW OF THE FIGURE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. O. GOTT.]

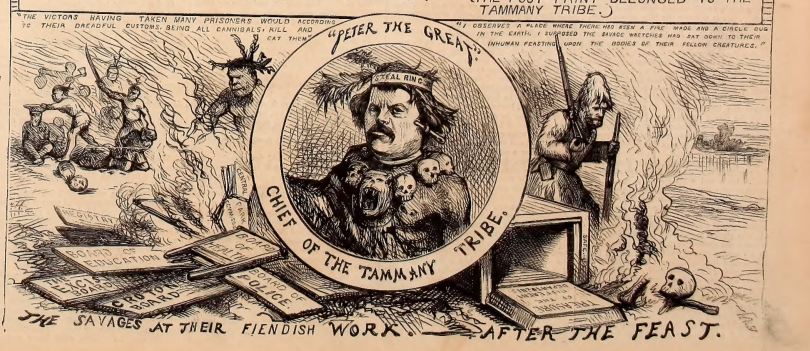


THE CARDIFF GIANT—HOISTING THE STATUE FROM THE PIT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. O. GOTT.]

ROBINSON (PRES^T GRANT) CRUSOE

THE FOOT PRINT ON THE LAND OF PEACE.

"I WAS EXCEEDINGLY SURPRISED WITH THE PRINT OF A MAN'S NAKED FOOT ON THE SHORE, WHICH WAS VERY PLAIN TO BE SEEN ON THE SAND. I STOOD LIKE ONE THUNDER-STRUCK, OR AS IF I HAD SEEN AN APPARITION." —(THE FOOT-PRINT BELONGED TO THE TAMMANY TRIBE.)



TOO LATE.

As the tired sailor loves the welcome land
On which he takes his stand,
After long years of mute expectancy,
Plowing the watery furrows of the sea,
So I love thee.

As looks the miser on his treasured gold,
In yellow heaps untold,
Gloating with bloodshot eyes upon the wealth
Massed by the sacrifice of life and health,
I look on thee.

As yearns the wanderer through the stormy night
For that glad rosy light
Which ushers in the earliest gleam of day,
Chasing the night's grim solitude away,
I yearn for thee.

I see thee through the mist of by-gone years,
Though dim with rushed tears
My straining eyes, my clouded brow and hair,
Radiant with nameless grace, surpassing fair,
Still shine on me.

And when the generally night, in silence deep,
Hushes the day to sleep,
On bended knees I weary Heaven that I
May nestle to thy bosom, ere I die,
At peace with thee.

And yet thou comest not. My prayer is vain,
My sighs unheard or my pelf
And I must bow me to the cruel fate
That kept me loveless till we met too late
For thee and me!

VERONICA

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book FIVE.

CHAPTER I.

THE ROAD THAT LED NOWHITHER.

VERY near to Florence is the valley of the Ema.

The Ema is a small stream which strikingly contradicts the proverb, "As you make your bed, so you lie on it," for the bed the Ema has formed for itself being a valley a mile or so broad in some places, reckoning from hill to hill; and the hills, ever receding through it nowadays, in a disproportionately small channel, which may be (and is in most places a part of the course) spanned by a bridge of a single small arch. The ridge of hills dividing the valley of the Ema from that of the Arno is well known to most of the many strangers who go to Florence. Few casual visitors, however, cross the ridge. The landscape upon it is peculiarly Tuscan, and to the unaccustomed eye there is something drear and melancholy mingling with its beauty. After a time that impression is much softened. The peculiar delicacy of coloring; the long vistas of hills that fold their clouds one over the other, and present nearly as much variety of outline as the clouds themselves; the countless towers, villas, and churches that lie scattered over the scene, and peep forth from amidst the hoary olive-trees, combine to charm the sight.

We come to know the loveliness, as we learn the expression of a face whose stranger aspect was so different from its known and familiar one that the recollection of our first impression startles us.

The great enchantment of this Tuscan landscape lies in the atmosphere through which it is viewed. The wonderful lights and shades, the exquisite tints, the limpid clearness of the skies, are invaluable in their effect upon the scenery. In a winter afternoon at sunset, the bare, distant Apennines are touched with such ethereal hues—rich blues, silvery-grays, blues, and rose-colors—that they look like mother-of-pearl mountains in some fairy story. Nay, they do self can more decisively beautify the barren distance than does this southern air.

Then, as the sun goes down, and the brief twilight deepens, there grows a solemn purple on the hills—a color that seems, in its intense blooming depth, to be fold around them like a cloak garment. It is not that the hills grow purple, but that the great purple descends and wraps itself about the hills. Or, in the early autumn days, what a fathomless ocean of dazzling blue is it that the swallows sail across! Bright, rapid, gladsome little spirits upon that ocean. Even the projecting stone in the cottages is precious, casting as it does an island of black shadow on the glare of wall or road. The spring-time wheat is almost too emerald-bright to be gazed upon. Beside the burned brown trees on the hill stand the silvery grayness, writing dark characters against the shimmering sky—hieroglyphics which interest eyes so differently educated, and which to some remain dumb and unread forever.

It is June. Through the vale of Ema ripples the shrunken river among the parched, thirsty sand. Here and there comes a stretch that seems to have absorbed the little stream. You can cross it dry-shod. But, lo! some furlongs off, it purls and gurgles once more amidst the reeds. The frogs keep up a loquacious cry, tremulous and guttural; and now and then one of them pushes luxuriously into the cool water beneath the shadow of the bank. The cicada, in his bronze coat of mail, sends forth a shrill sound, like the springing of an infinitely tiny rattle made of the finest steel. It seems to be to the ear what the hot quivering of the air is to the eye, and to be equally suggestive of sunshine. Swarms of colored butterflies flutter brightly around. Orange, crimson, blue, white, purple, yellow, if a rainbow could fall from the sky, and be scattered into a thousand fragments as it fell, it could shower down no bright tint these winged flowers would fail to match.

On the dry, dusty, crumbling path—that climbs the hills bounding the valleys the light bats fiercely. The grass is parched, and sparsely grown, and dry. Here and there glitters a bunch of glaring yellow weeds, made bold and flaunting by the munificent sun, like a coarse favorite of fortune. Little cold bright-eyed lizards glide in and out of the chinks in the rough stone walls that flank the main roads. Some of the lizards are as green as emeralds. Others, again, are of the same hue as the brown tint of the blocks of stone. Sometimes they will remain as motionless as the stone itself, gazing with their round, unwinking, black diamonds of eyes, until the passer-by might think that they were hardened and baked stiff and stony by the heat. Then suddenly, at some sound or sight which startles it—or, it may be, from pure caprice—the little reptile flits away as swift and noiseless as a flash of lightning.

Over the top of the wall tumbles a laden branch of roses or the starry clematis. The vine is high, and the green vista, full of leaf, hang richly on the pollard mulberry-trees. The gray olive stands up to his middle in a sea of grain. The corn and vine and oil all grow together on the same fertile field. Every thing is steeped in sunlight. Even the olive's dusky foliage conveys a thought of coolness. It is always a moonlight tree. In the saltriest summer noontide its soft gray tint, and the luminous quivering of its shadowy form (especially in the older trees, which have been scooped and cut mull nothing but a seemingly unsubstantial shell of trunk remains to them), and the trembling, feathery plume of branches prefil the cold bright pallor of the moon, that makes the whole grove flowers so wan and bloomless when the night breeze ruffles their dewy breasts.

Through a sultry silence, which the cicada's cry seems but to emphasize, not break, prevail along the dusty road, as we wander along the Ema's course, further and further away from the fair city of Florence, going eastward. Presently, with many a laboring creek and jar, comes lumbering by a heavy country cart, drawn by two of the colossal, dove-colored Tuscan oxen. The driver—for he who should be cushioned luxuriously under a shady awning of matting at the bottom of his rude vehicle. The cart is one which might have been copied in ivory from a Roman bass-relief, and has been copied through a long series of models from the cart that came home to Rome with the trophies of Italian soil in Horace's day. The deck heavy beasts that draw it turn their grand dark eyes askance upon the passers-by as they pass him, and blow a fragrant breath from moist, ample nostrils.

Following the windings of the road, which now runs for a short space on the level, close to the Ema, we come to a steep ascent on the right, leading up to the summit of one of the hills that divide the valley of the Ema from the valley of the Arno. The steep ascent before mentioned leaves the path high above the river. The hill-side is here a narrow, strewn thickly with great smooth pebbles, like the bed of a torrent, and only kept from crumbling away upon the road below by a summer, or being washed away by the rain in winter, by horizontal lines of rough stone put up, placed like the rungs of a ladder, at much succeed each other at wide intervals, and afford a foothold to any laden mule that may pass that way, or drove. To reach the road is quite inaccessible. Arrived on the summit, it turns abruptly to the left between high hedges, from which the soil is so much higher than the road—a common circumstance in Tuscan farms—that the corn and wild flowers look over the top of the wall, and the olives and fruit trees rear nearly their whole height above it. The walls and the hedges are so thoroughly kept, the view to right or left; but presently we come to an open space, a little piazzetta, and the wide landscape bursts upon us. It is a fair, fresh, and unexpected that we feel as though we had come out of a dark room into the daylight. We are on the northern side of the hills that we slope down on either hand—this way toward the Ema, that way toward the Arno.

Close, here at the summit of the road, is a tiny church with a low campanile, or bell-tower, on its roof. It is the church of Saint John in Jerusalem. But the neighborhood is known rather by the other name than San Gersolè, that being the popular contraction of the ten syllables which make up the appellation of San Giovanni in Jerusalemme. In front of the church lies the little piazzetta, surrounded by low parapet wall, and commanding a wide prospect, which, however, is slightly here and there by a silvery gauze of hot mist! What a widening plain, ever widening toward the sea, that is gained from this hill, and then in the distance bluish-gray, and holds Arno, sleepily flowing on his course, brightening it with rare gleams reflected from the sky! What a vision of a city, whose house-roofs seem to press and throng like a holiday crowd, and of an awful dome, rising in the midst of palaces and churches and palaces, and old arched gateways, showing burned and brown as colossal fragments of Etruscan rock, and of a dazzling speck of whiteness on the far horizon, that looks like a wandering cloud, but is the jagged line of the Carrara marble mountains many a mile away! What a strange melancholy charm as the eye explores the naked Apennine, discovered long ages of his rich regal wreath of woods, rearing parched and crumbling heights to the relentless sun, and the deep, dark gulfs of shadow where a deep ravine winds its mysterious way into the central strong-hold of the hills! What a waveless sea of azure air, into whose limpid depths the very soul seems to plunge and float as we gaze! And subtly steeping all this in a flood of glory, what a divinely terrible, divinely beneficent, dazzling, flaming, white-hot sunshine!

Drought, and a sultry silence, shaking to the shrill song of the cicada, as we stand and gaze.

Suddenly a jangling bell breaks forth discordantly. Up in the square campanile of San Gersolè it is rung—jingle-jan, ting-tang, ting-tang, jingle-jan, le jingle—without any rhythm.

Out of the dark little church comes a procession. Two priests; boys in white surplices swinging censers; men carrying a lofty crimson banner-bearing the painted image of some saint; and some dozen or so of peasant men and women (the latter largely predominating) in holiday attire, carrying wax and shouting forth a Latin hymn in a quaint, monotonous chant. Round the little piazza they march solemnly, sending up curling clouds of incense into the leafy darkness of the cypresses, and jealously edging on to every inch of shade as they walk slowly, bare-headed, under the summer sky. Once, twice, three times, they make the circuit of the piazza. Then the dark church-door swallows them up, the bell ceases to jangle, and the last whiff of incense floats away into the air.

Standing with San Gersolè on the left, and the parapet wall on the right, and looking straight before us, whither does the road lead?

"Nowhither," answers an old contadino, who has been hauling his cows in a shed close at hand. Cows know no difference between work days and feast days, but need their fodder and litter all the same, though it be the festa of the saint whose legend is commemorated on the crimson banner. Therefore the old contadino has been tending them, with a large spoon made of coarse blue linen tied over his holiday clothes. And if you ask him whither the road leads to the left, he will answer "nowhither." You do not "come out," he says; the road leads nowhither, save—as, if you persist in further questions, he will be driven to tell you—to the extreme edge of the precipice that overhangs the valley of the Ema.

But a little further on, between San Gersolè and the edge of the precipice, save a strip of road leading nowhither? Ah, truly, yes: there is a garden, and a house. And there is a house; a large house: the Villa Chiari. Oh yes, as to that; yes, yes. But the road—what was it leading nowhither?

Proceeding along it, nevertheless, we reach a forlorn-looking, gross-grown space. The grass grows ankle-deep upon the flag-stone path that runs across it. The foot-path shows the bare brown earth beaten and baked quite hard. Across it, between an interlacement of big black ants, is zealously busy a crowd pressing importantly along the road that "leads nowhither" as you may read with ease in the sultry silence.

Before us is a high wall, whose plaster is crumbling away in places. There are massive iron gates, worked by some cunning artisan of the old Florentine time, rusty and bent, and partly off their hinges. On one-half of the gate stands, whereon are graven the words "Villa Chiari," surmounted by an elaborate coat of arms. The ivy, dog-rose, and bramble weave on and match together, so as to form a thick screen over the tablet. But it matters the less, in that this is not the principal entrance to the house. No one enters by this old gate, save the contadini belonging to the adjacent farm. On the other side is a broad road, with a gentle and moderate rise by zigzags to a green painted gateway, and a graveled sweep before the portico.

But that is the front of the villa, and there are some acres of garden grounds between the road that "leads nowhither" and that which officially conducts to Villa Chiari.

In the old times many a lady's palfrey, and many a cloaked cavalier's sumpter mule, and many a rich litter borne by lackeys, and holding a luxurious Medicean noble, may have passed along the old stone road. It is fine and well-kept by the iron gates cast the black tracery of its shadow on fair faces and bright hair glistening in the sunshine, and made the former and the latter bright by contrast. And there, too, have gone their way along the road that "leads nowhither," and the sculptured tombs that rise above their tombs, and the wild flowers twine fearlessly around the unhinged gate.

We pass the gateway and find ourselves in a neglected garden—neglected in this part of it, that is; for near the house the walks are rolled and weeded, and the flower-beds are as trim and bright as patterns in a kaleidoscope. But here are paths all overgrown with grass, and borders thickets of lavender, lilac, rose, and oleander. There is a pergola, or trellis, covered with vines. And the vine-leaves and their clinging tendrils, by-suckle have usurped its support, and pushed their fragrant faces peeringly in here and there amidst the leaves and the grape-clusters. And the bosky gloom of a grove of acacia and lilex trees, thickly undergrown with laurel and lilac, crosses the mellow flaring trill of a nightingale, like the perfume out of the heart of a rose. Now and again is heard the flutter of wings, as some little rabbit-like animal, with his mouse-colored fur and then is still again. Onward we wander beneath the freshness of the pergola, then out again into the fiery air. Still onward, past a broken marble basin, once a fountain, where a tiny stream drips out of a crevice and makes a green track in the parched herbage, and where a harmless snake is sunning himself asleep. And we come to a deep blot of shadow that shows against the glare of the ground, like a black mountain tarn amidst snow. The shadow is thrown from an ancient cypress that stands, lonely as a sentinel, upon the brink of the precipice, at the end of the road that "leads nowhither." And in the shadow sits a lady, young and beautiful, looking out at the far-away Apennine, and quite alone.

CHAPTER II.

VILLA CHIARI.

The lady sitting in the shadow was Veronica. She wore a Tuscan hat with a wide flapping brim, such as the peasant women wear. And beneath it her eyes gleamed and her cheeks glowed brighter than ever. She had wrapped a white barnous as she sat gossamer around her shoulders, and sat huddled together under the cypress, with her elbows resting on her knees and her cheeks resting on her hands. It was shady beneath the cypress, but it was not cool. No spot to which the hot sun-impregnated air and fire can access could be cool. Still, Veronica sat there looking out at the far-away barren Apennine, with her elbows resting on her knees and her cheeks resting on her hands.

A man came through the garden toward her, a short, thick-set, gray-haired man, and respectful, who bared his head in the sunshine as he addressed her.

"Signora," said the gray-haired man, and then stood still and waited.

Veronica neither turned her head nor her eyes toward the man. She only drew a sharp little, and through her parted lips the breath came quicker.

"Signora," said the gray-haired man. No shade of difference could be discovered in his tone. It was the same to him whether he used the one title or the other. He fully understood the English one, why should she not have it? He had learned that she liked it best; but he was very far removed from understanding it.

"What is it, Paul?"

"Pardon, madam, but Sir John is awaking from his siesta, and demanded to know where you were; and when I told him that I supposed you were beneath the accustomed cypress, sent me to beg you to come to him."

Paul spoke in Italian—which was nearly as much a foreign language to Veronica as French—much a foreign language as French—and addressed her with perfect respect, but with an indefinable air of taking it for granted that she would comply with every request. He was a servant of Sir John's, which grated on the sensitive soreness of her haughty spirit.

"I am very well here, and shall remain," said Veronica, briefly. Then she turned her eyes away (she had never relinquished her careless attitude) and seemed to dismiss him from her thoughts.

"It is bad to stay here in the heat, miladi," remonstrated Paul. He spoke with extreme ceremonious, imperturbable air of knowing his duty and doing it which he had assumed toward Sir John while in the most irritable moments of his illness.

"I am in the shade," said Veronica. And then she had said it she had as good as having been betrayed into what seemed an excuse or apology.

Paul gravely unfuled a huge yellow sunshade, lined with purple, which he had brought with him. It was characteristic of the man, and of the manner in which he had taken his position, that, albeit his bare head was scorching in the glare, he had never thought of unfurling the umbrella for his own use.

It came into the month's wages to endure personal inconvenience of some sort. A little reasoning, a little waiting, a little "setting—what mattered? There was that village up in the Alps, and there were the two years having to be endured to—and that would make them independent of such disagreeable exertions and sacrifices.

Paul put up the yellow umbrella, and held it over Veronica's head; he seemed so absolutely certain that she would get up if he only waited and come with him into the house that she rose as though some spell were moving her limbs. Suddenly the spell, springing from simple, quiet, manly reasoning, ceased to be felt. She was entitled to—that would make them independent of such disagreeable exertions and sacrifices.

Paul put up the yellow umbrella, and held it over Veronica's head; he seemed so absolutely certain that she would get up if she only waited and come with him into the house that she rose as though some spell were moving her limbs. Suddenly the spell, springing from simple, quiet, manly reasoning, ceased to be felt. She was entitled to—that would make them independent of such disagreeable exertions and sacrifices.

"In the evening, signora—miladi—it is very fine here. Now, the air is bad, and will hurt and spoil your eyes. It is not like in England, miladi; at this hour in the summer, even up on a height like this, it is not well to be in the sunshine. It makes the women look old soon. See our contadine!"

Paul had masterly stroke Paul gravely bent down, hat in hand, and held his arm out for Veronica to lean on when she should rise—and she did rise.

Paul walked a pace behind her holding the umbrella, and they proceeded toward the house. Instead of passing beneath the pergola they turned on reaching the old fountain—where their footsteps disturbed the snake, that did away at their approach into the dry grass—to the left, and entered a path leading through a shrubbery. Here the walks were neat, the grass clipped, and the flowers duly tended. The grounds had not the fresh perfection of an English garden. There was a want of finish about all the details—the finish that comes from doing thoroughly whatever is done—but every-half was a delight in its peculiar color, and perfume, and it was very lovely. At a turn in the path the house came in view. Villa Chiari was an old and vast building, solid, heavy, and with few windows in proportion to the great extent of wall-space. This circumstance, which would make a house gloomy in a northern climate, is suggestive only of grateful shade and coolness to a dweller beneath Italian skies. Wealth had been unsparingly employed within the villa to make it a comfortable and luxurious residence, in accordance with modern English ideas of what is comfortable and luxurious: but without, Villa Ulmo remained much as it had been many time these three hundred years. It was covered with yellowish plaster. Situated as the house was on a height, and fronting to the north, it had become much stained by wind and weather. The plaster was discolored, cracked, and, in some places, had pealed off altogether, revealing a rough solid wall constructed of mingled brick and stone, after the Tuscan fashion. To each window were double wooden shutters or jalousies, painted green. These were open on the side of the house that was in shadow, and were carefully closed whenever the sun's rays beat against them like a flight of burning arrows. All the windows on the burning story were protected against more earthly assailants by massive wrought-iron bars.

Immediately beneath each of the lower windows was a stone bench, the sad, gray color of which was diversified by bright lichens. A large archway, closed by double doors, in the centre of the façade, gave access to a paved court-yard open to the sky. Around the court-yard ran an open arcade—called here a loggia—under the uneven pavement before the door, the brooding stillness that hung over the whole place—a stillness that seemed of death rather than sleep—were all depressing.

Paul held open a low door beneath the loggia for Veronica to pass.

She entered a shady corridor, whose marble pavement seemed to exhale a cool breath without. A moment ago she had been in the shade and coolness. Now the air of the house struck chill, and she shuddered, drawing the cleak around her.

At the end of the corridor was a large saloon. The floor was richly covered with a thick and very thick carpet, contrary to Italian usage, which requires that all carpets be removed from the marble or painted brick floors in summer. There were luxurious chairs, and sofas, and ottomans; cabinets of rare workmanship and costly materials; silken draperies and gold-colored cornices in the saloon. It had a lofty, vaulted ceiling, adorned with colossal stucco garlands, white on a blue ground. The air was fanned into it by the perfume of flowers disposed in massive groups about the room; and only a dim sea-green twilight filtered through the closed jalousies.

Sir John Gale was lying on a couch when Veronica entered. He rose when she appeared, took her hand, and led her to a chair. He was more high-shouldered than ever, and lean; and in the greenish light his face looked ghastly. Paul had followed Veronica to his master's presence, and had waited an instant; but at a wave of Sir John's hand he had withdrawn, closing the door noiselessly after him.

Veronica tossed her broad-brimmed hat on to an ottoman near her, and threw herself back in her chair with an air of consummate indifference.

Sir John's eyes were accustomed to the dimness. He could see her better than she could see him, and he watched her with a half-admiring, half-savage glance.

"You have been out," he said in a tone devoid of some minutes.

She slightly bent her head.

"I thought that you had been taking siesta in your own apartments."

She made a negative sign without speaking.

"Am I to suppose worthy of the name of my room?" asked Sir John; and though his mouth smiled as he said it, his eyebrows frowned.

"You have to talk," murmured Veronica.

"If you had remained indoors, as I have so frequently advised, at this hour, you would not now have to complain of the heat, which is, of course, my first consideration; and I should have enjoyed the pleasure of your conversation."

Veronica shrugged her shoulders, and smiled disdainfully.

"Well, perhaps you are right," said Sir John, answering the smile with a sneer Mephistopheles might have owned. "Perhaps you would not have made yourself agreeable if you had staid in. But at all events you would have done more wisely for yourself. You positively run the risk of getting a coup-de-soleil by running out in this incautious manner."

Veronica sighed a little impatient sigh, and pulling down a rich plait of her hair, drew its glossy length languidly across and across her lips.

"Magnificent!" said Sir John, softly, after contemplation for some time.

She looked up inquiringly.

"Magnificent hair! Quantity, quality, and line, all united. I never knew but one other woman with such an abundance of hair as you have. And hers was blonde, which I don't admire."

The expression of his admiration had not lost its power to charm her. Indeed, it may be said that to hear her beauty praised by any lips, however false and coarse, was now the one delight of her life. That the flattery was poisoned she knew, as she also knew what hers to every fellows in each fiery draught. But she turned from it no more than he refrains from the fatal wine-cup. Her face brightened, and the coquettishly released all the coils of her hair with a sudden turn of her hand. It fell in plaits, or loose rippling tresses, all around her. Sir John looked on complacently with a sense of ownership.

"Will you drive this evening?" asked Veronica.

"Drive? I don't know. Where? There are no drives."

"I want to go to Florence."

"To Florence!"

"You know you said I should do so some day. You were so kind. When we passed through from the railway station it was dark, so I saw nothing. Besides," she added, as if angry with herself for having assumed a pleading tone, "I want to go."

"There can be no necessity, Veronica. The servants will procure you any thing you want."

"But I wish to see the city! Why should you not come?"

"What is the use of making me recapitulate my reasons? I am not strong enough, nor can be exposed to—to—disagreeable rencontres; in short, it is better not to go into Florence at present."

He spoke in an imperious tone of masterhood, and then sank back on his couch as though the discussion were closed. Veronica sat quite still for a minute or so. The minute seemed very long to her. She was trying to school herself to be polite, and to answer quietly. But self-control is not to be acquired in an instant.

Her own impulse at the moment, her own likes and dislikes, caprices and whims, had been paramount with Veronica all her life. Now, after having heaped scorn upon it, she would not do to be hasty, and that every thing should depend on her power of self-command, she broke out on a sudden with sullen impetuosity, declaring that she was moped to death; that she was dull, confounded, bored, all day long; that if there were any reason for Sir John's shrinking from being seen in Florence it rested with himself to remove that reason; that she was sick and weary of the delays and disappointments; finally, that she would go to the city that evening.

At first Sir John listened to her petulant, broken speech with the quiet, half-contemptuous, cruel school-boy, who watches the newly-caged bird fluttering in terror and impotent anger against the wires. But at last a cloud of pain touched on a theme which threatened to give him trouble.

That prospect was not amusing. Besides, Veronica looked very handsome so long as she was merely passionate and angry. But after the first outburst symptoms of rising tears in the same apparent, and that prospect also was not amusing.

"Good Heavens, Veronica!" exclaimed Sir John, "how can you be such a baby? Go, go, I say, like. If you care about it so much, order the carriage at any hour you please. But let me suggest that it be not before the sun has begun to lose some of his power. It will be hot enough in any case in those narrow stuffy streets. Out!"

"And you?" said Veronica, standing looking at him irresolutely.

"Oh, I shall not go. You can take your maid, and Paul will wait on you."

"I don't want Paul," muttered Veronica, but in so low and indistinct a tone that Sir John might plausibly affect not to hear it if he chose. And he did choose.

"Of course Paul will attend you," he repeated, quietly. "You will find Paul indispensable. That lont of a Tuscan coachman would get you into some scrape, to a certainty."

All Sir John's self-possession, with the exception of Paul and the cook, were Tuscans: not town-bred Florentines, but country people. Their manners were simply abominable. Sir John had known what he was about when he charged Paul to see that no servant accustomed to wait on foreigners, and who had been in the house gossip-laden, was engaged among his descriptions.

When the carriage was announced there stood Paul, bare-headed, to hand "miladi" in. He would place himself on the box seat, and Paul climbed up to the box beside the coachman.

"Where to, miladi?" asked Paul, leaning down, but in Italian.

"To Florence. Any where. I don't know. Stay: I want to buy a—a fan. Drive first to a place where one can buy fans."

The carriage had not gone a quarter of a mile down the steep incline that led from Villa Chiari —it was downhill all the way back—when Veronica called to Paul, and bade him make the coachman stop.

"I think," said she, with a not quite successful assumption of being an independent agent—"I think I will take a drive in the park—the Cascine they call it, I believe. Is it not there?"

Paul bent down lower into the carriage, and said, in English, "At the hour when we should arrive there will be no fashionable world, merely unwholesome. Sunset is a bad time, or even the hour before sunset. There is a mist. It is damp. You get colds—oh, very dangerous colds. Does miladi care which fan-shop she goes to?"

Veronica drew from her pocket a delicate gold watch incrusted with diamonds, looked at it with a meditative air while Paul was speaking.

"It is later than I thought," she said, at last. "Tell the coachman to drive straight into town. I must buy my fan by daylight. Never mind the Cascine. Go on."

She looked very imperial and grand, leaning back in the handsome carriage, and folded in a soft cloud of black lace. Peasant women paused and stared at her. Peasant children shouted. Working-men, returning from their daily labor, studied their features as they passed by them.

Paul sat, spare-shouldered and steady, beside the coachman. And the pleasure of her weak, selfish vanity, and the petty delight of being admired and envied by poor ignorant passers was dashed with a bitter drop—the consciousness that that man was invested with power to control her movements, and that, brave it out as she might, she was a slave, and Paul her keeper.

SQUIBLETS.

SQUIBBLE, black, gray, red, striped, spotted, and brindled, arrives in this country in numerous packages. They are tree-planters every where. There are two native species, and thus contribute to the spread both of fruit and nut-bearing trees. A little mischievously inclined when partially domesticated, but in a state of freedom the squirrel performs a valuable service on our forests. A few years ago a colony of them animated Boston Common, to the great annoyance of visitors to that enchanting ground; but they were deceived by the ignorant, misrepresented by those who knew nothing of their habits, till they have finally disappeared. Alas, for the civilization and science of a city that persecuted those cheerful, playful little animals, whose gambols were delightful exhibitions for youth and old age!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

LEVEES, papers, and packages are soon to be borne on the wings of the wind from one end of our city to the other. A few years ago some experiments were tried at the American Institute Fair, which proved that not only letters and parcels, but passengers also, could be safely propelled across the lobe by a powerful current of air. The Pneumatic Dispatch Company are now about to carry passengers just at present, but already the work of tunnelling Broadway for the purpose of laying dispatch tubes for letters and parcels is well commenced. The special plan is to carry a tube about three feet in diameter from Bowling Green to Broadway and Fourteenth or Fifty-ninth street, having various ramifications leading to important business points. And as soon as permission is supposed to extend the line to the nearest important cities. The successful operation of such a system of mail will be of immense advantage to business men. At least a year's boring will be required to lay the tubes as far as Fourteenth street. The experimental tube is a novelty in New York; but in London one has been in successful operation for many years.

The salesmen in the large drapers' shops of Paris are insufficiently paid, and work fifteen hours a day. They declined to strike work, and by closing the shops, which would be nearly impossible, but by the establishment of relays. This being refused, and also demand for a free day, the eight thousand salesmen struck, and are now endeavoring to organize co-operative "Magasins de Nouveautés" themselves. Upon this fact, remarks "It is curious to watch the rapid spread of the dislike for very hard labor. Ifes is really because, for many years, or in many cases, treating a thirst for leisure, or is it a result of the excitation of modern life? Probably a wholesome suggested after, say, ten years' work, to become a shopkeeper; now he remains a salesman for life, and must therefore strive to enjoy himself."

Near Bergen, Germany, there is a rare novelty—a paper-mache church, capable of accommodating about three hundred persons. It is circular within, and octagonal without. Every part is made of papier-mache, rendered more durable by its inclusion in vitrified lime-water, and some albuminous substance.

There may be exceptions, but, as a rule, a gentleman should be sufficiently acquainted with the lady he desires to marry to know her full name before he applies for a marriage license! A would-be bridegroom in Boston only remembers the abbreviated name of his lady-love when he asked for a license, and the clerk was appointed to fill for the proper surname. But during the ceremony, when called by the name which the friend had given, the lady interrupted by saying that that was not her name. The ceremony was stopped, the parents of the bride were sent for, and also the bridegroom, for the actual name of the lady, the marriage was concluded.

Burke availed himself of a simple but singular remedy for every indisposition. Whenever he felt ill he would order a pint of porter to be kept boiling, of which he drank large quantities as hot as he could bear it. He again took a dose, as it had been, of soup. Hot water, he used to say, was the finest stimulant and most powerful restorative in the world.

The commissioners appointed to erect Beethoven's statue in Bonn have interested among many of our citizens. Preliminary meetings have already been held for the purpose of raising funds. It has been suggested that the erection of a commodious and elegant music hall in Bonn would be a most appropriate tribute of respect to the memory of one whose name is identified with the history and art of music. It is also suggestive to the people of Bonn that would be a most fitting place for such a music hall.

One hundred and twenty-five workmen are now employed on the new dock at Marseilles. The outer foundation walls are of solid granite, and five feet thick. The inner walls are of brick, and only six inches from three to five feet. These walls will vary in height from two and a half feet to five feet, according to the grade of the ground.

An English gentleman, Mr. Powell, who was making some explorations in Abyssinia for pleasure, was murdered, with four of his children, by a Shangalla tribe. No redress being expected from the government, two brothers of the murdered man landed in Abyssinia with rifles and followers, obtained aid from Prince Kassai, attacked the tribe, killed eight men, and destroyed their habitations.

"A good percentage of inventions," remarks an English journal, "are of American origin. In that country of gotten up steam, it is natural that inventions that not far from fourteen thousand patents will be granted by the United States office this year. We are sure, some marvelous things are proposed. One man claimed protection for the application of the Lord's Prayer, repeated in a loud voice, to cure stammering. Another applied for the revived parchment on behalf of a new and useful manufacture of a weight so as to prevent, to prevent her switching it during the milking operation. A lady patented a hat-crimping pin, which she specially claimed to be used as a hair-curler, as a skirt-supporter, a child's pin, a bouquet-holder, a shawl-fastener, or as a book-mark. A 'horse-refresher' is a hollow bit perforated with holes, and connected by a flexible tube with a water reservoir in the vehicle, so that the driver can give his animal a drink without stopping. The 'snorere' friend" is a luxurious contrivance to be attached to church pew-backs, so that one may sleep through a dull sermon in peace and comfort.

John G. Saxe strikes the latest witticism at a Western hotel the other day. He undertook to carve a piece of beef which was so tough that the carving-knife made little impression upon it. He then laid down knife and fork, glanced around, and spoke. "Gentlemen," said he, "that's an infringement on Goodyear's patent!"

The London Illustrated Times gives travelers a hint in regard to keeping water good. Good soda-water can be made entirely impervious to rain, so it says, by soaking it in a solution made with a couple of gallons of water, half a pound of carbonate of lead, and half a pound of powdered alum. Stir this mixture at intervals until the deposit has fallen, pour it off into another vessel, and put the garment into it for twenty-four hours. Hang it up to dry without wringing it.

Venice is built upon several low islands of sand which lie in the sea, and might be a few inches above the water at low tide, but they form a pleasant place for a city, except to hold the spikes, which are driven down closely together, and upon which foundation Venice now and must ever rest. All the city is traversed by canals, through which the tide ebbs and flows, and these canals are the streets of Venice. The houses are built much to the water's edge, with stairs descending from the windows into the water. There is no occasion for horses and carriages in this city of the sea, but gondolas are all important, and every private family that can afford it keeps one before the door of the house. The gondola is a boat peculiar to Venice. It is long, slender and narrow, with both ends pointed sharp. It is always painted black, and has a low cabin, with cushions and curtains, which can be removed in fair weather, and an awning substituted.

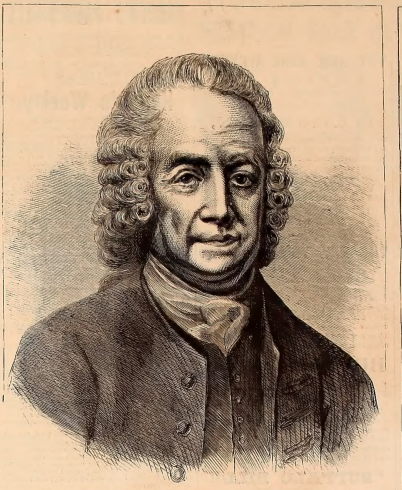
It was formerly supposed that night-air was very injurious. Now many regard that belief as a mere prejudice, except in certain special circumstances or conditions of the atmosphere. In large cities, when the communities are crowded, the air is loaded with particles of dust and smoke is comparatively quelled, the night-air is in many respects purer than that of the day. Hence there is no occasion to exclude it by closing every window.

Manufacturing imitations of gold is quite an extensive business in many parts of the country, and sometimes attempts are made to sell these alloys for the genuine article. But not consequently it is found easier to cheat in a different way. A few months ago a wily traveler imposed on a New York shop-keeper in this manner. He confided to him the secret that he had discovered how to manufacture gold from base metals, and that he was about to form a joint-stock culture they could both make an immense fortune. Accordingly a day was fixed for the experiment. The man was to bring the proper drugs, and the crucible and a number of singular-looking tools; and having secured himself for nearly two hours from fresh air or smoke, he at length called the merchant to him, and revealed a small bar of gold, which he declared had been made in his crucible. The bar was found to be a jeweler, and had it tested. He was informed that it was pure gold. Then, and, indeed, always, the friend in raptures at the prospect of acquiring a fortune, was easily induced to advance five hundred dollars to enable the man to proceed with the work. The swindler, having pocketed his green backs, repaired to another city, and of enterprise. The gold he had given to be tested was pure, but the manufacturing was all a sham.

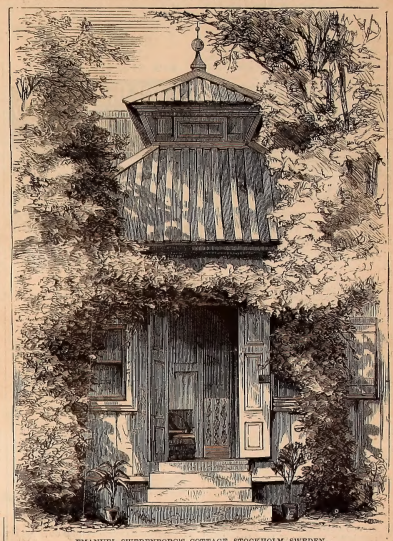
Paper becomes of the numerous journals, native and foreign, which are every day confiscated by the French police? One might suppose they would be sold by the ream, but the quantity of these various issues by being employed to kindle the fires in all the imperial palaces, and in the public offices and in the barracks. But no. When the store-room is full the papers are transferred to the Receveur de Domaine, and carted away to the paper-mills, where they are thrown round the barriers, where they are thrown pell-mell into the chilled of water and pressure, and reduced to pulp. This operation is called le mise au pilon, and is performed in the presence of a squad of gens d'armes, who are specially to see that not a single one of the doomed journals escapes. The pulp is then sold to the paper-manufacturers. In 1868 the sum of 100,000 of Henri Rochefort's Lanternes, red covers and all, were shewed to company with about half a million copies of the Figaro, the Siècle, the Temps, the Opinion Nationale, the Gazette de Monsieur, and the Rhadamanthe—the latter paper, by the bye, was one of Beethoven's in his water together, must by this time have got used to each other's society.

Among the numerous stories told of Parisian beggars is one concerning a blind man—really blind—who is always to be seen near a certain gateway on the Boulevard Sebastopol. A passer-by who was in the habit of giving him a couple of sous one day dropped a double piece by the fellow's leg by mistake. On discovering his mistake, some time after, he returned and asked for it. The blind man was gone, but a cripple in the gateway directed him to the Rue de Petit Carreau, where he said "Monsieur Benjamin" lived. The gentleman went to the address indicated. A nicely-dressed servant came to open it. "Monsieur Benjamin lives here?" "Yes." The servant is shown into an elegant ante-room, through which one could see into a dining-room, where there was a table adorned with plate and with fine wine, fresh cream, and silver. The maid came to say that Monsieur Benjamin would be glad to see his visitor, and at the same instant she opened the door of an apartment furnished in the Turkish fashion, in which the blind man was seen seated on a divan. "I am indebted to you, sir," he said. "Yes, indeed, Sir," replied our friend, "you have cheated me." "I am sorry for the trouble you, but the fact is—I believe—I rather think—that in passing along the Boulevard Sebastopol this morning I gave you a double piece by the mistake I'm sure." The blind man said, with the utmost coolness, "That is quite possible. I haven't looked at the coin yet, and if there is a mistake, nothing is easier than to rectify it." He rung a bell, which was answered by the maid. "Ask M. Ernest," he said, "if the receipts of this morning he has found a piece of forty francs." The piece was at once produced and identified, and at the bidding of her master presented it on a tray of Chinese lac to his visitor. The visitor pounced upon his coin, and, without a word of explanation, left the house. "Pardon, Sir," said the blind man, "you forget something—there are two sous to return me."

A MODERN TOURNAMENT.—DRAWN BY W. S. L. JEWETT.—[SEE PAGE 772.]



EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.



EMANUEL SWEDENBORG'S COTTAGE, STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

FEW men ever exercised so large an influence over the religious opinions of the race as EMANUEL SWEDENBORG. He was born in Stockholm, Sweden, January 29, 1688, and died in London, March 29, 1772, in his eighty-fifth year. His father, JESPER SWEDENBORG, was the Bishop of Skara, in West Gottland, and had charge of the Swedish Church in England and its American Colonies. EMANUEL belonged to the nobility, and received the most liberal education. He received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at the University of Upsal, in 1709, and afterward traveled in foreign countries. Though a poet by nature, he devoted a large portion of his leisure time to the study of mathematics and mechanics. It was through his proficiency in these sciences that he came to be introduced to the special notice of CHARLES XII., by whom, in 1716, he was appointed assessor of the royal mines. He availed himself of his mechanical skill in the siege of Frederickshald, where he, by means of machines of his own invention, contrived to transport several large vessels, over hills and valleys, a distance of about fourteen miles. About this time he published several small works, among which was a treatise on the earth and the planets. In 1721 he published in Latin, at Amsterdam, six small philosophical treatises, one of which was entitled "A Practical Method of finding the Longitude of Places on Land and at Sea by Lunar Observations." In 1722 he published some scientific works, principally relating to minerals. In 1733 he published, at Dresden and Leipsic, his "Principia, or the First Principles of Natural Things, being New Attempts toward a Philosophical Explanation of the Elementary World." In 1740, at Amsterdam, he published "The Philosophy of the Animal Kingdom;" and in 1744–45 "The Animal Kingdom," and "The Worship and Love of God."

These various works established SWEDENBORG'S reputation as a profound thinker. In 1724 he was invited to accept the professorship of Pure Mathematics in the University of Upsal, but declined the office. His portrait hangs in the hall of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Stockholm, of which he was once President, near that of LINNÆUS, one of the first founders of the institution. It is asserted that a number of important discoveries which have made other names illustrious were anticipated in SWEDENBORG'S works.

In early life SWEDENBORG was the subject of deep religious impressions, and his writings are all characterized by a devotional spirit. He often read and meditated on the Word of God. Every thing, however trivial, he submitted to the will of Divine Providence. In his fifty-seventh year, when, as he assures us, he "was called to a new and holy office by the Lord himself, who manifested himself to him in person, and opened his sight to a view of the spiritual world, and granted him the privilege of conversing with spirits and angels," he resigned his office as assessor, one-half of his salary being continued to him in his retirement. After four years of preparation, during which SWEDENBORG sincerely believed that he was acting under the Divine guidance, he published his "Heavenly Arcana." Like his former works, this was in Latin. The entire work, in eight volumes, was published in London, 1749–56. This, the largest of SWEDEN-

"THE FIERY CROSS."—FROM A PAINTING BY J. LAMONT BRODIE.—[SEE PAGE 782.]

BORG's theological works, is characterized by a remarkable method and consistency. Among the most prominent of his works of this character afterward published may be mentioned "Heaven and Hell," "The New Jerusalem," "Divine Love and Wisdom," "The Apocalypse Revealed," and "Conjugal Love." Besides these he left a large number of manuscripts, many of which have been edited and published by Dr. J. F. I. TAFEL, professor and librarian in the University of Tübingen. On Christmas-eve, 1771, he was struck with apoplexy, from which he partially recovered, and remained in the full possession of his mental faculties till the time of his death.

During his life SWEDENBORG had few followers, but the number of those who now believe in his system and in the importance of his mission is by no means inconsiderable. The system which he left to posterity is its most fascinating feature. There is nothing in SWEDENBORG's system that is not elevating in its tendency.

LAST WORDS.

Let the sweet air receive my dying moan,
Now that the setting sun inspires its breath;
And though the white moon find thee, love, alone,
Remember where my spirit wandereth.
I held me to Death.

Look not upon the shadow at thy feet,
The blighted, fretted witness of my woe:
Turn from it, and forget the struggling beat
Of the worn heart that thus had loved so.
O let me go!

Do not recall the drooping of mine eye,
When my last glance has fainted on thy brow;
Do not recall the quiver of the sigh,
Which from my parting bosom must grow.
O kiss me now!

Only I bid thee hold my quiet hand
Till all is over; for I am afraid
To be quite lonely on that border-land
Whence earth is mist, and the Beyond a shade.
O let me fade!

I know thee near, but can not feel thy touch:
Thick gloom defeats my sight, nor hear I thee.
Farewell! Remember that I loved much;
Pray for one gleam of light to set me free—
O free! O free!

"THE FIERY CROSS."

We have seldom seen a picture more oppropriate in conception than "The Fiery Cross," by Mr. H. ROBINSON, the President of the Manchester Academy of Fine Arts. The subject will at once suggest itself as Vich Alpeive's summons to his clan, described in SCOTT's "Lady of the Lake." The passage more particularly illustrated occurs in the third canto, where Roderick, having consigned the terrible symbol of war and danger to his swift henchman, MALISE—

"Like heathfowl the hawks pursue,
A large arroee Loch Katrine drew:
High shot the henchman on the prow,
So rapidly the bargemen rose,
The baleful cross, where'er launched the boat,
Were all unbroken and afloat,
Dancing in foam and ripple still,
When it had near'd the main land hill."

The Celtic character and energy are capitally rendered in the figure. The landscape, too, indicating a coming storm, lends itself to the poetry of the incident. But the best commentary on the effect of the picture we can offer will be the note by SCOTT himself on "The Fiery Cross." "When," says the poet, "a chieftain designed to summon his clan upon any sudden or important emergency, he slew a goat, and, making a cross of any light wood, seared its extremities in the fire, and extinguished them in the blood of the animal. This was called the Fiery Cross, or Crean Tarigh, or the Cross of Shame, because disobedience to what the symbol implied inferred infamy. It was delivered to a trusty messenger, who ran with full speed with it to the next hamlet, where he presented it to the principal person with a single word, naming the place of rendezvous. He who received the symbol was bound to send it forward with equal dispatch to the next village; and it passed with incredible celerity through all the district which owed allegiance to the chief, and also among his allies and neighbors if the danger was common to them. At sight of the Fiery Cross, every man, from sixteen years old to sixty, capable of bearing arms was obliged instantly to repair in his best arms and accoutrements to the place of rendezvous. He who failed to appear suffered fire and sword, which, and which were emblematically denounced to the disobedient by the bloody and burned marks upon this warlike signal. A remarkable instance of the rapidity with which this system of telegraphy—once common to the Scandinavian tribes and the Celtic nations—was carried out, SCOTT adds that during the civil war of 1745-46, when the Fiery Cross often made its circuit, upon one occasion passed through the whole district of Breadalbane, a tract of thirty-two miles, in three hours.

CRAPPED HANDS and FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured at once by the use of Hagan's Camphor Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—HAGAN & CO., New York.

THE OLDEST YOUTH'S PUBLICATION.—MR. NATHANIEL WILLIS, father of N. P. WILLIS, started a Youth's paper in Boston in 1829, called the Youth's Companion. It has been published weekly from that year until the present time (40 years), and is to-day one of the most vigorous and enterprising sheets in the country.—[Com.]

TAKE AYER'S SARSAPARILLA to purify the blood and purge out the humors, pimples, boils, and sores which are merely evidences of the corruption within.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

$10, $12, $15, $20, $25.

Watches and Imitation Brazilian and Australian Diamond Jewelry. Price List of Genuine Gold Chains, $2 to $10 each. Call or send for Price-List.

JOHN POGGAN,
No. 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

ALL DOUBT VANISHES

FOR WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT is tested free at 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

A trial entails no further charges, on receipt of $5, or a gallon for $20, double strength.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,
Nos. 75 and 77 Spring St., corner Crosby.

ESTABLISHED 1850.

Wholesale and retail manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c., suitable for city and country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

LIVINGSTON'S PATENT
BRACED WEB SAW.
PATENT GROUND.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 20 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

S. W. GEERY,
IMPORTER,
Wholesale & Retail Dealer in TEAS, WINES, CIGARS, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly S. W. GEERY & CO., 179 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the specialty of this house for years.

Orders by mail receive the same care as if given in My stock comprises some of the oldest liquors in the country.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

AGENTS WANTED for our new work: sells at sight; all classes, without regard to politics, religion, or occupation. Now Ready

Our Home Physician.

A new Handy-Book of Family Medicine. By GEORGE M. BEARD, A.M., M.D., of the University of the City of New York. This is new work, written up to date. Quackery, Humbuggery, and Old-Fogy Dogmas exposed. Send for Circulars.

E. B. TREAT & CO., Publishers, 654 Broadway, N. Y.,
TREAT & HAMILTON, 224 & 226 W. Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

THE LEADING CHURCH MUSIC BOOK OF THE SEASON!

The Choral Tribute.

By L. O. EMERSON.

The best Sacred Music Book ever written by the author. Entirely new Choirs and Congregations are delighted with it. Price $1.50 by mail, postpaid. Single copies sent postpaid on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO.,
CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., New York.

SOMETHING NEW!

Two Million Copies of the Annual SHAKESPEARE will be issued, December 15th, 1869, and in order that the distribution may be made as rapidly as possible, I will deem it a favor to send, gratuitously, ten or fifteen copies to any person who will judiciously distribute them in his vicinity. One of the features are the "Seven Ages of Man's Life," illustrated in a masterly manner. Address A. J. OGILVIE BROWN, No. 31 Grand Street, Jersey City, New Jersey.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's Sewing and Family Machine.

To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and energetic character, can make handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

SEND ONE DOLLAR, and get by return mail the prettiest Present you can give a Lady this Christmas—Loring's Sun of French Note Paper, with her Initial. Address LORING, Publisher, Boston.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either HARPER'S WEEKLY, MONTHLY, or BAZAR, $4, and THE FREE-SOCIALIST, FOWLER'S, and to one address for $5, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

$7 SEWING MACHINE. Agents send stamp for pic. Will sell new beautiful Beaver Cloth, Leather, or Linen. Address SEWING MACHINE CO., 111 Broadway, New York. Liberal discount to agents.

THE GREATEST ROMANCE OF THE AGE!

WILL BE READY, NEXT WEEK, in the columns of
THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,
a New and
DEEPLY-EXCITING ROMANCE, from the pen of the famous
E. Z. C. JUDSON,
the greatest of living romance writers, and well known as a temperance lecturer of great ability, and who will be readily recognized under his world-renowned nom-de-plume of

NED BUNTLINE,

under which name he has written over one hundred popular romances.

NED BUNTLINE
has been engaged to write exclusively for
THE NEW YORK WEEKLY.

In engaging this writer, we are aware of possessing the only man in America whose life, from boyhood to the present date, has been literally an almost constant scene of living adventure. His travel has been literally world-wide; his stories, therefore, are descriptively never life, perhaps, than those of any other writer.

The first one of LAND ADVENTURE, to be commenced next week in our columns, will be

BUFFALO BILL,
THE KING OF BORDER-MEN.

The author has written this con amore, for the hero is one of his warmest, chosen friends, by whose side he has ridden many a mile in chase of buffalo and Indian on our great Western plains, as also in the more exciting and startling work of reducing the red warriors of the West to the laws of the pale face.

"BUFFALO BILL"

is known, especially among our army officers, as the

MOST DARING SCOUT,
THE BEST HORSEMAN,
THE BEST-INFORMED GUIDE, AND THE GREATEST HUNTER

of the present day. From his childhood on, even now engaged as chief of scouts with a daring band under his tenleership, his life has been a wild, thrilling romance.

A part of this, including pictures of other noted, and some most lovely characters, has been woven into a romance that can not fail to thrill, to please, and to deeply interest every reader. In parts it is HUMOROUS, in others PATHETIC, but as a whole it is life as life IS, and not as it is fancied by those who have learned in cities and fought their battles in drawing-rooms.

For the last two years

NED BUNTLINE

has been preparing, by travel, for a new series of works calculated to excel any of his previous efforts to please the people, and we are proud in having succeeded, against all competition, in securing his pen exclusively for

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY.

Buffalo Bill's Picture

has been expressly photographed for the story: and when the author, who was intimate with KIT CARSON, BEN MCCULLOCH, and many other notable hunters and scouts, tells us that Mr. Cody, the real name of his hero, is the handsomest man he ever saw on the Plains, we may fancy on Apollo in the saddle.

His female pictures in the story are also sketched from life, and are so pure and beautiful that one would almost think them fancy-drawn.

We will say no more, but set our readers feel assured that we are happy in making an announcement which will add to their pleasure and our profit.

☞ SPECIMEN COPIES SENT FREE. ☜

THE TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS:

One year, single copy.....Three Dollars.
One year, four copies ($2.50 each)..Ten Dollars.
One year, eight copies.....Twenty Dollars.

Those sending $20 for a club of eight, all sent at one time, will be entitled to a copy FREE. Getters-up of clubs can afterward add single copies at $2.50 each.

All letters must be directed to

STREET & SMITH,
Office, 55 Fulton St. Box 4396, N. Y.

"A valuable paper for our farming population."

This is the verdict of the CONNECTICUT FARMER, and we feel confident that the subscribers of the will fully endorse this conclusion.

NEW ENGLAND FARMER

TERMS: $2.50 a year for the Weekly, or $1 50 for the Monthly. Send stamp for specimens and premium list.

R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

MRS. WHITNEY'S new Novel, "Hitherto: a Story of Yesterday," costs $2 50 by mail, from LORING, Publisher, Boston.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Its attention is also given to topics of especial and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly engaged in the department of Illustration, and the publishers are also largely indebted to photographers in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions.

As a LITERARY JOURNAL, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the only illustrated newspaper which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to pre-eminence.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of its most prominent features; it includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

In No. 625, for November 20, was commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870 for $4 00.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and well-earned ever known in the history of journalism, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper ever issued. As an illustrated exponent of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of fashion in Europe—its illustrations are now published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Editorial articles are always timely, and cover every topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently secure for the journal the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now reached upon its Fortieth Volume. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents. The enterprise of the publishers in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions, and the most widely-reading writers; its profusely illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration; its Historical papers, subscribing, and popular treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon Social Topics characteristic of the age, and upon current topics; and to the variety and interest of its special Departments, to which recently a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The eleasons upon which the best success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristics, and the publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to enhance even its present popularity.

Each Number now contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in this country, whilst the increased space at the disposal of its Publishers will enable them to treat fully all the important topics of the time.

The Publishers feel themselves warranted in asking a continuance for the future a continuance of the favor which has been accorded to their enterprise in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR, 20 cents a year, or 5 cents a quarter, which must be paid at the subscriber's post-office. Subscriptions to commence from the Number next after receipt of Order.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his Order.

Subscribers to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give special notification.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

☞ New Subscribers to either of Harper's Periodicals can obtain from the present time to the close of 1870 for Four Dollars.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300; Half Page, $150. Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, if in a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line: Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—One Dollar per Agate Line Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

HAVE FOR SALE,

in quantities to suit customers,

ASTRAKHAN, SEALSKIN,

BEAVER, and PLUSH

CLOTHS and CLOAKINGS,

EXTRA QUALITY.

Also,

ENGLISH and DOMESTIC REPELLANTS,

IN PLAID and MIXED COLORS,

FOR SUITS;

HABIT CLOTHS,

in Desirable Shades;

THE FINEST QUALITY

West-of-England Broadcloths, in Black and Blue, suitable for Men's wear;

FOREIGN and DOMESTIC CASSIMERES,

BEDFORD CORDS, &c., &c.,

At Greatly Reduced Prices.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., and 10TH ST.

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!

NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH

AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It consists of the aforesaid inhalations by harmless liquids—they are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing, and of powerful curatives. Relief and comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in the course of a few days. It penetrates through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at its fountain head—removes all the wretched symptoms, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat, "cold in the head," sneezing, dizziness, loss of memory, dimness of vision, and restores the sense of taste and smell, which is totally extinguished in many, some malady in all its forms forever, and cures the most loathsome disease. Send a Stamp for Circular, to GERRIT NORTON, office 11 Aun St., N. Y.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its quality and appearance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the encomiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

PRICE FROM $16 TO $32.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

Goods sent by Express, C. O. D., with charges.

ADDRESS JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,

No. 34 Nassau Street, New York.

"ECONOMY IS WEALTH."—FRANKLIN.

Why do people pay $50 to $100 for a Sewing Machine, when $28 will buy a better one for all practical purposes? The "LOCKSTITCH" and "DIAMOND" Machines are sold in any quantity as usual, regardless the false reports of rival dealers, who protect their customers by a gift of over 100 per cent. on inferior machines. Our legion of friends know that we furnish a better machine and machine of established merit, double thread, complete, with Table, at reasonable prices, and that thousands of parties endorse our statements when we claim that these Machines excel all in simplicity and genuine perfection. They are constructed upon entirely new and improved principles, and are without head or gearing. Warranted for 10 years. We desire to do more good by finding new customers, and take this method to avoid sales. All competition defied, and prices lower than others can retail the unfinished stock. Call and see. WANTED. Machines sent on trial and given away to families of very limited means and deserving. For testimonials, and reduced price-list, address J. C. OTTIS & CO., Machine Depot, Box 337, Boston, Mass.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S

Establishment for the sale of

HOUSE FURNISHING

Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at

1172 Broadway, cor. 29th Street.

Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Goods, and other own manufactures for household articles requiring Replating done on short notice. They are also prepared to furnish Gas or Bell Work and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

$2000 A YEAR AND EXPENSES

To agents to sell the celebrated Wilson Sewing Machines. The best machine in the world. Stitch alike on both sides. Lock-stitch machine on sale. For further particulars, address

THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO.,

Cleveland, Ohio; Boston, Mass.; or St. Louis, Mo.

WATERS'

NEW SCALE PIANOS.

With Iron Frame, Overstrung Bass and Agraffe Bridge.

Melodeons and Cabinet Organs.

The best manufactured. Warranted for 6 years.

Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs.—Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New 7-octave Pianos, $175 and upward. New Cabinet Organs, $45 and upward. Second-hand instruments, $40 and upward. Monthly Instalments received. Warerooms, 481 Broadway, N. Y. HORACE WATERS.

THE CELEBRATED

IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES,

"COLLINS METAL,"

Improved Oroide.

These justly celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established, as to require no recommendations. From 15 Hunting Watches, $10, equal in appearance and for time to Gold Watches worth $100; Full-Jeweled Levers, $15, equal to $150 Gold ones; Full-Jeweled Levers, extra fine and superior finish, $20, equal to $200 Gold ones.

We have just commenced making a very fine American Watch, full jeweled, Patent Lever, chronometer balance, adjusted to heat, cold, and position, 4½ ounces down weight, equal in appearance and for time to a Gold Watch costing $250.

We charge only $25 for these magnificent Watches. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $5 to $8. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

CALIFORNIA DIAMONDS.

We are now making Jewelry of the California Diamonds. These are real stones of great brilliancy and hardness, and can not be distinguished from the genuine stones, even by good judges. They are particularly brilliant at night by artificial light, do not scratch or become dull by use, and retain their brilliancy for an indefinite time. The following are the prices:

Ladies' and Gents' Finger Rings, single stones, one carat wt's ..... $5 each.
Gents' Pins, single stone, according to the size of the stone ..... $4 to $6.
Ladies' Cluster Pins ..... $7.50.
Ladies' Cluster Earrings ..... $7.00.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free.

Goods sent by Express to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

We Live in Three Climates.

In this country we have at different seasons of the year the temperature of three climates. Our Springs and Autumns have a softness and mildness that belong only to the Temperate Zone. The Mid-summer days are torrid, and our Mid-winters almost arctic in their frigidity. These changes, involving a variation of from ninety to one hundred degrees of Fahrenheit during the year, are upon the whole conducive to health and long life, but they tend to entail upon us some distressing complaints which can only be escaped by the exercise of due care and the use of a proper antidote when the system is pre-disposed to contract them. The chief and most annoying of these complaints is dyspepsia, once supposed to be incurable, but which, since the introduction of now about twenty years ago, has proved to be a perfectly manageable disease.

HOSTETTER'S

STOMACH BITTERS,

In the Spring and Fall, but more especially in the Fall, the symptoms of dyspepsia are generally aggravated. They embrace expressions of the animal liver under the burning sun of Summer is apt to leave the stomach weak and indolent, and incompetent to the task of perfect digestion. Happily, there is a tonic which will rouse it from its lethargy and brace and invigorate without irritation, and that tonic is the basis of the remedy provided in the wonderful vegetable preparation which has replaced, in a great measure, all the old pestilential compounds of mineral drugs which were in vogue. We say that the disorder could not be radically cured. The success of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS in all the worst varieties of dyspepsia, acute or chronic, has effectually exploded this fallacy, and it is now recommended as a specific for indigestion by some of the most eminent members of the medical profession.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with employment that will pay them handsomely the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and pleasant. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50 cents to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make the unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of Home and Fireside, one of the largest and handsomest publications—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address G. STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

THE DOLLAR WATCH.—A perfect timekeeper, with superior compass attachment. Cases, Hunting, Hunter's Gold, engraved, dial, gilt, crystal, steel and brass works. Usual watch size. Sent by mail, post-paid, for $1. Address, with stamp, for circular, JAMES BROWN & SON, Salem, Mass.

TWO NICE NEW GAMES:

"Words Within Words" and "Blowing Cotton."

Pleasing and entertaining for Old and Young. They are sure to be liked. Sent by mail, post-paid, for 50 cents two games, in a neat box, for 50 cents. Sent postpaid on receipt of price by J. L. ROBERTS, Warsaw, N. Y.

HORRIBLE!—I suffered with CATARRH Thirty Years!—was cured in six weeks by a simple remedy. Any person can make it. Will send recipe to all afflicted. Address REV. T. J. MEAD, Drawer 116, Fairfield, Iowa.

$75 to $200 per Month to Agents, salary or commission, to sell our Patent White Wire Clothes Lines. Sample free. Address M. WALKER & WILLIAMS St., N. Y., Chicago, Ill., Richmond, Va., or Memphis, Tenn.

AGENTS wanted every where. Brown's Patent Double-Elastic Sewing Machine. Price reduced to $25. Will do work with the best feel. No Express charges. Send for Circulars. G. BROWN & CO., 158 Washington St., N. Y.

SALESMEN.—Wanted, a few reliable, energetic salesmen, to sell by sample standard goods. Address H. H. RICHARDS & CO., 413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

AGENTS can make $200 per month by selling our Silver-Plate Wire Rod. $3 per dozen. Pamphlet sent free. RICHMOND & HOSTER, Seneca Falls, N. Y.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. HAND & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

FRENCH CLOCKS,

BRONZES,

FANCY GOODS,

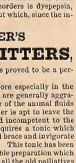
MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,

Opera Glasses,

FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,

PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES.

WEDDING PRESENTS.



Alex. M. Hays & Co.,

No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

USEFUL INFORMATION for RAILWAY MEN.—Compiled by G. HASKINS, C.E., Engineer. Second edition, revised and enlarged. 870 pages. Price, in Morocco Gilt, $3.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray St. and 27 Warren St., New York.

☞ Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

"THE BEST IN THE COUNTRY."

SO SAYS THE "PRESBYTERIAN ADVERTISER" OF THE

NEW YORK OBSERVER.

$3.00 PER ANNUM.

SAMPLE COPIES FREE.

SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,

37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

MAPLE LEAVES, enlarged and improved. Price, 25 cents. Specimen copies of Canadian Monthly Magazine published. It will be sent from now to the end of 1870 for 25 cents. Send in your subscription without delay.

O. A. BOORBACH, 103 Nassau St., New York.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR

PRIEST and NUN.

Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 1504 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

ROSEY'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS. D A Complete Catalogue now ready. Sent free. Rosey's Musical Journal, the new Half-Dollar Series of the Best Songs. Sold every where, or specimen copy mailed for 10 cts. Address—56 Broadway, N. Y.

"ROUGH AND READY; or, Life with the New York Newsboys," the fourth "Ragged Dick" Book, costs $1.50 by mail, from

LORING, Publisher, Boston.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $5, $12, $16. Offices, $15, $20, $30. Send for a circular to KELSEY PRESS CO., 15 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, Wine, Sorghum, Molasses, or Sugarhouse, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address J. L. HARK, 117 Fulton Street, Chicago, Ill.

THE MAGIC COMB will change any colored hair or beard to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for $1. Address HARRIS & CO., Providence, generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

HOWES Never-Failing Agua Cura and Tonic Bitters. Howe's Concentrated Syrup cures terrible diseases of Incipient Consumption, Catarrh, Cancer, &c., every time. $1 each. HOWES & CO., 120 Nassau St., N. Y.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and amusing, 25 cents a package. LIBRARY OF LOVE, 25 cents. Send for Circular. HOWES & CO., 120 Nassau St., N. Y.

TOOL Chests and Lathes.—Are elegant, useful, and instructive. Suitable for boys, amateurs, and mechanics. Illustrated catalogue free. Address GEORGE FARR, Buffalo, New York.

Collegiate and Commercial Institute (General Russell's School), New Haven, Ct. Winter term begins Jan. 11.

Stammering cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet address Simpson & Co., Box 3076, N. Y.

$1140—How I made it in Six Months. Secret and sample mailed free. A. J. Fuller, N. Y.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENJAMIN VINCENT, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the Use of American Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $5.00.

2.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By JAMES GREENWOOD, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger" "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2.50.

3.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. By JOSEPH MCCARTHY, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbors." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

4.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3.75.

5.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The French Revolution," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2.00.

6.

WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By EDMUND YATE, Author of "Kissing the Rod," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.

THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE, King of Naples and Sicily. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte." "The French Revolution," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $1.20. Uniform with

ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES.

12mo, Cloth, $1.20 per volume.

CYRUS THE GREAT. DARIUS THE GREAT. XERXES. ALEXANDER THE GREAT. JULIUS CÆSAR. HANNIBAL. JULIUS CÆSAR, CLEOPATRA, NERO, ALFRED THE GREAT. WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR. RICHARD I. RICHARD III., RICHARD III., MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, QUEEN ELIZABETH. CHARLES I. CHARLES II. MARIE ANTOINETTE. MADAME ROLAND. HENRY IV., PETER THE GREAT. GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS. MADAME DE MAINTENON. HERNANDO CORTEZ. MARGARET OF ANJOU. JOSEPH BONAPARTE.

8.

A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK; or, A County Family. A Novel. By the Author of "One of the Family," "Carlyon's Year," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

9.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Literature, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, LL.D. With Nearly 1,000 Engravings on Wood. In Two Volumes. 8vo, Cloth, $6.00 per volume; Sheep, $8.50; Full Roan, $9.00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $11.00.

10.

THE MINISTER'S WIFE. A Novel. By MRS. OLIPHANT, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "Perpetual Curate," "Life of Edward Irving," "Brownlows'," "Agnes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

11.

UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Mental Philosophy: embracing the Three Departments of the Intellect, Sensibilities, and Will. By THOMAS C. UPHAM, D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Bowdoin College. In Three Volumes. Vol. I.: Intellect, Language; Vol. II.: Sensibilities, Will. 12mo, Cloth, $1.75 per volume.

12.

IN SILK ATTIRE. A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of "A Daughter of Heth." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.

COUNTESS GISELA. A Novel. By E. MARLITT. Translated by A. Nahmer. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

14.

A GREEK GRAMMAR FOR BEGINNERS. By WILLIAM HENRY WADDELL, Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of Georgia. 12mo, Cloth, $1.00.

15.

FOUND DEAD. A Novel. By the Author of "Carlyon's Year," "One of the Family," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

16.

FALSE COLORS. A Novel. By ANNIE THOMAS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

17.

MOORE'S LETTERS AND JOURNALS OF LORD BYRON. With Notes and Ordering Index. Edited by THOMAS MOORE. New Edition. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $4.00.

18.

GUICCIOLI'S LORD BYRON. My Recollections of Lord Byron and those of Eye-Witnesses of his Life. By the COUNTESS GUICCIOLI. Translated by HENRY E. H. JEREMIAH. Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1.75.

19.

MY DAUGHTER ELINOR. A Novel of American Society. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

20.

GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS, Complete. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition. Complete in 8 vols., 12mo. Morocco Cloth, 15 cents per volume. The set complete, in a neat case, $12.00.

ADAM BEDE.—THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.—FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.—SILAS LAPHAM and SILAS MARNER.—ROMOLA.

21.

THACKERAY'S NOVELS:

VANITY FAIR. 12 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. PENDENNIS. 172 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts. THE NEWCOMES. 190 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—THE NEWCOMES. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—THE VIRGINIANS. 100 Illust's. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—THE VIRGINIANS. 64 Illustrations and Portrait of Author. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—ESMOND and THE WOLVES AND THE WIDOWER. 12 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

22.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:

HARD CASH. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.—THE JILT, and FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.—WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—PEG WOFFINGTON, CHRISTIE JOHNSTONE, and CHEER SOBER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

AN EPISODE OF THE CENTRAL PARK.

STOUT GUARDIAN OF THE PARK. "Hey, there! Stop! I arrest you for Fast Driving! You must go with me!"
YOUNG AMERICA. "Oh, now you've got a going, you might as well keep right along with me."

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HEMSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRIPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KINGSBURY BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. MCINTIRE, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. E. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; H. D. MUSSON, Zanesville, Ohio; J. E. GOETZ, Philadelphia, Pa.; C. BLEKE, Pittsburgh, Pa.; L. B. POWELL, Scranton, Pa.; CLUETT & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; H. S. MARSH, Rochester, N. Y.; H. UTLEY, Buffalo, N. Y.; RESSIGUIE & HOWE, Syracuse, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; COREY BROS., Providence, R. I.; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C. W.; E. PETER & BRO., St. John, N. B.

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES
AT
UNION ADAMS & CO.

For Ladies.

Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Merino Hosiery,
Kid and Castor Gloves.

For Misses.

Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Patent Union Dresses,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Cashmere Hosiery,
Roman and Fancy Sashes.

No. 637 Broadway.

Holiday Presents.—A suitable Present is a Meerschaum Pipe or Holder, Plain or Carved, of the best material; a large variety, at manufacturers' prices, at Kuldenberg's, 6 John St., near Broadway & 71 Nassau cor. John. Formerly 23 Wall. Send for Circular & Price-List. P.O. Box 3734.

Hatter and Furrier.
DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
711 BROADWAY,
offers at low prices:

LADIES' FINE FURS in every variety; SEAL and ASTRAKHAN SACQUES AND TURBANS.
WHITE FOX MUFFS AND BOAS;
CHILDREN'S FURS, GENTS' FURS, &c.
Importer of ENGLISH HATS for Gentlemen's Wear.

A MERITED TRIBUTE.

WALTER HECHE, Esq., 137 Broadway, New York, after having been built for upward of ten years, used BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS for eight months, and has now a thick lustrous head of real black hair.

MAGIC LANTERNS, for Sunday-Schools, Public Exhibitions, and Parlor Entertainments. ☞ Catalogues sent free.—MICROSCOPES, for Scientific and Popular Investigations. ☞ Price-List sent free.
T. H. MCALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
C. A. STEVENS & CO.,
40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York,

are offering
A choice selection of Diamonds, Pearls, Sapphires, and other Gems, mounted in the most artistic manner. Also, Fine Jewelry of every variety. Watches from the best American and European manufacturers.
Silver and Plated Ware, a choice selection constantly on hand.
Particular attention given to the Resetting of Diamonds, and the manufacture of Silver Ware for Testimonials and Weddings, from original designs.

AGENTS for the SALE OF WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO. of MARION, New Jersey. Send for Circular.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'
SAPOLIO
CLEANS WINDOWS, MARBLE,
KNIVES.
POLISHES
TIN,
IRON, STEEL, &c.

Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.) Baltimore, Md.

IMPORTANT!—Health and pleasure in the use of Reid's Pat. Potato Baker. Testimonials and description sent by DEWEY & BOCKWELL, Buffalo, N.Y.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
46 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

C. G. Gunther's Sons,
502—504 BROADWAY,
Offer a very Elegant Assortment of Novelties in
SEAL AND ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, TURBANS, Boas, Ties, &c.
Freeman & Burr,
MERCHANT
CLOTHIERS,
138 & 140 FULTON St.,
NEW YORK,

Invite attention to their magnificent stock of Men's and Boys' Clothing. It is of unparalleled extent and variety, made up in strict accordance with prevailing styles from the most fashionable materials, and for novelty of design and excellence in workmanship can not be surpassed.

OVERCOATS for all seasons, $8 to $50.
SUITS for all occasions and occupations, $12 to $60.
BOYS' SUITS for all ages, $6 to $20.
COUNTRY ORDERS.—Rules for self-measurement, patterns of goods, and price-lists, which enable gentlemen in any part of the country to order clothing direct from them with the certainty of receiving perfect-fitting garments.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,
WITH
PURE SILVER.
The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson; and the use of new and ingenious labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods in ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,
which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY,
Can not be Excelled.
All goods bearing our trade-mark,
"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"
ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED;
and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.
OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, CONN.
SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N.Y.

GOODALL'S PLAYING CARDS
New patterns. Victor E. Manger, Sole Ag't, 116 Reade St.

A NEW DISCOVERY!!
PHALON'S
"VITALIA;"
OR,
Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaculent matter, requires no shaving up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "Vitalia" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the direction being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!
AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,
CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,
517 Broadway, N. Y.

Two Months FREE! FREE!!
The Most Popular Juvenile Magazine in America.
THE
LITTLE CORPORAL.
Entirely Original and First Class.

All new subscribers for THE LITTLE CORPORAL for the new year, whose names and money are sent during November and December, will receive the November and December Nos. of 1869 FREE!

THE LITTLE CORPORAL has a Larger Circulation than any other Juvenile Magazine in the world, and is better worth the price than any other magazine published.

Because of its immense circulation, we are enabled to furnish it at the low price of DOLLAR A YEAR. Single number, 12 cents, or free to any one who will try to raise a club. Beautiful premiums for clubs.

Subscribe NOW. Back numbers can always be sent. Address

ALFRED L. SEWELL & CO., PUBLISHERS, CHICAGO, ILL.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the sleeping-room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. Thousands who are using it testify to its merits. Send for a Pamphlet.
E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N. Y.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and DISSOLVING VIEWS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

TO THE LADIES.—One week's time, pleasantly employed, will pay for a first-rate Sewing Machine. Address D. D. KELSEY,
129 Lexington Ave., New York.

Send for terms of 'Linden Hall,' Lititz, Lancaster Co., Pa.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

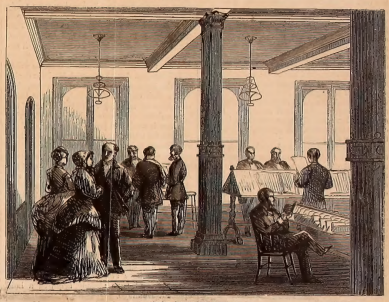
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 676.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE NEW YORK YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

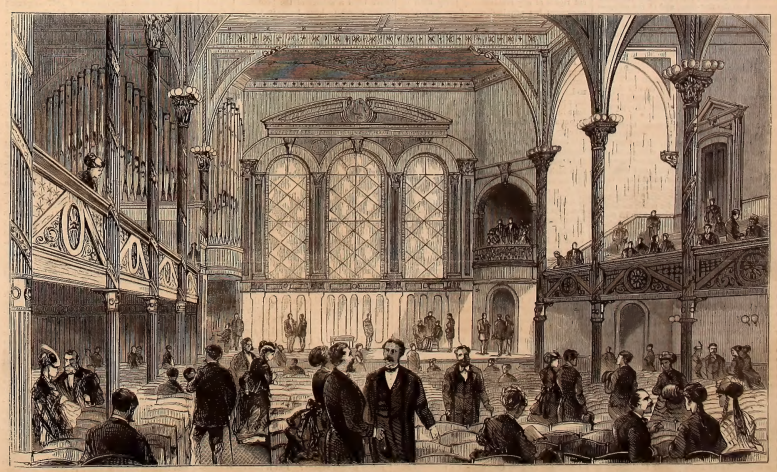
THE LIBRARY.



THE READING-ROOM.

It was a noble conception, that of him who first formed the idea of employing the instrumentality of a club in the work of Christ. It has been, than far, nobly realized in the new building of the New York Young Men's Christian Association.

For years this Association has been carrying on its work without any adequate means. It has undertaken to provide for the moral, intellectual, and social improvement of the young men of the great metropolis. To this work it has strictly confined itself. Other similar organizations have added to the sphere of their labors. They have organized mission-schools, tenement-house prayer-meetings, temporal charities. That in New York has found as much as it could do in its single self-chosen mission. It has had between one and two hundred thousand young men to provide for. Over seventy-five thousand of these, as nearly as can be ascertained, are homeless and almost friendless. Some are penniless. Those who have money are more to be pitied than these who have not. Their danger is just in the ratio of their means. The allurements to vice are numerous and attractive. Without discussing the much-vexed question of amusements, it is certain that the theatre, the billiard-room, the café, are in a large majority of instances, and to a large majority of young men, open doors to ruin. The dance is little or no better. We speak not of what they might be, but of what they now actually are. Until the recent excise law Broadway was lined with brightly-lighted halls, where women employed their arts to add to the enticements of music, drink, and dancing. Attention to business does by no means always serve to counteract the influences of vice, which are erroneously supposed to captivate only the idle. Business often demands of the young salesman, as a part of his professional duties, that he accompany his customer to these dens of iniquity, and show him the pollutions of the great city. Every now and then some great defalcation, some atrocious swindle, startling the



THE LECTURE-ROOM.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1869.

THE SPANISH GUN-BOATS.

THE Spanish gun-boats have again become conspicuous, and nothing could be more bewildering than the different positive and apparently authentic statements of the policy of the Administration. The journals which probably have the least knowledge of the intentions and views of the Government have published the most elaborate letters upon the subject, and the general reader has been compelled to fall back upon the previous history and good sense of the President and his advisers, if he would have any satisfactory comfort in the situation. The Spanish Government connected for the building of gun-boats at New York. When they were nearly ready, the Peruvian Minister complained that they were designed for war upon Peru—a state with which we are at peace—and they were detained by order of the Government; but the work upon them was continued. When they were nearly finished, crews arrived for them from Spain, and their armaments were shipped to Cuba. That the questions involved might be legally settled, the gun-boats were turned over to the civil authorities, and were held by the United States Marshal: and this is the situation as we write.

It is alleged that the Spanish Minister assures that the boats are intended for service against Peru; and, on the other hand, that the Peruvian Minister is acting under the advice of the Cuban Junta. If, as is probable, the Peruvian Minister is unable to prove his assertion of the purpose for which the boats are designed, there would seem to be no valid reason why they should not be the property of Spain honestly acquired. But at this point it is stated that the Administration is in sympathy with Cuba, and that to release the boats would be to give a formidable fleet against that island, and probably to secure the Spanish ascendency over the Cubans.

It has been urged, therefore, that the boats should be detained at the same time that the United States should acknowledge the belligerent rights of the Cubans: and it is stated that such has been the policy of the Administration. But why was being anticipated in consequence, we have already acquired a hold upon St. Domingo.

We doubt if the Administration would resort to so stupid and clumsy a method of doing so simple a thing. We have always supposed that to believe that the Cuban insurgents are fighting for liberty, and assume that we ought, in the interests of civilization, to recognize them as a belligerent power are engaged in such a struggle, let us at once say so. Indeed, if this were our duty, we ought to have said so long ago when the Cuban prospects were more promising than they now are. But if it be our duty as a civilized state not to acknowledge the belligerent rights of any revolutionary party until it can maintain what is acquired such form and coherence as to show a fair chance of success, certainly we have no right to choose the moment when that chance is slightest as the time for such a recognition.

It is true that the Cuban movement is for independence, and that we are independent of European control. It is true that the revolutionary leaders have proclaimed emancipation, and that we believe in the liberty of the negro. We would liberty and civilization be the gainers if we should take up arms for every party every where upon this continent that should proclaim liberty and announced emancipation? Is it desirable that the United States should establish a precedent by which nations may interfere with the internal dissensions of neighbors? Is it not palpably a step backward, a policy that restores the ancient régime of predatory warfare and conquest? The principles involved in this question are committed in the name of honor and liberty and order. What are treaties of amity, what is international law, clumsy and obsolete as it often is, but the restraint of civilization against the whims of brute force?

Should the Spanish gun-boats be released, it is declared that they will be used in Cuban waters, and that we ought not to permit it. Has Spain, then, no right to attempt the subjugation of a revolted colony? If we think not, why have we not protested before fourteen months have passed away? Or will any honest man, in view of General JORDAN'S letter, and his reports of society to leave the country, say that Spain's chance is more hopeless because of the addition of a fleet of thirty gun-boats to the Spanish force against the rebels? The Cubans are the party. They have no really acknowledged government under which the various functions of a state are fulfilled. They have neither arms nor food. The revolutionary forces are a wandering multitude, sometimes skirmishing with the Spanish outposts. No people, indeed, can be so disciplined because they are poor and suffering; no body of brave men are to be contemned because they are not a powerful and well-appointed army. But have the Cubans, however brave and enlightened, yet impressed the world with the conviction that they have fairly earned recognition as an independent state? Have they really done more than elude, in the interior of the island, the efforts of Spain to subdue them? Is not their attitude wholly negative? and is that the kind of attitude which ought to command the active interference of governments?

Moreover, if the case were exactly as it is, and Cuba were three thousand miles away, would it be urged upon the United States as a duty to acknowledge its belligerence or its independence? Is not this flowing rhetoric about Spain, as a "hard-hearted speculator in human liberty," a "land of palimpsests" and undermining, to do we not plainly read annexation? Now the simple way is the best way. If the United States wish to take Cuba, let them say so, and we are much respected if they do it openly and immediately, as if they take it under cover of acknowledging a confederation of affairs in the island which does not exist, and which their own arms must maintain. To call the list of aggrandizement the love of liberty, deceives nobody. If Cuba has honestly earned the recognition of belligerent rights, we are in favor of the recognition. But we demand the facts, and national honor requires that they be something more than the desire of annexation.

AN OLD MASK STRIPPED OFF.

CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE, who is stated to have expressed surprise that any late rebels should be expected to repent, and to deny that it is desirable that they should be to elected perpetual Grand President of the new Confederate Survivors' Association in South Carolina. General WADE HAMPTON is the most conspicuous person in the movement, and the sentiments of General JOHN S. PRESTON, as expressed in a letter, are unquestionably those of the association, and indicate the spirit of mind which does not tend in the least degree toward repentance. The call of the meeting for organization sets forth that the resistance of the late war "presents the Confederate and United States of America are still fresh, and many records are likely to perish which would place in history a true account of the struggle," who fought and died for their country" demands that the truth be told, in order that the rising generation may learn "that their parents were not in the wrong, but the common school histories, now prepared by our enemies, assert."

General JOHN S. PRESTON was unable to attend the meeting, but sent an ardent letter of sympathy: "We are all survivors of our brothers and sons who died gloriously for their country and for liberty, and we have survived to see that cruel country for which they died." General PRESTON adds, that it is a duty of Confederates, very near to their hearts, "to see that the undefended sons of their comrades are living, to preserve the memory of the great deeds of the Southern soldiers and of the cause for which they died. Indeed, to this vital work the efforts of the Southern Confederacy seems to have been, in General PRESTON'S estimation, the choicest boon that Providence could have granted to them. And as he undoubtedly expresses the general feeling of his class, it is not surprising that the visitors to the GODEY'S STEAM CHAIR, at Saratoga, were profoundly impressed with the fact that public sentiment is not friendly to the Union; and that they are reported to assert that the United States flag was displayed there during the festival; a story which, however, is not likely to be true.

As often as such proceedings take place among the late Confederates the truth must be repeated, that history and the public mind may not be deceived. Chief Justice CHASE is reported to have said, "What have the rebels done that they should repent?" and the World is of opinion that to speak of any moral principle as involved in the late war was "a good enough Morgan" five years ago, but is lamentably out of date now. To Judge CHASE'S question there is a very short and simple answer. The rebels undertook to set up State sovereignty, attempted the bloody overthrow of the United States government for the perpetuation and extension of slavery. They set up a government which had not harmed them, and which they had always controlled. It was a government which abridged none of their liberties. It was a government against which no kind of oppression was urged. The rebels demanded that they should be suffered to secede for the most infamous purpose, and on no other demand, from the very nature of the national life and of the government, was merely Slyck's demand for the pound of flesh. The rebels drew the sword, and they began the terrible war that followed.

In Judge CHASE'S opinion, is a bloody revolution to overthrow a government which was never even charged with oppression, and which, as he knows, oppressed only those slaves who did not rebel against it—is such a revolution a matter of mere difference of opinion, is it justifiable, is it moral, or is it something for which the actors should repent? But if this effort to destroy a government which is not oppressive is a mere subterfuge for the purpose of establishing one that shall hopelessly oppress, then does Judge CHASE, an old anti-slavery leader, think that it is honorable and commendable, or to be repented of as the horrors of the middle passage might have been deplored even by slave-traders, when the trade was abolished?

The character of the rebellion is not to be sought in its political plea, but in its moral purpose. Suppose even that State sovereignty had been distinctly guaranteed in the Constitution—although it certainly is not—and that the lapse of time and the development of the country had so inextricably welded its real interests in permanence together that the sovereignty could not be asserted without a bloody struggle, was the perpetuity of slavery a justification of such a struggle? Was bowie-ism talk about liberty and country was always the merest gasconade. What "liberty" did Mr. JOHN S. PRESTON fight for? The liberty of selling other men's wives and children. What country does he talk about? The State of South Carolina. He and his friends will find that their wrestle with History is more desperate than that with the Union. History sees already that they fought not because they were oppressed, but because they feared to lose the power of oppression. The contest is decided, and they are vanquished.

We have no wish to remind them of it. But we shall take care that whenever it is made it shall be evident that there was a mere political difference, its moral character shall be plainly stated.

THE GRAIN TRADE.

THE failures in Liverpool among the grain dealers with American connections, announced by the telegram of the 23d November, had created uneasiness at the Corn Exchange and in financial circles. This misfortune, which private telegrams only partially confirm, would not well be avoided in view of the fact that the price of average English wheat in the spring of 1868, in London and Liverpool, was quoted at seventy-four shillings per quarter of eight bushels, and in November, 1869, No. 2 red Western had fallen to forty shillings per quarter. The price of wheat has been rarely higher than the latter points, and in reaching the minimum a few dealers have been worn out by repeated losses occurring on a falling market.

The causes of the most recent fall in the wheat of English markets, as we lately stated on the authority of the Manchester Guardian and the "Chamber of Agriculture," were large crops in the United Kingdom, that the United States would be able to supply all their present wants, and the unusual consumption of potatoes, due to the scarcity of rot which had been expected to be developed. As it is the last ounce which breaks the camel's back, to this unexpected change in food the happening of some of these failures may be attributed.

The estimated annual consumption of wheat in Great Britain, made in the spring of 1868 by Mr. CAREY, was 20,500,000 quarters, of which the supplied 9,600,000 would need to be imported between the harvest of 1867—reported as the worst—and that of 1868, which ensured an abundant, almost drought. As the price of the quarters loaf of bread had been carried up from 5½*d.* in 1864, to 9*d.* in March, 1867, it was fair to infer that the drought of 1868, and the defective crop of the country, would make the trade in breadstuffs active and profitable. But the circumstances in England have been so peculiar as to have turned the most sagacious plans. The price of bread had been carried up simultaneously with the great impulse which the scheme of limited liability gave to the industry of England, and when wheat ruled high the failure which broke down that system had not fully reached the laboring classes, so long after remunerative wages as to be incompromising in their contests with manufacturers. As soon, however, as the financial depression reached the laboring field forces, economy became the order of the day; emigration was resorted to by the Trades Unions; meat was thrown upon the market in unprecedented quantities; the consumption of grain, and the severity of the drought was followed by a winter which, as it partook of the mildness of spring, ensured unusual supplies.

As England is the largest consumer in the world of imported wheat, the London and Liverpool markets may be said to control many years, and to influence in all wheat-exporting countries. But the price there is fixed according to the situation in the countries of supply, the object being, as wheat must be had whatever the price, to adjust it at the lowest amount which will be certain to furnish from six to nine hundred thousand quarters of imported wheat per week.

The waters of every sea are vexed with ships loaded with grain, their prows turned toward England: and if every port in the world capable of selling wheat were not carefully tried, it would be impossible to manage this important business so as to furnish the requisite quantity at reasonable prices. Happy are we to be exempt from this necessity, which sends the British merchant to every grain port in every country, and to the ends of which enables Mark Lane to control the trade wherever grain is exported. In the United States our dealers are ever at the mercy of those who can thus measure the exact capacity of other markets; who buy ever where grain is cheap, and abstain from buying where it is above their inflexible limits, and use in the mean time their vast financial power to compel acquiescence in their terms. The fall in the price of all exportable commodities, which has accompanied the downward tendency, has doubtless produced a corresponding change in the quotations at Mark Lane, as it is stated in their press that they rely chiefly on the United States to furnish this year their requisite supplies. The happening of the failures in Liverpool is consequently due in part to the policy now being pursued by the Treasury Department in hoarding gold. If the Government shall take such measures as will make the fall permanent, which can be done only by contraction, it will have rendered a great service in lowering prices; but if it do fall shall be succeeded by an upward turn, as it must if the credit circulation remains undiminished in volume, the failures which must occur at home from a forced contraction of prices will be repeated hereafter, as gold may be forced up and then thrown through the forbearance or the direct action of the Treasury.

Our credit circulation was made excessive in order to float the loan of 1864, and high prices followed and have been generally maintained; but the excess of issues becomes less apparent from year to year in the proportion in which our industrial wealth are augmented, and in time from the growth of population the amount of our paper issues may not be disproportioned to our enlarged trade. Whether the policy shall be adopted, which is equivalent to contraction by slow degrees, or we shall suddenly be plunged into contraction with its inevitable evils of the prices—fatal to all who are embarrassed with debts—can not be known until the temper of Congress shall be developed.

It would appear to be the part of wisdom, in prices so unsatisfactory to the farming country to them, which can be done only by lopping off an equal proportion of the latter. This would involve a diminution in the quantity of both legal tenders and national bank-notes, inasmuch as the latter are made redeemable in the former, which might be difficult if their present relative proportions to each other were changed. But in lieu of this, plans for new national banks to answer the demand of the West and South, and of new banks on the basis of coin, are proposed and supported by newspapers ordinarily regarded as indicators of coming events. The country is confused by these differences, to which no light is shown by the recent utterances of the Attorney-General and others high in authority.

Their expressions in favor of a return to specie payments, and of the character to show that any matured plan had been arrived at or was in contemplation, and it may be inferred, therefore, that the subject will be referred to the wisdom of Congress, which, as its constituents are composed of the debtor and creditor classes, and as the proportions of the one to the other are well understood, it is feared that no legislation will take place injurious to those of them who constitute the majority.

GEORGE PEABODY'S MONUMENT.

WHEN OLIVER GOLDSMITH lay dead in his humble lodgings, the poor people whom he had befriended sat weeping upon the stairs. And when, in his biography, you come to that point, your own eyes are very likely to moisten; for GOLDSMITH is one of the few authors whom we all personally love. No tribute to his character to our imagination to-day, and none could have been dearer to his own childlike and honest heart, than the silent tears of his humble neighbors. And as we all read the other day, in that graphic and touching letter to the Tribune, the description of GEORGE PEABODY'S funeral, who did not feel that more eloquent than all to him than to be buried in the ancient Abbey, and to lie in the vault of kings, and to be officially mourned by queen and princes and supreme ministers, would have been the respectful presence and tears of the crowds of poor people who thronged about the gates of the Abbey and bought cheap mourning cards and likenesses and a little elegiac pamphlet?

How many rich men, dying in New York to-day, would be followed to their graves to-morrow with the grateful tears of the poor? Can you help contrasting the story of the throng at the gates of the Abbey and the simple ballad with certain performances at the brazen dedication in St. John's Square the other day? Turn back to the newspaper files of that morning. Listen to the editorial chorus, and reflect on it. If they had been celebrating a life and powers consecrated to the noblest purposes, what more could the papers have said? Do we really profoundly honor great riches, or the qualities that amass great riches—or the manner in which the powers and the riches are used? It seems very easy to do so Mr. PEABODY did. He was a bachelor. He had made a great fortune. He gave away millions of dollars, but he did not abridge a single personal comfort. Who could not do this? says every body who reads the story. And echo answers, How many do it? The praise of Mr. PEABODY is that, having a great opportunity, he used it greatly. As the Tribune correspondent says, here was one rich man who "had found the needle's eye." As Mr. GLADSTONE said, "He has shown us how a man can be master of his wealth instead of its slave."

From his stately funeral in the Abbey—funeral too ceremonious for some of his sincerest mourners, the poor people, were not admitted—from the royal vault and the official mourning of a nation his body returns in a British ship of war, and probably with a funeral fleet attending, across the ocean. Boston will receive it with a fitting pomp of grief, and then it will be borne to its grave in Danvers, "PEABODY'S, remember; not a cemetery here—Danvers," were his final words, as he remembered his mother, says one who repeats them. But his monument must still be not only the houses he built for the poor, the education he has given to the ignorant, the libraries and colleges he has endowed, nor only the noble example of beneficence, nor the statues and shafts of marble that will arise, but a certain finer view of human nature—a "calling invaluable at this time in this country—that great riches need not harden a man's heart, nor make him conspicuous merely for selfishness, unscrupulousness, and vulgarity.

ENGLAND IN INDIA.

THE debate upon annexation of foreign territory which is constantly occurring in this country naturally invites consideration of the presence of England in India, and suggests the question whether, on the whole, it has been an advantage to civilization and the world. If the history of the beginning of the British occupation is full of cruelties and tragedies, we may wisely remember that the same is true of settlement in America, and the Indian wars and Quaker persecutions and witchcraft delirium are not pleasant memories to recall. The opening of the Suez Canal again turns the attention of the world to India, and it is worth while to reflect upon a few facts in regard to England in India.

The English first appeared in India as peddlers with their packs, bowing humbly at Mussulman courts, like the dusky traders of Bombay and Rajpoots. But when they drew the sword that has never since been long sheathed it was to defend their factories, erected under the plighted faith of the Great Mogul Government at Delhi, from the attacks of the Nabob of Bengal, a reveled feudatory of the Great Mogul, who, upon the strength of a petty dispute, perpetrated the massacre of the Black Hole. At this time the Emperor of Delhi, the Great Mogul, was an emperor only in name, his personal influence in the Empire, the Nabobship of Onde, Holkar, and Scindia, always despising, frequently dared his power and authority. The whole country was divided and practically ruled was the prey of the wild Mahrattas, a Hindu clan, who, originally driven by the persecutions of AURUNGZEBE to take refuge in the mountains of Ghauts, built a state in Bombay, from which they issued in clouds of light-horse to levy loot or tribute on every territory they could reach. They were the Bashi-Bazouks and freebooters; and to talk of inhumanity in resecuing the population of India out of hands like these is indeed very much like accusing the Good Samaritan of unnecessary violence in taking away to his inn the exhausted victim of thieves and assassins; although, of course, we are not saying that it was not unlawful, and not humanity, that sent England to India.

Bombay, the principal sea-port of Hindostan, was ceded to the British by the Portuguese, who received it from Charles II. of England, CHARLES II. of England. In our own day the principal acquisitions of territory have been Scinde, Pegu, and Oude. Scinde, a Mohammedan country was seized under the flimsiest of pretexts, in fact it was a shameless, cowardly robbery. Those who have not already read the "Life of an Eastern King," published some fifteen years since, will agree with us that any civilized rule must confer blessings on a people that it would be hard to overthrow had so long suffered under their own cruel, licentious, and despotic sovereigns. The Sikhs, who, under their chief RUNJEET SINGH, had been stanch allies of the British, so long as he lived to restrain their audacity, poured across the Sutlej on his death, invading the British territory, and after a short routine of defeat, treaty, breach of faith, renewed hostilities, and final conquest, have since enjoyed the greatest prosperity under the Christian Raj, and were, as is well known, the mainstay of British ascendency in the darkest hour of the mutiny of 1857.

We are apt to think of the natives of India from Peshawur to Cape Comorin as ethnically and physically one people, just as Spain or Holland are populated by one race, whereas the two hundred millions of Hindostan are composed of races as diversified and distinct as the nations of Europe: indeed more so. There are the aboriginal inhabitants, the Tamuls, first invaders of the country, the Aryans, and the Mohammedans—these last the descendants of those warriors who built up the throne of Delhi, and for a time made of Hindostan an empire for their Mogul. But among the aborigines there are many races which are ethnically and philologically divided. There are tribes closely related to the Malay and the Chinese races, and there are others that are wholly unconnected with those branches of the human race. The number of aboriginal dialects spoken through out India has been computed to exceed two hundred, and some of these has any marked affinity to any other.

The Mohammedans, numbering some twenty millions, are scattered all over the country, the Aryans, by which title we refer to the Hindu following some form or other of the Brahminical faith, number one hundred and twenty millions. The British were to retire from Hindostan to-morrow, would the greater number submit again to be enthralled by the bigoted minority? To whom are the British asked to resign their hitherto unchallenged sovereignty?

England has given India the blessing of a stable government. She has built railroads, which already connect the great rivers with fleets of steamers, and, above all, has insured to the humblest of her subjects the peaceable possession of his ancestral vine and fig-tree. That the material prosperity of the country has made rapid strides is shown by the value of her exports, which, in 1834, the last year of the exclusive monopoly of the old East India Company, amounted to only £8,000,000 sterling, but which has increased in 1865 to no less than £68,000,000 sterling, or three hundred and forty millions of dollars.

It is sometimes asserted as a reproach, that England does not attempt to Christianize her Indian subjects. Her conduct has she the occasion in this particular; and wisely does the Government speak when it says, "We can not, we will not interfere with the religion of the people." Any other policy would set the land in a blaze from Cape Comorin to the Himalaya. The Government must stand, aloof. There must not be the slightest suspicion of partiality shown to the convert applicant for public employment, no public favor bestowed on the Christian proselyte as such, unless it desires the bloody scenes of Cawnpore and Delhi to be re-enacted as a warning to each successive generation.

THE REASON WHY.

IN the course of some remarks upon the late Convention of Women held in the Brooklyn Woman's Suffrage Association, the New York Times remarks: "The vast majority of men are really indifferent to the whole matter, and very willingly stand aside to leave women to settle it among themselves." The article is an amplification of this amusing statement, and its moral is, that if women do not vote it is because they do not wish to. But, if the Times really supposes that this is the fact, it should inform itself a little. It imagines that some other women do not vote because other women do not wish to, it would perhaps be useful for the Times as a public teacher, to know that the reason why women do not vote is that men will not permit it. The fundamental law of the State is made by men, and it restricts the political franchise to men. If the Convention would to say that it could carefully establish so immense an exclusion if they were wholly indifferent to it.

The Times repeats the old remark, that when the majority of women shall wish to vote they will be admitted to the suffrage, as a matter of course. But this is not the manner in which any change of fundamental laws are made. Were the newly admitted voters in England polled upon the subject before the Reform bill passed? Were the majority of the colored citizens in the Southern States asked to express a wish before the suffrage was given them? And is it also to be gravely urged that when the majority of women shall say that the women will be a genius for any profession or art should devote themselves to it, they will of course be allowed to do so? The question must be decided upon definite other considerations. It there be no objection to the voting of those women who wish to vote except that certain other women do not wish to, the objection will suddenly shrink, and it becomes the duty of those who make the assertion to show why the disincrimination of one person is unjust to another.

If, as is alleged in the article of which we speak, the present voters, who are men, "stand aside to leave women to settle it among themselves," why do they not remove the restriction? It is idle to speak of awaiting the demand of a majority of women, not only because it is ridiculous that an intelligent woman should be deprived of such a power by the whim of a possibly indifferent and foolish woman, but because there is no way of ascertaining the wishes of such a majority. The only sensible and practicable policy upon the subject—since even the Times concedes that men are indifferent, and that there is no serious objection—is to remove the barrier and let women decide for themselves. If nature, as DR. BUSHNELL argues, protects against their sharing political power—if constentions of sex, family, taste, ridicule, forbid such action upon their part, let us have these truths made manifest.

The Times indeed asserts that ninety-nine women out of every hundred are opposed to their own admission to the suffrage. But it offers no proof that its assertion is true; and if it were true, it is of no more importance as an argument than the assertion of the British Government in 1775 that the American revolutionists were a mere faction, and not the people of the Colonies. MR. WEBSTER, the Times may remember, was fond of saying that the Revolution was fought upon a preamble; and a few resolute and sagacious men with a just preamble carried the independence of the Colonies. If the claim made by some thoughtful women is in itself reasonable, what is the significance of even a greater number of women to do with the question? If it is not desirable that women should share political power, how can it become desirable because more or less of them wish it?

THE attention of those of our readers seeking safe and remunerative investments is invited to the advertisement of Messrs. FISK & HATCH on the last page of this Number of the Weekly. The mere fact that these gentlemen recommend a "security" is evidence of its soundness.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE Secretary of State has informed Hon. John Lothrop Motley, Minister of the Special Committee on Reparation Interests, that he has instructed all our Consuls, including those in the Levant, Jamaica, and Brazil, to send forthwith the Committee with the information desired by them relative to adjudications for depredations where they are located.

In accordance with instructions received from the President, United States District-Attorney Pierrepont, on Saturday last, filed the libel against the piratical boats which the Spanish Government have had built in this country, and which are now ready for Spanish sea. It is reported that the occasion of this proceeding is that the Cuban sympathizers with the insurgents might attempt their destruction. The ground of the libel of information seems to be that the Constitution of the United States forbids the building of vessels of war for a foreign power. The case comes before the District-Court December 14.

JAMES B. SWAIN, a well-known journalist, was shot by Daniel M'Farland in the Tribune consulting-room on the evening of November 28. Jealousy is supposed to have been the motive of the act.

A terrible explosion on the evening of November 26 broke up the Hudson County Jail, in Jersey City, and the Armory. An explosion occurred which made a long break in the south wall, and the prisoners fled across lots.

The new Haytien Minister was formally presented to President Grant November 22, and the usual courtesies were exchanged.

A petition is to be presented to Congress early in the next session praying that bituminous coal may be accorded to Cuba, and her independence recognized. The petition is to be signed by citizens of this country, and will, it is expected, have 40,000 before the assembling of Congress.

The completion of the "New York, Flushing, and North Side Railroad," from Flushing to Port Jefferson, Long Island, was celebrated, November 17, with great eclat by the people living on the line of the road, who turned out en masse to welcome the first train which passed over it. There was a display of fire-works, stone, bearing an excursion party, numbering a hundred gentlemen of note, from City Hall, to Flushing. The completion of this road opens up the thriving manufacturing villages of Flushing and Whitestone to an easy and rapid communication with New York, rendering them favorable resorts of access than Newark and other cities in New Jersey of far less natural advantages, which have grown to be large manufacturing towns by means of railroad facilities. The credit of this new enterprise is due principally to the citizens of Flushing, who have built the railroad without any outside assistance, at a cost of nearly a million dollars. Chief among the promoters of the undertaking were MR. C. DEMILLE, now President of the road, DR. JOHN Judd, and MR. John D. Locke. Longchidge's patent locomotive was employed, and every engine, car, and every thing connected with the road is as perfect as the means and appliances of modern invention pretty well permit. The result is, that it is beyond question the most direct and the easiest riding railway that runs out of New York.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Republican Deputies who recently absented themselves from the Spanish Cortes have returned in a body November 27. The Spanish Government announces that it intends to restore the provincial guarantees lately abrogated on account of the insurrection in Cuba. The Cortes have passed by a vote of 91 censure against the Government for arbitrary use of power in the municipal law of Madrid.

The Spanish Cortes has passed a vote of thanks to D. M. Sickles, United States Minister to Spain. Canal. A draft of a Constitution for Porto Rico was read in the Cortes November 24, forbidding the establishment of separation, and excluding slaves from all rights of citizenship.

Within three weeks over 25,000 volunteers were shipped from Spain to Cuba.

General Dulce recently Captain-General of Cuba, died November 26, aged 66.

Despatches from Rome state that the members of the Ecumenical Council will meet at the Vatican on the 8th of December next, and, at the anniversary of the opening of the Council, the Pope will announce the opening of the Council.

The completion of the Suez Canal, it seems, has already affected the price of freights and passage-money. Ships around the Cape of Good Hope. A serious loss to the latter.

M. de Lesseps, the chief engineer of the Suez Canal, has published a letter in which the unfavorable rumors which have recently circulated about that great enterprise are denied, and he points to the fact that in ten days no less than fifty vessels sailed safely through the canal.

The Sultan protests against the act of the Viceroy of Egypt in proclaiming the neutrality of the Suez Canal as a trespass on his sovereignty.

The most significant result of the recent supplementary elections in Paris was the return of M. Rochefort by 4,845 votes against 3,354. There was a large majority in favor of the Government.

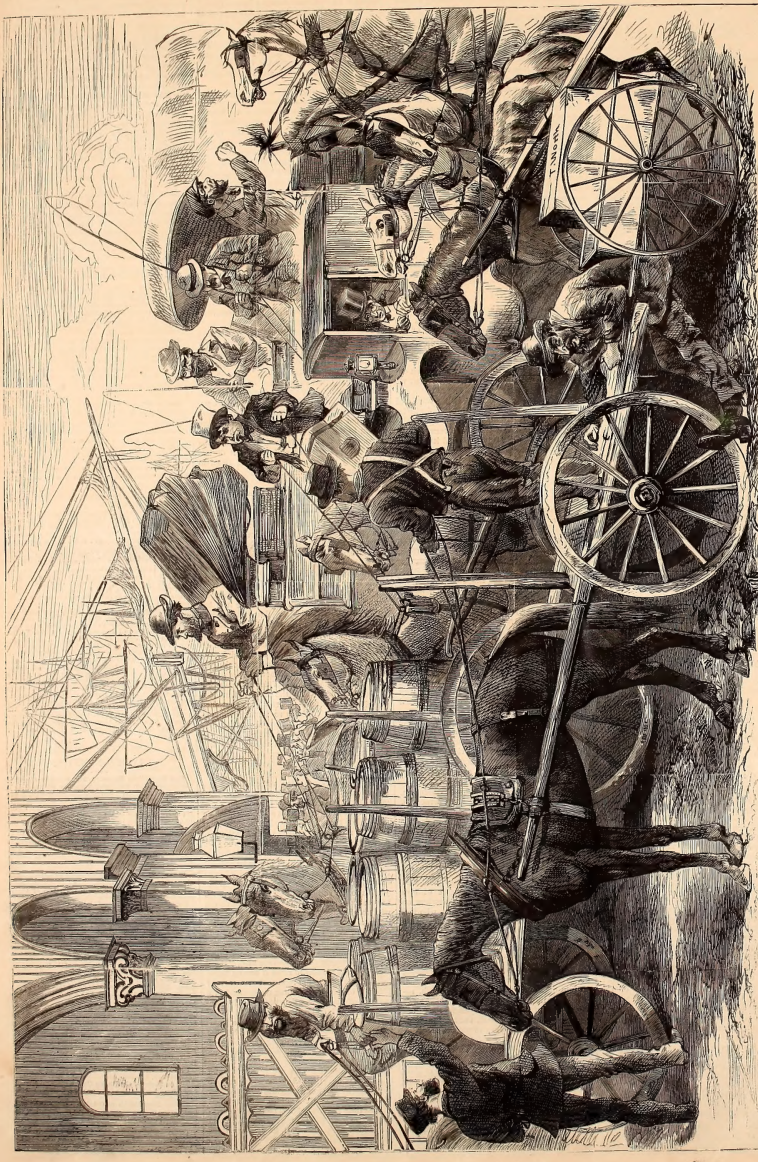
Mr. Bullingame and the Chinese Embassy are at Berlin.

United States Consul-General Plumb, at Havana, has resigned.

The members of the Italian Cabinet have resigned, and a new Ministry has been organized under General Menabrea.

Advices from Manilla of October 1 report a violent earthquake at that port which extended through the Philippine group of islands. At Manilla eight lives were lost.

The recent election in Newfoundland has resulted unfavorably for the opponents of Confederation. The full returns show that twenty-one Anti-Confederates and nine Confederates have been elected.



JAM AT THE FERRY GATE.—[SKETCHED BY THOMAS WORTH.]

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

THE PLAN.

SHE took his hand, and began with all the art of persuasion she possessed.

"One question, Geoffrey, before I say what I want to say. Lady Lundie has invited you to stay at Windygates. Is you accept her invitation? or do you go back to your brother's in the evening?

"I can't go back in the evening—they've yet a visitor into my room. I'm obliged to stay here. My brother has done it on purpose. Julius helps me when I'm hard up—and bullies me afterward. He has sent me here, on duty for the family. Somebody must be civil to Lady Lundie—and I'm the sacrifice."

She took him up at his last word. "Don't make the sacrifice," she said. "Apologize to Lady Lundie, and say you are obliged to go back."

"Why?"

"Because we must both leave this place today."

There was a double objection to that. If he left Lady Lundie's, he would fail to establish a future pecuniary claim on his brother's indulgence. And if he left with Anne, the eyes of the world would see them, and the whispers of the world might come to his father's ears.

"If we go away together," he said, "good-by to my prospects, and yours too."

"I don't mean that we shall leave together," she explained. "We will leave separately—and I will go first."

"There will be a hue and cry after you, when you are missed."

"There will be a dance when the croquet is over. I don't dance—and I shall not be missed. There will be time, and opportunity, to get to my own room. I shall leave a letter there for Lady Lundie, and a letter"—her voice trembled for a moment—"and a letter for Blanche. Don't interrupt me! I have thought of this, as I have thought of every thing else. The confession I shall make will be the truth in a few hours, if it's not the truth now. My letters will say I am privately married, and called away unexpectedly to join my husband. There will be a scandal in the house, I know. But there will be no excuse for sending after me, and I am under my husband's protection. So far as you are personally concerned there are no discoveries to fear—and nothing which it is not perfectly safe and perfectly easy to do. Wait here an hour after I have gone to save appearances; and then follow me."

"Follow you?" interposed Geoffrey. "Where?"

She drew her chair nearer to him, and whispered the next words in her ear.

"To a lonely little mountain inn—four miles from this.

"An inn!"

"Why not?"

"An inn in a public place."

A movement of natural impatience escaped her—but she controlled herself, and went on as quietly as before:

"The place I mean is the loneliest place in the neighborhood. You have no prying eyes to dread there. I have picked it out expressly for that reason. It's away from the railway; it's away from the high-road: it's kept by a decent, respectable Scotchwoman—"

"Decent, respectable Scotchwomen who keep inns," interposed Geoffrey, "don't cotton to young ladies who are traveling alone. The landlady won't receive you."

It was a well-aimed objection—but it missed the mark. A woman bent on her marriage is a woman who has met the objections of the whole world, single-handed, and refute them all.

"I have provided for every thing," she said; "and I have provided for that. I shall pass the landlady I am on my wedding-trip. I shall say my husband is sight-seeing, on foot, among the mountains in the neighborhood—"

"She is sure to believe that!" said Geoffrey.

"She is sure to disbelieve it, if you like. Let her! She will have only to appear, and to ask for your wife—and there is my story proved to be true! She may be the most suspicious woman living, as far as I am alone with her. The moment you join me, you set her suspicions at rest. Leave that to me, my part. My part is the hard one. Will you do yours?"

It was impossible to say No: she had fairly cut the ground from under his feet. He shifted his ground. Any thing rather than say Yes!

"I suppose you know how we are to be married?" he asked. "All I can say—I can't do it."

"You do!" she retorted. "You know that we are in Scotland. You know that there are neither formalities, nor delays, in a Scotch marriage, here. The plan I have proposed to you secures my being received at the inn, and makes it easy and natural for you to join me there afterward. The rest is in our own hands. A man and a woman who wish to be married (in Scotland) have only to secure the necessary witnesses and the thing is done. If the landlady chooses to resent the suspicions practiced on her, after that, the landlady may do as she pleases. We shall have gained our object in spite of her—and, what is more, we shall have gained it without risk to you."

"Don't lay it all on my shoulders," Geoffrey rejoined. "You women go headlong at every thing. Say we are married. We must separate afterward—or how are we to keep it a secret?"

"Certainly. You will go back, of course, to your brother's house, as if nothing had happened."

"And what is to become of you?"

"I shall go to London."

"What are you to do in London?"

"Haven't I already told you that I have thought of every thing? When I get to London I shall apply to some of my mother's old friends—friends of hers in the time when she was a musician. Every body tells me I have a voice—if I had only cultivated it. I will cultivate it! I can live, and live respectably, as a concert singer. I have saved money enough to support me, while I am learning—and my mother's friends will help me, for her sake."

So, in the new life that she was marking out, she was the unconscious imitator of those in herself the life of her mother before her. Here was the mother's career as a public singer, chosen (in spite of all efforts to prevent it) by the child! Here (though with other motives, and under other circumstances) was the mother's irregular marriage in Ireland, on the point of being followed by the daughter's irregular marriage in Scotland! And here, stranger still, was the man who was answerable for it—the son of the man who had found the flaw in the Irish marriage, and had shown the way by which her mother was thrown on the world! "My fate is my second self. She is not called by her father's name; she is called by mine. She is Anne Silvester as I was. Will she end like Me?"—The answer to those words—the last words that had trembled on the living mother's lips—was coming fast. Through the chances and changes of many years, the future was pressing near—and Anne Silvester stood on the brink of it.

"Well?" she resumed. "Are you at the end of your objections? Can you give me a plain answer at last?"

"HE TOUCHED THE KNOB OF HIS CANE, AND HELPED HIMSELF, WITH INFINITE ZEST AND ENJOYMENT, TO A PINCH OF SNUFF."

No! He had another objection ready as the words passed her lips.

"Suppose the witnesses at the inn happen to know me?" he said. "Suppose it comes to my father's ears in that way?"

"Suppose you drive me to my ruin?" she retorted, starting to her feet. "Your father shall know the truth, in that case—I swear it!"

He rose, on his side, and drew back from her. She followed him up. There was a clapping of hands, at the same moment, on the lawn. Somebody had evidently made a brilliant stroke which promised to decide the game. There was no security now that Blanche might not return again. There was every prospect, the game being over, that Lady Lundie would be free. Anne brought the interview to its crisis, without wasting a moment more.

"Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn," she said. "You have bargained for a private marriage, and I have consented. Are you, or are you not, ready to marry me on your own terms?"

"Give me a minute to think!"

"Not an instant. Once for all, is it Yes, or No?"

He couldn't say "Yes," even then. But he said what was equivalent to it. He asked, savagely, "Where is the inn?"

She put her arm in his, and whispered, rapidly, "Take the path to the right that leads to the railway. Follow the path over the moor, and the sheep-track up the hill. The first house you come to after that is the inn. You understand?"

He nodded his head, with a sullen frown, and took his pipe out of his pocket again.

"Let it alone this time," he said, meeting her eye. "My mind's upset. When a man's mind's upset, a man must smoke. What's the name of the place?"

"Craig Fernie."

"Who am I to ask for at the door?"

"For your wife."

"Suppose they want you to give your name when you get there?"

"If I must give a name, I shall call myself Mrs., instead of Miss, Silvester. But I shall do my best to avoid giving any name. And you will do your best to avoid making a mistake, by only saking for me as your wife. Is there any thing else you want to know?"

"Yes."

"Be quick about it! What is it?"

"How am I to know you have got away from here?"

"If you don't hear from me in half an hour from the time when I have left you, you may be sure I have got away. Hush!"

Two voices, in conversation, were audible at the bottom of the steps—Lady Lundie's voice and Sir Patrick's. Anne pointed to the door in the back wall of the summer-house. She had just pulled it to again, after Geoffrey had passed through it, when Lady Lundie and Sir Patrick appeared at the top of the steps.

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

THE SUITOR.

LADY LUNDIE pointed significantly to the door, and addressed herself to Sir Patrick's private ear.

"Observe!" she said. "Miss Silvester has just got rid of somebody."

Sir Patrick deliberately looked in the wrong direction, and (in the politest possible manner) observed—nothing.

Lady Lundie advanced into the summer-house. Suspicious hatred of the governess was written legibly in every line of her face. Suspicious distrust of the governess's illness spoke plainly in every tone of her voice.

"May I inquire, Miss Silvester, if your sufferings are relieved by fresh air?"

"I am no better, Lady Lundie."

"I beg your pardon!"

"I said I was no better."

"You appear to be able to stand up. When I am ill, I am not so fortunate. I am compelled to lie down."

Mrs., instead of Miss, Silvester. But I shall do my best to avoid giving any name. And you will do your best to avoid making a mistake, by only saking for me as your wife. Is there any thing else you want to know?"

"Yes."

"Be quick about it! What is it?"

"How am I to know you have got away from here?"

"If you don't hear from me in half an hour from the time when I have left you, you may be sure I have got away. Hush!"

Two voices, in conversation, were audible at the bottom of the steps—Lady Lundie's voice and Sir Patrick's. Anne pointed to the door in the back wall of the summer-house. She had just pulled it to again, after Geoffrey had passed through it, when Lady Lundie and Sir Patrick appeared at the top of the steps.

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

THE SUITOR.

LADY LUNDIE pointed significantly to the door, and addressed herself to Sir Patrick's private ear.

"Observe!" she said. "Miss Silvester has just got rid of somebody."

Sir Patrick deliberately looked in the wrong direction, and (in the politest possible manner) observed—nothing.

Lady Lundie advanced into the summer-house. Suspicious hatred of the governess was written legibly in every line of her face. Suspicious distrust of the governess's illness spoke plainly in every tone of her voice.

"May I inquire, Miss Silvester, if your sufferings are relieved by fresh air?"

"I am no better, Lady Lundie."

"I beg your pardon!"

"I said I was no better."

"You appear to be able to stand up. When I am ill, I am not so fortunate. I am compelled to lie down."

returned Blanche. "Is she in there with Anne? Is Anne better?"

Lady Lundie forthwith appeared, and took the answer to that inquiry on herself.

Miss Silvester has retired to her room. Miss Silvester persists in being ill. Have you noticed, Sir Patrick, that these half-bred sort of people are almost invariably rude when they are ill?

Blanche's bright face flushed up. "If you think Anne a half-bred person, Lady Lundie, you stand alone in your opinion. My uncle doesn't agree with you, I'm sure."

Sir Patrick's interest in the first quadrille became almost painful to see. "Do tell me, my dear, when is the dancing going to begin?"

"The sooner the better," interposed Lady Lundie; "before Blanche picks another quarrel with me on the subject of Miss Silvester."

Blanche looked at her uncle. "Begin! begin! Don't lose time!" cried the ardent Patrick, pointing toward the house with his cane.

"Curiously enough, I say thing that you wish!" With that parting shot at her step-mother, Blanche withdrew. Arnold, who had thus far waited in silence at the foot of the steps, looked appealingly at Sir Patrick. The train which was to take him to his newly inherited property would start in less than an hour; and he had not presented himself to Blanche's guardian in the character of Blanche's suitor yet! Sir Patrick's indifference to the domestic claims on him—claims of persons who loved, and claims of persons who hated, it didn't matter which—remained perfectly unassailable. There he stood, poised on his cane, humming an old Scotch air. And there was Lady Lundie, resolute not to leave him till she had seen the governess with her eyes and judged the governess with her mind. She returned to the subject of Sir Patrick's hobby, humming at the top of the steps, and of Arnold, waiting at the bottom. (Her enemies said, "No wonder poor Mrs. Thomas died in a few months after his marriage!" And, oh dear me, our enemies are sometimes right!)

"I must once more remind you, Sir Patrick, that I have serious reason to doubt whether Miss Silvester is a fit companion for Blanche. My governess has something on her mind. She has fits of crying in private. She is up and walking about her room when she ought to be asleep. She posts her own letters—and, she has lately been excessively insolent to Me. There is something wrong. I must take some steps in the matter—and it is only proper that I should do so with your sanction, as head of the family."

"Consider me as abdicating my position, Lady Lundie, in your favor."

"Sir Patrick, I beg you to observe that I am speaking seriously, and that I expect a serious reply."

"My good lady, ask me for any thing else and it is at your service. I have used up my serious reply' since I gave up practice at the Scottish Bar. At my age," added Sir Patrick, cunningly drifting into generalities, "nothing is serious —except Indigestion. I say, with the philosopher, 'Life is a comedy to those who think, and a tragedy to those who feel.'" He took his sister-in-law's hand, and kissed it. "Dear Lady Lundie, why feel?"

Lady Lundie, who had never "felt" in her life, appeared perversely determined to feel, on this occasion. She was offended—and she showed it plainly.

"When you are next called on, Sir Patrick, to judge of Miss Silvester's conduct, be so kind, unless I am entirely mistaken, you will find yourself compelled to consider it as something beyond a joke." With those words, she walked out of the summer-house—and so forwarded Arnold's interests by leaving Blanche's guardian alone at last.

It was an excellent opportunity. The guests were safe in the house—there was no interruption to be feared. Arnold showed himself. Sir Patrick (perfectly undisturbed by Lady Lundie's parting speech) sat down in the summer-house, without wondering why the young fellow asked himself a question founded on profound observation of the female sex. "Were there ever two women in a quarrel between them, Patrick?" thought the old gentleman, "who didn't want to drag a man into it? Let them drag me in, if they can!"

Arnold advanced a step, and respectfully announced himself. "I hope I am not in the way, Sir Patrick?"

"In the way? of course not! Bless my soul, how serious the boy looks!. Are you going to propose to me at the head of the croquet-lawn?"

It was exactly what Arnold was about to do. But it was plain that if he submitted it just then Sir Patrick for one would not be prepared to do any thing but laugh. He answered cautiously, "I asked leave to consult you in private, Sir; and you kindly told me you would see me the opportunity before I left Windygates?"

"Ay! ay! to be sure. I remember. We have both passed in the serious business of croquet at the time—and it was doubtful which of us did that business most clumsily. Well, here is the opportunity; and here am I, with all my worldly experience, at your service. I have only been cautious to say, that I don't appeal to me as the head of the family.' My resignation is in Lady Lundie's hands."

He was, as usual, half in jest, half in earnest. The wry twist of humor showed itself at the corners of his lips. Arnold was at a loss how to approach Sir Patrick on the subject of his suit without reminding him of his domestic responsibilities on the one hand, and without setting himself up as a target for the shafts of Sir Patrick's wit on the other. In this difficulty, he committed a mistake at the outset. He hesitated.

"Don't hurry yourself," said Sir Patrick. "Collect your ideas. I can wait! I can wait!" Arnold collected his ideas—and committed a second mistake. He determined on feeling his way cautiously at first. Under the circumstances (and with such a man as he had now to deal with), it was perhaps the rashest resolution at which he could possibly have arrived—it was the mouse attempting to outmaneuvre the cat.

"You have been very kind, Sir, in offering me the benefit of your experience," he began. "I want a word of advice."

"Suppose you take it sitting?" suggested Sir Patrick. "Get a chair." His sharp eyes followed Arnold with an expression of mingled enjoyment. "About my advice?" he thought. "The young humbug wants nothing of the sort —he wants my niece."

Arnold sat down under Sir Patrick's eye, with a well-founded suspicion that he was destined to suffer, before he got up again, under Sir Patrick's tongue.

"I am only a young man," he went on, moving uneasily in his chair; "and I am beginning a new life—"

"Any thing wrong with the chair?" asked Sir Patrick. "Begin your new life comfortably, and get another."

"There's nothing wrong with the chair, Sir. Would you—"

"Would I keep the chair, in that case? Certainly."

"I mean, would you advise me—"

"My good fellow, I'm waiting to advise you. (I'm sure there's something wrong with that chair. Why be ashamed about it? Why not get another?)"

Please don't notice the chair, Sir Patrick—you put me out. I want—in short—perhaps it's a curious question—"

"I can't say till I have heard it," remarked Sir Patrick. "However, we will admit it, for form's sake, if you like. Say it's a curious question. The longer it is more original it will be, I will help you. Say it's the most extraordinary question that ever was put, since the beginning of the world. Now, then, what is the question?"

"It's this!" Arnold burst out, desperately. "I want to be married!"

"That isn't a question," objected Sir Patrick. "It's an assertion. You say, I want to be married. And I say, Just so! And there's an end of it."

Arnold's head began to whirl. "Would you advise me to get married, Sir?" he said, piteously. "I don't want I mean—"

"Oh! That's the object of the present interview, is it? Would I advise you to marry, eh?"

(Having caught the mouse by this time, the cat lifted his paw and let the heedless little creature breathe again. Sir Patrick's manner suddenly fresh from any slight signs of impatience which it might have hitherto shown, and became as pleasantly easy and confidential as a humorist could be. He touched the knob of his cane, and helped himself, with infinite zest and enjoyment, to a pinch of snuff.)

"Would I advise you to marry?" repeated Sir Patrick. "Two courses are open to us, Mr. Arnold, in considering that question. We may put it briefly, or we may put it at great length. Which am for putting it briefly. What do you say?"

"What you say, Sir Patrick."

"Very good. May I begin by making an inquiry relating to your past life?"

"Certainly!"

"Very good again. When you were in the merchant service, did you ever have any experience in buying provisions ashore?"

Arnold stared. If any relation existed between that question and the subject in hand it was an impenetrable relation to him. He answered, in unconcealed bewilderment,

"Plenty of experience, Sir."

"I'm coming to the point," pursued Sir Patrick. "Don't be astonished. I'm coming to the point. What did you think of your meat sugar when you bought it at the grocer's?"

"Think?" repeated Arnold. "Why, I thought it was meat sugar, to be sure!"

"Marry, by all means!" cried Sir Patrick. "You are one of the few men who can try that experiment with a fair chance of success."

The suddenness of the answer fairly took away Arnold's breath. There was something perfectly electrical in the brevity of his veritable friend. He stared harder than ever.

"Don't you understand me?" asked Sir Patrick.

"I don't understand what the moist sugar has got to do with it, Sir."

"You don't see that?"

"Not a bit!"

"Then I'll show you," said Sir Patrick, crossing his legs, and setting in comfortably for a good talk. "You go to the tea-shop, and get your moist sugar. You take it on the understanding that it is moist sugar. But it isn't any thing of the sort. It's a compound of adulterations made up to look like moist sugar. You shut your eyes to the awkward fact, and swallow your adulterated mess in various articles of food; and you and your sugar get on together in this way as well as you can. Do you follow me, so far?"

Yes. Arnold (quite in the dark) followed, so far.

"Very good," pursued Sir Patrick. "You go to the marriage-shop, and get a wife. You take her on the understanding—let us say—that she has lovely yellow hair, that she has an exquisite complexion, that her figure is the perfection of plumpness, and that she is just tall enough to carry the plumpness off. You bring her home, and you discover that it's the old story of the sugar over again. Your wife is an adulterated article. Her lovely yellow hair is—dye. Her exquisite skin is—pearl powder. Her plumpness is—padding. And three inches of her height are—in the boot-maker's heels. Shut your eyes, and swallow your adulterated sugar—and you swallow your adulterated sugar—and, I tell you again, you are one of the few men who can try the marriage experiment with a fair chance of success."

With that he uncrossed his legs again, and looked hard at Arnold. Arnold read the lesson, at last, in the right way. He gave up the hopeless attempt to circumvent Sir Patrick, and—come what might of it—dashed at a direct allusion to Sir Patrick's niece.

"That may be all very true, Sir, of some young ladies," he said. "There is one I know of, who is nearly related to you, and who doesn't deserve what you have said of the rest of them."

This was coming to the point. Sir Patrick showed his approval of Arnold's frankness by coming to the point himself, as readily as his own whimsical humor would let him.

"Is this female phenomenon my niece?" he inquired.

"Yes, Sir Patrick."

"May I ask how you know that my niece is not an adulterated article, like the rest of them?"

Arnold's indignation loosened the last restraint that held Arnold's tongue. He exploded in the three words which mean three volumes in every circulating library in the kingdom.

"I love her."

Sir Patrick sat back in his chair, and stretched out his legs luxuriously.

"That's the most convincing answer I ever heard in my life," he said.

"I'm in earnest!" cried Arnold, reckless by this time of every consideration but one. "Put me to the test, Sir! put me to the test!"

"Oh, very well. The test is easy to find." He looked at Arnold, with the irrepressible humor twinkling merrily in his eyes, and twitching sharply at the corners of his lips. "My niece," he said, in a beautiful complexion. Do you believe in her complexion?"

"There's a beautiful sky above our heads," returned Arnold. "I believe in the sky."

"Do you?" retorted Sir Patrick. "You were evidently never intended for a lawyer. My niece has an immense quantity of hair. Are you convinced that it all grows on her head?"

"I'd pay other women a head to produce the like of it!"

"My dear Arnold, you greatly underrate the existing resources of the trade in hair! Look into the shop-windows. When you next go in London pray look into the shop-windows. Do you ever, by any chance, think of my niece's figure?"

"Oh, come! there can't be any doubt about that! A young man, with eyes in his head, can see it's the loveliest figure in the world."

Sir Patrick laughed softly, and crossed his legs again.

"My good fellow, of course it is! The loveliest figure in the world—and the most beautiful complexion in the world. At a rough guess, there are forty ladies at this town party. Every one of them possesses a beautiful figure. Every one of them possesses a beautiful complexion. And yet, when it's particularly seductive, you may swear it comes from Paris. Why, how you stare! I asked you, just now, whether you thought of my niece's figure, I meant—how much of it comes from Nature, and how much of it comes from the Shop? I don't know, mind. Do you?"

"I'll take my oath to every inch of it!"

"Shop?"

"Nature!"

Sir Patrick rose to his feet; his satirical humor was silenced at last.

"If ever I am a son," he thought to himself, "that son shall go to sea!" He took Arnold's arm, as a preliminary to putting an end to his misapprehensions. "If I am serious about any thing," he resumed, "it's time to be serious with you. I am convinced of the sincerity of your attachment. All I know of you is in your favor, and your birth and position are beyond dispute. If you have Blanche's consent, you have mine." Arnold attempted to express his gratitude. Sir Patrick, declining to hear him, went on. "And remember this, in the future. When you next go to your sugar that I can give you, ask for it moist. Don't attempt to mystify me on the next occasion, and I will endeavor to return the mystify you. There, that's understood. Now about this journey of yours to see your ex-Rector. Any time for duties, Master Arnold, as well as its rights. The time is fast approaching when its rights will be disputed, if its duties are not performed. I've got a new interest in you, and I mean to see that you do your duty. It's settled you are to leave Windygates to-day. Is it arranged how you are to go?"

"Yes, Sir Patrick. Lady Lundie has kindly ordered the gig to take me to the station, in time for the next train."

"When are you to be ready?"

Arnold looked at his watch. "In a quarter of an hour."

"Very good. Mind you are ready. Stop a minute! you will have plenty of time to speak to Blanche when I have done with you. You don't appear to me to be sufficiently anxious about seeing your own property."

"I am not very anxious to leave Blanche, Sir —that's the truth of it."

"Never mind Blanche. Blanche is not business. They both begin with a B—and that's the only connection between them. I hear you have got one of the best livings in the west part of Scotland. How long are you going to stay in it?"

"I have arranged (as I have already told you, Sir) to return to Windygates in the end of the morrow."

"What! Here is a man with a palace waiting to receive him—and he is only going to stop one clear day in it!"

"I am not going to stop in it at all, Sir Patrick—I am going to stay with the steward. I'm only wanted to be present to-morrow at a dinner to my tenantry—and, when that's over, there's nothing in the world to prevent my coming back here. The steward himself told me so in his last letter."

"Oh, if the steward told you so, of course there is nothing more to be said!"

"Don't object to my coming back! pray don't, Sir Patrick! I'll promise to live in my new house, when I have got Blanche to live in it with me. If you won't mind, I'll go and tell her at once that it all belongs to her as well as to me."

"Gently! gently! you talk as if you were married to her already!"

"It's as good as done, Sir! Where's the difficulty in the way now?"

As he asked the question the shadow of some third person, appeared on the side of the summer-house, was thrown forward on the open sunlit space at the top of the steps. In a moment more the shadow was followed by the substance—in the shape of a groom in his rising livery. The man was plainly a stranger to the place. He entered, and touched his hat, when he saw the two gentlemen in the summer-house.

"What do you want?" asked Sir Patrick.

"I beg your pardon, Sir; I was sent by my master—"

"Who is your master?"

"The Honorable Mr. Delamayn, Sir."

"Do you mean Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn?" asked Arnold.

"No, Sir. Mr. Geoffrey's brother—Mr. Julius. I have ridden over from the house, Sir, with a message from my master to Mr. Geoffrey."

"Can't you find him?"

"They told me I should find him hereabouts, Sir. But I'm a stranger, and don't rightly know where to look." He stopped, and took a card out of his hat. "My master said it was very important I should deliver this immediately. Would you be pleased to tell me, gentlemen, if you happen to know where Mr. Geoffrey is?"

Arnold turned to Sir Patrick. "I haven't seen him, Sir."

"I have smelt him," answered Sir Patrick, "ever since I have been in the summer-house. There is a disagreeable smell of tobacco in the air—suggestive (disagreeably suggestive to my mind) of your friend, Mr. Delamayn."

Arnold laughed, and stepped outside the summer-house.

"If you are right, Sir Patrick, we will find him at once." He looked around, and shouted, "Geoffrey!"

A voice from the rose-garden shouted back, "Hallo!"

"You're wanted. Come here!"

Geoffrey appeared, sauntering doggedly, with his pipe in his mouth, and his hands in his pockets.

"Who wants me?"

"A groom—from your brother."

That answer appeared to electrify the lounging and lazy athlete. Geoffrey hurried, with eager speed, to the summer-house. He addressed the groom before the man had time to speak. With horror and dismay in his face, he exclaimed—

"By Jupiter! Ratcatcher has relapsed!"

Sir Patrick and Arnold looked at each other in blank amazement.

"The best horse in my brother's stables!" cried Geoffrey, explaining and explaining to them, in a breath. "I left written directions with the coachman; I measured out his physic with my own hands," said Geoffrey, in a voice broken by emotion—"I bled him myself, last night.

"I beg your pardon, Sir—" began the groom.

"What's the use of begging my pardon? You're a pack of infernal fools! Where's your master? I'll break every bone in your body in the coachman's skin! Where's your horse?"

"If you please, Sir, it isn't Ratcatcher. Ratcatcher's all right, Sir."

"Ratcatcher's all right? Then what the devil is it?"

"It's a message, Sir."

"About what?"

"About my lord."

"Oh! About my father?" He took out his handkerchief, and passed it over his forehead, with a deep gasp of relief. "I thought it was Ratcatcher," he said, looking at Arnold, with a smile. He put his pipe into his mouth, and rekindled the fragrant fumes of the tobacco. "Well?" he went on, when the pipe was in working order, and his voice was composed again. "What's up with my father?"

"A telegram from London, Sir. Bad news of my lord."

The man produced his master's card.

Geoffrey read on it (written in his brother's handwriting) three words:

"I have only a moment to scribble a line on my card. Our father is dangerously ill—his lawyer has been sent for. Come with me to London by the first train. Meet at the junction."

Without a word to any one of the three persons present, all silently looking at him, Geoffrey consulted his watch. Anne had told him to wait half an hour, and to expect that time had gone by before he rose from her in that time. The interval had passed—and no communication of any sort had reached him. The flight from the house had been safely accomplished. Anne Silvester was, at that moment, on her way to the mountain inn.

MY NEIGHBORS.

—Like a sick man's dreams,
Varies all shapes, and mixes all extremes.
PRAMORE.

In a convalescent state, after a serious illness that had rendered me wholly incapable of mental exertion, I sat in my arm chair by the fire, while on the table near me lay a volume of Eugene Sue's "Wandering Jew," and another contained a portion of the history of the renowned Pantagruel. I had been dreamily turning over the leaves of both, and had been much impressed by a chapter in the one last named, that described how Alcofribas (as Rabelais called himself) ascended the giant's outstretched tongue, and thus entering his mouth, discovered therein a new world, the inhabitants of which had the vagnest notions of every thing that passed beyond their own sphere.

"Is not every one in London," I asked myself, "much in the condition of the man who planted cabbages within the precincts of Pantagruel's jaws, with only had the faintest knowledge that there was another world illumined by a sun and moon? I have lived at least six years in this house, and what do I know of a certain Miss Thuglegh, who lives next door, and of whose ugly mug I should never have heard, had not a letter, directed to her, been brought to me accidentally by the postman? She has never left home at any time when I have been looking out of window; she is never in her garden, which, by-the-way, is in a most neglected state. I am only reminded by her existence by an occasional noise. In London and its suburbs, save by some rare accident, is not every one in pretty nearly the same position as I am with respect to Miss Thuglegh? I know rather more of the man who is her next-door neighbor on the other side, and whose name seems to be Bubbleworth, for the artist who comes to shave me tells me that he has his hair cut every morning, ostensibly intending to hold up a good example before my eyes. But knowledge like this is the very reverse of exhaustive."

The pursuit of this foolish train or thought had caused me to rise from my chair, and I was staring vacantly into the glass on the mantelpiece when my attention was suddenly arrested by a remarkable phenomenon. The movements of the reflected figure did not correspond to my own. If I stirred it remained still, or moved in a different manner. The eyes alone, which were fixed on mine, had the appearance of life or reflection. Presently, my own arms being folded, the figure extended one of its hands. I extended a hand too, and the glass, suddenly starting forward, grasped it firmly. Instinctively I endeavored to extricate myself, but so far was I from accomplishing that I found myself seated on the glass. The figure, then, was a vanity, and a very muscular reality too, for I could not resist it. Without knowing how, I was soon evident that there was no glass at all, but an aperture in the wall surrounded by a gilt frame, behind which the wall corresponded to my own.

The position was alarming.

On—On I was pulled, and for a few seconds found myself enveloped in darkness. I seemed conscious of nothing but vacuity, when suddenly the grasp ceased, and I was once more in the glass. I was in a cabin, opposite to a venerable old lady, whose white hair, neatly parted from the middle of each forehead, was surmounted by the most respectable of caps. She was absorbed in the perusal of a large book, which lay open before her. The reading, however, was relieved by the monotony of the walls were which broke the covered with pictures of birds, and placed some old books, two or three shells, and several articles of Oriental fashion. But the most singular object was a hideous Indian idol, like those that represent the horrible wife of Siva, which stood in a corner, and before which was a prismatic stone, exactly similar in its proportions to the room.

"Well, George," said the old lady, suddenly raising her eyes from her book, and looking at me full in the face, "so you have condescended to visit me at last!"

Though my name is not George, I felt that I was the person addressed, so I began politely to deny the condescension.

"Pooh-pooh! never mind compliments. You see here, and you see me. I am content. I can you are rather astonished at the appearance of my room. It is somewhat close; but then it's very snug, and quite good enough for a single body like me."

"Unique in its structure, at any rate," I said, endeavoring to collect myself. "I can rather curious to know how one enters it."

"Indeed, I wonder at that, when you yourself could not enter way so easily," she replied, with a slight laugh

I felt uneasy, for I did not care to describe my passage through the glass; but the old lady did not seem anxious for an explanation, since she immediately added, "I suppose you have also immediately added, "I suppose you have also immediately added, "I suppose you have also when I performed the sacrifice with my own hands."

"Atrocious wretch!—" I began.

"Hoity-toity!" interposed the old lady. "Don't let us lose our tempers."

And really when I looked at her calm face, I felt that wrath was impossible. She was some harmless lunatic, who owned to crimes she had never committed.

"I bore the boy no ill-will," she proceeded; "he was as well-behaved a lad as one would wish to see. I would gladly have given the preference to a mischievous little vagabond, who rings my bell regularly every Saturday afternoon, in collection, I suppose, of his half-holiday; but the butcher-boy came handy, and when one can't have what one wants, one must take what one can get."

"But why him—that is, immolate any body?" I inquired, intending to humor her delusion.

"That I can easily explain," she replied. "You have doubtless heard that there is in India a secret sect of devotees, who term themselves Thugs."

"I have read of that detestable fraternity in the 'Wanderings Abroad' of Eugene Sue," I responded.

"Your strong expression, at which I take no offense, shows that you are not unacquainted with our principles. I am a Thug, and veil the fact by assuming the name of Thugleigh."

It struck me that a thicker veil might have been afforded by the name of Smith or Brown, but I did not interrupt.

"I therefore, on principle," she proceeded, "offer at least once a month a human sacrifice to the Goddess Bowanee, whose effigy you see in that corner."

"I would rather not have known this circumstance," said I. "Indeed, as your society is, as you say, secret, it seems to me that you break your rules by making me your confidant."

"Not at all," she remarked, smiling. "I am convinced that my secret will not go any further."

"You have a high opinion of my discretion," I rejoined, endeavoring to look flattered.

"I have no opinion whatever on the subject," she calmly remarked. "For all I know to the contrary, you may be the veriest chatter-box in the universe. But of this I am sure, that you can tell no tales, and I have selected you for the next victim. Now don't be alarmed. If you do not like it, you shall not suffer any pain." While talking thus she advanced toward a shelf.) "I would, therefore, be more regularly disposed of with a white scarf, or to slay you with one of these knives; but as you are a victim of a superior order, I can afford to dispense with extreme formalities, and allow you to swallow the contents of the little vial I now place in your hands."

A "vision" I acquired, with horror.

"Yes," she answered, "and of so efficacious a kind that it will extinguish life in a moment, without the slightest pain or inconvenience. When you have expired, your body will be conveyed through this aperture, through which many —ah, have they!—have passed before you."

With this she touched a spring, whereupon the idol sunk behind the stone, and exhibited a hideous face, painted on the wall, with a wide mouth opening on darkness.

Horror gave place to indignation.

"This is very well, madam," said I; "but if you are a lunatic I am not bound on that account to swallow poison, and to be put out of sight like a mislaid letter."

"Resistance is useless," she said, drawing forth a revolver, and pointing it full in my face. "The vial must be hurt you, whereas the vial causes no suffering whatever. You had better choose the latter."

I had never realized till that moment the feelings of Fair Rosamond.

"And now," she proceeded, "the goddess grows impatient, the jaws of her provider are more extended."

This was the fact, and I was inspired with a sudden resolution. One road of escape was obvious, and, in a fit of desperation, I leaped into the open mouth, head-foremost, like a harlequin.

Again a few moments of darkness, during which I heard a shriek of horror ring out, and when this had passed I found myself in a neat little study, looking at a slim gentleman, timidly dressed, and especially remarkable for the perfect arrangement of his hair. He seemed to be rather startled.

"What, James," he said, "you need not have taken me unawares like this. I did not so much as hear you knock."

My name is not James; but rejoiced as I was to find myself in a room where the image of Bowanee was not part of the furniture, I did not deem it expedient to correct the error. Indeed, I was beginning to stammer out an apology, when he fortunately prevented me by saying quickly:

"No matter—no matter. I am only too happy to show you the successful result of my little experiments."

I expressed, in turn, my happiness at the proposed introduction; he proceeded:

"The greatest discoveries in practical science often, as you are aware, have a comparatively childish beginning. The idea of making a bowl was, in its earliest form, a toy; and it was by means of a boy's kite that Franklin drew the electric spark from the clouds. I have devoted myself to bubbles. You smile"—I had done nothing of the sort—"I do not refer to those hollow commercial enterprises which are stigmatized by that name, but to bona fide bubbles such as urchins are in the habit of blowing from an ordinary tobacco-pipe. Just watch me now."

So saying, he dipped the bowl of an ordinary pipe into a small basin of thick soapy water. The next exertion, blew a fair round bubble, which, when detached, rested upon the table.

"Just touch that," he said.

I did so: the bubble did not burst, but was as firm as if it had been made of glass.

"Now you see the nature of my invention," he continued, smiling with evident satisfaction. "I add to the superaqueous fluid, vulgarly termed soap-and-water, an ingredient the nature of which I shall not reveal, and which has the effect of rendering the bubble permanent. You may dash that bubble against the ground, or strike it with a hammer—still it will not break. All you have to avoid is a contact with fire. Observe!"

He lighted a lucifer-match and applied it to the bubble, which, with a report like that of a small cannon, exploded as loudly, and better he was thrown to the ground as if stricken by a thunderbolt. However, he rose smiling, and, rubbing the part that had been most inconvenienced by the fall, quietly said:

"There is no occasion to repeat the experiment?"

"Decidedly not, was my remark. "There is one point, however, on which I am curious. I should particularly admire the singularity of your discovery, but I am at a loss to perceive its use."

"Oh, that I can easily explain," he replied. "Not only have I discovered the ingredient which hardens the aqueous one fluid, but I have invented a machine of blowing which enables me to inclose whatever object I please within the precincts of a bubble. Look here!"

He opened a drawer, and showed a collection of humming-birds, butterflies, statuettes, and other objects that are commonly put under glass cases, each inclosed in a separate bubble. I acknowledged that the invention was admirable.

"Yes," he said, "I think it is; and it will soon go forth to the world as Bubblesworth's patent. But I have not come to that yet. Just sit for a few minutes in that chair, while I prepare to astonish you with an application of my principle."

I complied with his request, and he slipped behind the chair. Presently I was aware that there was something like a motion between me and the surrounding objects, and, throwing my head back, perceived that Mr. Bubblesworth had actually placed himself in a large transparent globe-sphere, streaked with brilliant colors, which resisted my touch as though it had been of iron. It was manifest that when the outer spherical wall of my prison gradually receded till it was beyond the reach of my outstretched hands. Soon the globe-sphere began to float, played by streams aground me began to assume definite shapes; some of which, apparently, were distant from me several miles, while others were in my immediate vicinity.

I was standing near a neat whitewashed cottage, in front of which, seated by a table, on which stood a foaming jug, was a jolly old gentleman of the convivial order, who, after having laughed and roared in engravings of the last century as the embodiment of rural felicity in advanced years. To sit alone under the shade of a spreading bough a hot summer evening, with a fat face that smiled behignantly upon nothing, was long the summit of human bliss in the eyes of those limited-minded artists who wished to contrast the innocent pleasures of the country with the riot and dissipation of the town.

"This is an uncommonly pretty country, Sir," I observed to the jolly gentleman.

"Yes, Sir, it is," he replied, "though it is so far from the station; and perhaps for that very reason. Ah, there were no railroads when I was a boy!"

"You came here young?" I asked.

"Came here? I was born and reared on this house and this very day is my eightieth birthday."

I instinctively glanced upward toward the sky, as if to catch the flying fellow escaped from whom I would willingly have referred the doubts that arose in my mind. But nothing was above me save the pure azure. I could address no one but the old gentleman himself.

"My question may appear very ignorant, Sir," I said, "but what country is this?"

"This," he answered, "is Soapshire, on the borders of Bubblesex."

I discovered at once the etymological origin of these strange names; but still I scarcely durst trust my ears. "I have heard," I said, "of Shropshire and Middlesex."

"Have you?" interrupted the old gentleman; "that's more than I have. I have not left my own township for many years. However, this is Soapshire, and if you cross the river you see yonder you'll find yourself in Bubblesex directly."

Soapshire—Bubblesex—Thughumptonshire—odd names! Not only was I still somehow in Hampton-place? I could not trace the connecting link between me and my immediate neighbors.

"Did you ever go to my church in Thughamptonshire?" I asked.

"Not very often; but I have done such a thing," was the reply.

"And in the course of his sermon did the minister make any mention of—of Bowanee?"

"No; I can't say as he did—leastways, while I was awake. But I tell you what—in the church-yard of Dugton, which is the next parish-town, there is a little hill or mound like which they call Boy-Barrow; and the story goes that a great many butcher-boys are buried there who were sacrificed by the Druids, as they call them, in the days of the ancient Britons."

"Ha!" I exclaimed, with intense interest.

"A very curious thing that barrow. Some men who were digging there some twenty years ago found a stone figure of a woman with a lot of hands, and you may see it now in Thugton Museum. But it is getting dusk. I think I may as well send you up by fire-balloon."

"Fire-balloon?"

"Yes; my great-grandson, who goes to the grammar-school of Thugton-cum-Sne, sent me one as a present for my eightieth birthday. You must know that I was born at eight o'clock in the evening, so it was the boy's fancy that I should send it up exactly at that time, that he might be reminded of the old man at a distance. It is a singular thing that a man who was born at eight o'clock should live to be eighty."

I might have told him that, inasmuch as I had encountered many things much more singular, this last marvel was somewhat ineffective; but in the effort of the lucifer-match when applied to the surface of the bubble was present to my mind, I did not care to dispute about trifles.

"I think a fire-balloon might be dangerous," I remarked.

"Not at all—not at all," replied the old gentleman; "you see it is only a light in a say-tuck or so, I don't mind on an occasion like this, I may never live to see any other birthday."

That I thought was strikingly probable. I remarked, "if you persist in sending up this balloon."

"Why, what has that to do with it? You don't suppose I shall set the sky on fire?" (That was the very thing I did suppose.) "I have heard of folks setting the river Somaht on fire, but as for the sky—ho! ho! ho!"

I shall have little further disputations made for the ascent of the fire-balloon. The old gentleman unfolded it, lighted the tow in the little basket that depended from it by a cay, and, as it slowly arose, watched it with delight and admiration. Up—up—it went, and down—down—went my heart. In the distance it appeared little more than a spark. Bang! Cottage—old man—trees—all were gone.

I was sitting in my arm-chair by the fire, and a coal which had just popped out of the grate lay smoking on the hearth.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WINDING, with his slipping, frosty breath, has fairly come, and folks who can, and draw their mothers more closely; but not so the young, whose blood is warm and quick. The boys have thrown up their hats with a shout at the sight of the first snow-flakes, noisily drops down his sled from the attic, and, with a tenderness and courage quite equal to the nature, polishes up his favorite skates. Even the young girl looks longingly from the window after her fashionable brother, and wishes no frills and flounces kept her from gliding with him on those pathes of ice in the street. For what a luxury of delight it is for girls that fashion has compromised a little, and that the exhilarating amusement of skating has been considered not only a healthful recreation, not for boys only, but for every body!

The summer and autumn beauties of the Central Park have departed, but the pond, the lawns, and the Park Commissioners provide most excellent accommodations for skating. The Mall, almost Seventh-Street, the second in size is near Fifth Avenue and One Hundred and Fifth-Street, while the smallest is near Fifty ninth Street, between the Fifth and Sixth avenue entrances to the Park.

Speaking of skating reminds us of a comical incident, which, though in nowise connected with the subject of skating, was what a throng of jolly skaters would have called immediately—if they had only been on hand. A few days ago the elephants of the Park Menagerie, under the charge of Mr. Daniel Arsenal, for the purpose of having their "pictures" taken. The old elephant behaved with great decorum, and stood as still as if he had been stuffed, while his likeness was taken once a week all his life. But the photographer had a terrible time with the young one, which, like other babies, would not hold his head still or look toward the camera. He persisted in turning around, and a photograph of his head was not exactly what was wanted. Coaxing did no good, neither did beating, and the young fellow escaped from his keeper, and ran off at the top of his speed. A ludicrous scene followed, the keeper rushing after the fugitive amidst the startled exclamations of the artist and the laughing shouts of the spectators. The big baby was captured after a chase, and was out of bounds, but could do nothing else but stand still, like a good child, until his picture was taken.

The Mount Vernon flying-boat whale ran aground in shallow water in the Firth of Forth, about twelve miles from Edinburgh, two or three weeks ago, and it was seized as a prize. He received about thirty salutes, namely, rifle-bullets.

A sad account of the sufferings of the Fenian*do* Pi*ro* expedition comes from Cuba in a letter to the Herald by Senor Barranco, who, with a small party, fortunately escaped from the fate of the rest. Only two hundred and fifty prisoners were sent from Havana to that desolate spot. After a voyage of seventyfive days, during which they suffered severely from hunger, they were directed to go ashore, with the cool remark that they were at liberty to remain there and carry avocations! The population of the island consists chiefly of natives, who are almost if not quite savages. They refused to provision anyone, and the distress for food became very great. The heat was intense and the climate unhealthful. Consequently nearly one-half the prisoners were sick within a week after their arrival.

Reuben Greenfield to have lately given four of his books to a new library in England, with the remark that they were the only works of his which he wished to be read. The titles are "Lives of the Highwaymen," "Queen of the Air," "Ethics of the Dust," "Crown Jewels," and "Stones of Venice, Jun."

A new Northern Lights theory is credited to Dr. Hall; namely, that the Northern Lights are the reflected rays of the sun, thrown out and forth by the ice and snow of the arctic regions and the clouds surrounding the pole.

About the time of the first issue of "greenbacks" by the Government, there was some discussion about placing an appropriate Scriptural motto upon the bills, in accordance with an old custom of stamping one upon coins. Secretary Chase consulted with several persons on the subject, and suggested "In God we delphia bank. After mentioning several Scriptural texts that had occurred to him, the Secretary asked the banker's opinion. "Perhaps," was the reply, "the most appropriate would be, 'Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have I give you.'" But we have not seen that text on any of our "greenbacks."

Marcoli, a village in France, is the scene of some singular archæological discoveries. While digging for the foundations of a house the workmen came upon a quantity of human bones and various antiquities. The results of the discovery so far have been 257 skeletons, ninety-one earthen vases, five of glass, three of bronze, two silver, nine gold bracelets, and a quantity of necklaces, ear-rings, and beads. The skeletons are those of a race of men of tall stature, some measuring six feet four inches.

An accident of a fearful nature occurred on November 13 in a church in Lexington, Kentucky. A prominent member of the church had died, and a large number of people had gathered to attend the funeral ceremonies. While the services were in progress the floor of the building gave way, and precipitated the entire audience into the basement. Sixteen sons were known to be killed at once, and about one hundred and fifty injured, many of them seriously.

Bechtel thinks more of America than she did twenty-five years ago. Such a republic as ours can not be overlooked now by any nation, ever so proud. In 1848 the British Museum had only 100,000 volumes lading to America. Now it has upward of 100,000.

A new method of making water-proof fabric is announced, the materials being of the most simple care. The cloth is first submitted to the action of sulphuric acid, the strength of the acid, the time of action varying with the nature of the fabric, but never exceeding two minutes. A thorough washing follows, and after the cloth is dried it is ready for use. The action of the acid is to decompose the wool or cotton fibres into their glutinous matter, and, in drying up the spaces between the threads, and thereby preventing the pass...e of water.

The Brooklyn Y...g Men's Christian Association has begun a good work, by which the young men of that city may receive educational advantages similar to those offered by the Cooper Institute. Classes of instruction are to be organized, and a course of weekly scientific lectures by able men has been already commenced. The membership fee is placed at two dollars, which suffices the bearer to attend the lectures, literary, and social receptions, and the three first-class concerts in the Academy of Music.

What a fortunate circumstance that the twentieth century commences with the decimal system! Is how could the eighty-eight weighty manifests of the Fat Men's Association endure to "dance all night" to the music of the Cooper Institute to do? We hope for their sakes that the night of the twentieth will be clear and cold!

The system of fre. delivery of all letters directed to street and number is about to be introduced into San Francisco. The system has worked admirably since the post-office or that city is about six thousand daily —nearly one-half of which are distributed through the free-delivery by clerks. Among the many hundred dead-letters are each week forwarded to Washington the persons to whom they are addressed are being found. Something like ten thousand letters are daily sent away from the San Francisco office. The free-delivery system will be introduced into New York city in 1869, and its advantages soon fully established. The plan has been adopted in many of the principal cities of the United States.

The life of a French bank-note averages about two years, when, remaining unclaimed, it is called in and condition. No matter how dilapidated it is, if the cashier of the bank can identify it—and he will take good care to do so—he will give it back. Such a note fore the old one. Very few notes are actually lost. During the last seventy years the total issue of about 1,000 francs each have been issued, and of this number, according to the latest reports, 12,358 had been recovered by the banks, only 2,000 of which were encountered for. Of 500-franc notes 24,353 had been recovered out of 25,000. When notes are found to be in circulation, they are cancelled, incarcerated in a huge oaken chest, and then a conflagration takes place. The chest is kindled with great reverence, the defunct notes are thrown into a sort of revolving wire cage over the fire, and the heat is kept rotating, and the minute fragments of ash, whirled out of the cage through the meshes, take their flight into infinite space—so the saying is—unseen.

Rufus Choate's handwriting was proverbial for its illegibility. Daniel Webster used to say that the "c's" and "e's" in Choate's letters were indistinguishable, a small gridiron stuck by lightning!

During the year 1868, and the first half of 1869, the Bank of England and the Bank of France contributed to the saving of 120 lives from various shipwrecks, and 32 vessels from destruction. The institution has now 291 life-boat stations under its management.

A French journal thus graphically describes M. Rochefort's appearance at a recent examination: "Rochefort is very thin, thin as a skeleton. Head more than pale—of a color not to be defined, between the dead-leaf and the yellow; eyes dull and electric light. Cheek-bones prominent, eyes hollow, forehead high, a chin terminated with what the Yankees call a goatee. Questioned into the bargain; an irregular nose—every thing angular—hair like independent lightning-rods. Such is the head of the accused. 'Vive Rochefort!' He demands a few moments's repose. 'Vive Rochefort!' Now he is ready to begin. 'Vive Rochefort!' He ascends the tribune. 'Vive Rochefort!'"

The Empress Eugenie appeared several times before her subjects prior to the Exist with her hair dressed without any ornament whatever. Such extreme simplicity was disparaging to her fine face, and not, like Eugenie, a profusion of crown diamonds to scatter over their elegant dresses, as is customary abroad.

"Bridget," a servant was once trying an action involving a right of way, which her client claimed, through the lands of the defendant. Mr. Gerard was explaining to the jury, upon diagrams, where his client had a right to go.

"You don't mean to say," interrupted Mr. Brady, "that the plaintiff has a right to go in that direction?"

"Certainly I do," replied Mr. Gerard.

"What," said Mr. Brady, impatiently, "you might as well say I have a right to come into your house as often as I please."

"So you have, my dear fellow," exclaimed Mr. Gerard. "Won't you come and dine with me tomorrow?"

THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.—VIEW OF THE CHURCH OF ST. P[illegible] ROME

T. P. ROME, WHERE THE COUNCIL IS TO BE HELD.—[See Page 794.]

THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.

It is only four or five days after the publication of this sheet that the Œcumenical Council is to assemble at Rome. The Council is to be held, December 8, at

THE CHURCH OF ST. PETER.

This church, which GIBBON styles "the most glorious structure that has ever been applied to the use of religion," occupies the site of a basilica built by CONSTANTINE in 306. The foundations were laid by JULIUS II. in 1506, and in 1626 the building was dedicated by URBAN VIII., its erection having been spread over the reigns of twenty Popes, and carried on by twelve different architects. BRAMANTE planned the building in the form of a Greek cross, which RAPHAEL changed to a Latin cross; but MICHAEL ANGELO returned to the original form. The latter designed the dome. MADERNO resumed the Latin cross form, and added the portico. The situation of the building—in a hollow surrounded on three sides by hills—is unfortunate. The interior is unrivaled for grandeur and beauty; so exquisite are the proportions that the vast size is scarcely noticed by the beholder. The dome is regarded as the triumph of modern architecture. The principal dimensions of the church are as follow: Length of interior, 616 feet; breadth of the nave and aisles, 1071 feet; height of nave, 152 feet; diameter of dome, 193 feet; height from pavement to the knob of the lantern, 405 feet. The semicircular colonnades on each side of the piazza, in front of the church, formed by four rows of Doric columns that extend from them to the portico, a magnificent approach to St. Peter's.

Elaborate preparations have been made in that part of the church which has been fitted as a council hall. The walls have been adorned with portraits of eminent churchmen; the floor is covered with a costly carpet presented by the King of Prussia; rich galleries have been erected for the reporters of the Council, embassadors, royal personages, and other persons of rank. The Pope will preside in person, and the language used at the Council will be Latin.

THE COUNCIL

About to be held will be attended, it is expected, by about 700 prelates, each of whom will be accompanied by one ecclesiastical friend, with the abbots, the generals of the religious orders, etc., there will be more than 2000 members of the clergy actively attached to the assembly. The population of Rome already includes 15,000 ecclesiastics.

The Council will be purely ecclesiastical, since it is unsupported by the civil authorities of any nation. In this respect it will materially differ from the last great Œcumenical Council—that of Trent, held about the middle of the sixteenth century. In that Council, less capable of control than the Council of Trent, as a writer in Harper's Magazine for December asserts, "spread irreconcilable enmity among nations. It inflamed the warriors and the priests in a deadly assault upon the working-man. It declared war against the factory and the work-shop, the printing-press and the school. It crushed the industry of Italy and Spain; it banished the frugal and thoughtful Huguenot from France; it put a ruin to make Holland a desolate waste, and to blight in its serpent-folds the rising intellect of Europe; it armed with blows at the throats of Germany and the North; it held in bondage for three miserable centuries the mind of Italy and Spain. To the Council of Trent, by an easy deduction, may be traced the great war which CHARLES V. waged against his German subjects, and the disastrous crusades of his son PHILIP against the Netherlands and QUEEN ELIZABETH; the civil rancor of the League and the Guises; the persecutions, worse than those of DIOCLETIAN, of LOUIS XIV.: the Thirty Years' War, which WALLENSTEIN and GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS made half Germany a blood-stained wilderness; the fatal bigotry of Austria; the tyranny of Spain. It was a flame of discord, a conflagration of strife; and to the student of history no spectacle is more startling than that torrent of woe which descended upon mankind from the deliberations and the anathemas of a scanty gathering of bishops and Jesuits in the rocky heights of the Tyrol."

But, after all, though so powerful for a brief period, how little has that Council been as against modern progress!

As to what is to be done at the forthcoming Council, that is now a subject of eagerest interest. The protest of Father HYACINTHE indicates the apprehension which is entertained among liberal Catholics that the only hope of the Church—namely, a renovation from within itself—is about to be destroyed by the Pope and its Council. "James," the writer (or we should say one of the authors, as there are more than one) of a work just published on this subject, and himself evidently a liberal Catholic, speaks of a bull which "does not date from yesterday, and did not begin with the proclamation of the Council. For some months four years the most active movement in the Catholic Church, which is now swollen to a vast movement, has been manifesting itself, and now it is preparing, like an advancing flood-tide, to take possession of the whole organic life of the Church by means of this Council." And he adds: "We are of their opinion who are persuaded, first, that the Catholic Church, far from assuming a hostile and suspicious attitude toward the principles of political, intellectual, and religious freedom and independence of judgment, in so far as they are capable of a Christian interpretation, or rather are directly derived from the letter and spirit of the Gospel, ought, on the contrary, to be in positive accord with them, and to exercise a constant purifying and ennobling influence on their development; secondly, that a great and searching reformation of the Church is necessary and inevitable, however long it may be evaded." Now, nobody expects that this Council is to promote those worthy ends.

In regard to the temporal power of the Church, "James" says: "We regret that doctrine and idea of the Church which has for years been commended by the organ of the Roman Jesuits as alone true, as the sole and necessary means of deliverance for the perishing human race." The doctrine of Papal Infallibility "James" thinks would not only "crush out the intellectual movement and scientific activity in the Catholic Church," but would also "build up a new wall of partition, and, in the most vital and most fundamentable of all, between that Church and the religious communities separated from her. Between remaining and returning to which no Christian can banish from his breast, the hope of a future reunion of the divided Churches. Each of the Papal and the Vatican Council party who is moderately acquainted with the history of the Eastern Church and of the Protestant bodies will certainly hold it to be conceivable that a time can ever come in which even any considerable portion of these Churches will place itself, of its own free-will, to the arbitrary power of a single man, stretched, as it would be, through the doctrine of Infallibility, even beyond its present proportions."

"We know on good authority," says "James," "that the spiritual head of Europe is waiting for the Infallibility dogma is already mapped out. An English prelate—we would name him—has undertaken in the ecumenical galleries to speedily erect an humble petition to the Holy Father to raise the opinion of his infallibility to a dogma. The Jesuits and their Roman allies hope that the majority of bishops present, who have been already primed for the occasion, will respond by a unanimous shout of assent, and the Holy Father will gladly yield to the pressure coming on him spontaneously, and, as it were, through a sudden and irresistible inspiration from on high, and so the new dogma will be settled at one sitting, without further examination, as by the stroke of a magician's wand. As the Roman people are told after a Conclave, Habemus Papam, on the evening of this solemn session they will go forth to the whole Catholic world, Habemus Papam Infallibilem. And before the newly-risen Sun-god of Divine truth all the phases of false science and forms of modern civilization will be scared away forever."

DEAD.

WITH closed lips and closed eyes,
Wrapt all in one white lie;
Calm as a statue's carven face,
And, oh, so cold to love's embrace!

Her shore in all our dealings gone,
Life, as we knew it, left to us none;
Slid into slumber calm and deep,
A maiden sculptured in her sleep.

She was my own ere this befell;
Whose now she is I can not tell;
Man knows not—but to women that saith
What this thing is that he calls Death.

And I but know that all my hopes
Lie like dead leaves on smitten slopes:
That though my heart I bleed yet,
The day-star of my life hath set.

Now all my thoughts will turn and tend
In one direction to the end;
And with the ghost of my dead Past
Mem'ry will wander to the last.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In The Books.—Book XXX.

HARPER'S LIBRARY OF SELECT NOVELS.

CHAPTER III.

A COUSIN.

THE carriage bearing Veronica rolled along smoothly down the hill. It was the same road leading from an ernst grand-ducal villa which stands on the top of an eminence—scarcely high enough to be termed a mountain—between Arezzo and Ajeomines, but which is of very respectable altitude nevertheless, and is called the Poggio Imperiale. The air was thick and keen, and dry, and like trees of ancient growth.

Veronica had heard her mother speak so much and so often of Florence that she thought she knew it. But coming to view city and suburb with her bodily eyes, she found every thing strange, foreign, and, on the whole, rather disappointing. Later she understood the amazing picturesqueness of that storied town, and with every glance its attractions grew on her. But there are some places—as there is some music, which even among the ravishingly sweet is felt at once the noises by storm, but need time and familiarity to develop their wealth of beauty and sweetness.

What Veronica saw with her unaccustomed eyes was, first the long, dusty, squalid Roman road, into which the carriage turned at the foot of the avenue; then the Porta Romana, with its huge, yawning archway, through which carts of all kinds were struggling; those coming in having to stop to be examined by the officers of the town custom dues, and those going out pushing boldly through the gate and grazing wheels against the stationary vehicles.

Every body was talking very loudly. The few who really could be said to be exercise of ingenuity, and to exercise a constant purifying and ennobling themselves by half-uttered oaths and long-drawn, lugubious howls addressed to the patient, lean beasts that drew the carts.

In odd contrast with this nimble energy of tongue, were the slow and languid movements of all concerned. The ostrei men lounged against the walls on high, four-legged stools set out before a queer little office, very dim and dirty, with glazed windows. They had within them long flat sticks, with which they probed masses of hay or straw, or which they thrust in among bundles of linen or piles of straw-colored flasks, and stood down amidst the legs of people sitting in country cruises, or under the box-seat of hackney-coaches. And what they had thus satisfied themselves that there was no attempt being made to defraud the municipality of Florence of the tax on hay and wine, and whatever other articles are subject to duty, they—always with irreffable languor—put their hands into their pockets again and took the driver proceed. One man especially, with melancholy, dark eyes and a sallow face, uttered the permission to pass on, "Avanti!" in a tone of such profound and hopeless dejection, that one might have fancied him a guardian of that awful portal his great lowmanus wrote of, rather than a mortal custom-house officer at the city gate, and that he was warning the doomed victims: "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here!"

Sir John Gale's carriage only paused for an instant in passing through the Porta Romana. That spiritual Father who sat at the momentary check, and dashed on again rapidly over the resounding pavement.

A succession of objects seemed to flit past Veronica's eyes like the swift changes in a dream.

There was a long, narrow paved with flat stones, fitted into each other angle for angle and point for point, like the pieces in a child's puzzle. There was no footway, and no side pavement for foot-passengers, and—the street being very full—the coachman kept uttering a warning cry at intervals, like a muezzin from a high minaret. Indeed, as they approached the busier parts of the town, their pace was slackened perforce. No vehicle short of the Pope of Jagganauth could have ruthlessly kept up a steady progress through such a crowd.

There were houses of various styles and dimensions on either side of the long street, nearly all plastered; one or two, however, with a heavy cut-stone front to the basement-story. Every window had a balcony, and every green jalousie, and nearly every window had a group of heads framed in it, for it was a summer evening, and there were people in the streets. They called it piggiare il fresco, albeit it was yet hot enough, and stifling in the narrow ways of the city; and there were bright bonnets and gay shawls, and acquaintances to be recognized, and familiar conversations touching the privatest family affairs to be held in brassy voices between ladies and gentlemen standing in the street, and other ladies and gentlemen leaning on elbows out of their windows, and the whole city seemed to be out of doors, pressing throng of passers-by as a stubborn, broad-based stone in a stream is regardless of the rushing current that the passers-by, right and left as the water yields, and skirted round these obstructive groups, or—if the subject of their discourse drew them to overlarly interested—lingered a while to listen to their talk with a grave placidity, which might be characterized as good-humored indifference, and would suggest some what of merriment to an English ear, and these people were few smiles on their brown faces.

Then came the Arno, with its open quays, with houses on the left hand, and on the right a steep incline covered with gravel, on the summit of which stood the Cascine, its façade seeming, at the first glance, somewhat low for its width), flanked by open arcades that advanced from the main body of the building and enlosed two sides of the graveled space. These arcades were based on titanic blocks of rough stone, and under the shade of them was a military band was making lively music mused upon the question until she reached the villa. It was quite evening. The sun had set behind the hills; but there was still a brightness in the sky. "Milndi" hastened to her own room to dress for dinner. She made a gorgeous toilet every day, finding a great deal of real pleasure in her fine clothes. The anticipation that this was a pleasure which some other person in her presence genuinely disdained, would have been considered her delight, if the rich silks and gay jewels and fine lace. But such a mortification never befell her in Sir John Gale's company.

At dinner they talked of Cesare de' Barletti.

"Paul has told you, of course," said Veronica, "about the man he spoke to him, and offered to me?"

"Yes—Barleti. Ah—yes; I knew him at Naples. Wonder what brings him here!"

"He said he would call."

"Not a doubt of it! He likes a good dinner and good wine; and he never gets either at his own expense."

"I should suppose that the Principe de' Barletti does not need to come to his acquaintances for food!" said Veronica.

Sir John made a grating laugh. "Bah!" he cried, "you are inpayable with your Principe de Barletti! The real prince and head of the family is penniless. He lives nine months out of every year in the third-floor of a mangy palazzo at Torre del Greco, in order to scrape together enough to spend the other three months at Rome! But this fellow is only dei principi—a younger son of a younger son. He has twopence a year, which he squanders in shiny boots (I dare say he blacks them himself) and cheap gloves. But he plays a good game of piquet; and I found it worth while to let him come nearly every evening when I was once laid by the heels—or the toe, rather, for I got a confounded fit of the gout —in a beastly hotel at Naples. Of course he was very glad. It paid his capitally."

Veronica's temper was chafed by this slighting mention of a likeliness. It vexed her. She knew that Sir John's coarse insolence was directed against this same utter ignorance of the fact that he was in any degree connected with herself. Still it vexed her. But she had no intention of instructing the rude old relative in the task of championing her newly-found relation. She had been considerately elated by the thought of being known as a patron; and proportionately depressed by the discovery that to be dei Principi Barletti was no guarantee of important position.

"Then you mean this man to come here?" asked Veronica.

"Mean him to come? Yes; if he makes himself amusing. If not, I shall give him the cold shoulder."

"If you feel that you want amusement why do you not go into Florence sometimes?"

"La bella! Go to Florence for amusement in June! There's nobody there; and if there were, it's much too hot to do any thing. Besides—no, no, we must get through the summer here as best we can. The dry heat suits me rather; especially on this hill where one gets plenty of air, even if it be hot air. In the autumn and winter we will move south. Meanwhile if Barletti stays in our way, so be it."

"Nobody in Florence?" replied Veronica, whose mind had been dwelling on those words.

"It seemed to me that there were a great many carriages—"

"You did not go to the Cascine?" interrupted Sir John, quickly.

"No; I was too late. But I saw the people driving along the Lung' Arno."

She perhaps understood from Sir John's manner that he had given orders to Paul not to take her to the Cascine, and that he had felt a momentary anxiety that his orders had not been obeyed. The question presented itself to her mind, what would have been the result if Paul had yielded to her desire? But when she retired to her own apartment—which she did early —she lay awake for some time, occupying herself exclusively with another and very different problem, namely, which of her dresses she should put on to-morrow evening when Cesare de' Barletti might be expected to make his appearance at Villa Chiari.

CHAPTER IV.

IN THE GARDEN.

"I was so delightfully astonished!"

"At seeing Paul? He does not usually produce ecstasy in the beholder. But 'tastes are as pon pauli,' the saying is, as they say here."

"Pardon! no: not at the sight of Paul for Paul's sake, but—"

"But for mine?"

"For yours, ceno mio. I had never heard that you were in Italy; never."

"I wonder if he had," thought Sir John. "He says it so emphatically, that it is probably a lie."

"And the sight of milndi positively dazzled me! What eyes! What a grace! How beautiful!"

"Take another cup of coffee," said Sir John, drily, interrupting the rapture of the companion. And of the raptures did not please him displease him.

Sir John Gale and the Principe Cesare de' Barletti were sitting together beneath the loggia on the western side of the Villa Chiari. The setting sun was flushing all the sky before them. They looked out on the garden, where, among the laurels and acacias, a white figure passed and repassed slowly.

The cracked songlota pavement of the loggia was covered, where the two men sat, by a thick carpet. Easy-stools and cushions were there, too, in abundance. Between Sir John and his guest stood a little marble-topped table bearing coffee and wine. Sir John was half reclining in an easy chair, with his legs stretched out before him, supported by cushions. Barletti sat in a rocking-chair, on which he swung slowly backward and forward. Both men were smoking.

"The coffee is bad, eh?" said Sir John.

"It is very strong."

"Better than the stuff they give you at your caffe, isn't it?"

"Ma, sì! Better no doubt. But very strong. I should like a little cold water, if I may have it."

Sir John rang a bell that stood on the table.

Before a servant could answer the summons Veronica approached. She had been strolling up and down the garden, and had just reached the spot in front of the loggia when the bell sounded.

"What do you want?" she asked.

The Principe rose and bowed very cold water. He finds the coffee stronger than he is accustomed to."

There was an indefinable sneer in the tone in which Sir John pronounced these words. The words were innocent enough. Veronica understood the tone, and trembled before her.

"I dare say he does," she retorted. "It is made to suit our English taste, which likes strong flavors—some people would say, coarse flavors."

"Oh no!" protested Barletti, not having in the least understood the drift of the words or the retort; "the flavor is very good indeed."

"There is some deliciously cold water always in the marble basin of the fountain, at eight yonder," said Veronica, impulsively. "Let us go and get some! It will be better than any the servants will bring."

The words were addressed to Cesare de' Barletti, who threw away his cigarette—with secret impatience, by-the-way—and rose to follow "milndi."

She had taken up a position from the table and was running toward the fountain.

She had resolved to impress this stranger—already appreciative enough of her beauty—with her dignity; whereupon she had called him dame. And on a sudden behold her skipping through the garden like a school-girl!

The first plan was too slow, and required too much phlegm and patience to carry out. Barletti took her proposition as an unlooked-for matter of course. She could not bear to be ten minutes in the society of a stranger without protesting an effort to save him trouble. She required to see an immediate result. She was vain and arrogant, but not proud, and not stupid; so that she could appreciate the fact that a man with the most contemptible persons, nor delude herself on the teeth of evidence with the dull, comfortable faith that she was the only woman he ever was not. And then came the irresistible craving to make a coup—to shine—to dazzle.

Sir John Gale was the victim of a sexual attraction. He remembered her having done similar things for his behest; that had been very natural and laudable. But for Barletti to assume that principino! Sir John felt himself defrauded. Had a pet animal approached him at the moment he would certainly have caused it a kick. It was, all he could do to relieve his feelings was to swear at the frightened servant who answered the bell, for coming too promptly.

Cesare de' Barletti wondered much within himself that any human being should move more, or more quickly, than was absolutely necessary, on a hot June evening. He at first attributed Veronica's unexpected proposition to the unhastible and incomprehensible cause, British eccentricity.

But when he rejoined her at the edge of the broken fountain, another solution presented itself to his mind. She had perhaps seized this opportunity to have speech with him out of the hearing of her husband. Why not? It was impossible that she could care a straw for that old dog's cud. Very natural to have imagined that he was so rich. Very natural also to admire the Principe Cesare de' Barletti, who was not eligible to be a husband, but who was eligible to be candidly acknowledged—but who was decidedly well-looking and well-born, and would make a very jewel of a cavaliere servente. A new was the one circumstance which caused Cesare to hesitate before accepting this solution as final. Veronica was an Englishwoman. And really there was no judging Englishwomen by the rules that hold good in estimating the character of the rest of the sex! And whosoever should suppose that this reflection implied in the Italian's mind any special reprobation of Englishwomen would have been very much mistaken.

Veronica filled the goblet at the fountain. The filling was a slow process, inasmuch as the water dripped sparely through the crevice before mentioned. While the drops of bright water were falling one by one into the basin, Veronica kept her eyes fixed on the latter, and her attention was apparently absorbed in watching it.

"I pray you to let me relieve you of the trouble to do that for me, Signora," said Barletti, bending forward, and offering to take the goblet.

She waved him back with her hand, and said, "I am watching to see how long it takes to fill the glass. The drops fall so regularly. Drip, drop, drip!"

He stood and looked at her. Now, at all events, he was not taking her behavior as a matter of course.

As soon as the water touched the brim of the glass, she relinquished it into Barletti's hands, and walked away slowly, as though she had lost all interest in his further proceedings. The prince drank a long draught. He had no idea of not enjoying its delicious coolness because he was to puzzled by "milndi." When he had done he walked after her and overtook her.

"That was very fresh and pleasant," he said. "A thousand thanks."

"Eh?"

"The water was so good. A thousand—"

"Oh!"

"Decidedly," thought Barletti, glancing at the beautiful face beside him, "she is English, thoroughly English! Who is to make out such people?"

They found, on returning to the house, that Sir John had left the loggia, and, in the open saloon, the servants said. Would ii Signor Principe join him there?

Il Signor Principe complied with the request.

Veronica lingered in the loggia and looked out over the landscape. The sun had gone down. The brief twilight was nearly over. The trees stood out dark against the back-ground of pure sky, pale green near the horizon, and deepening toward the zenith to an intense dark blue. Not a leaf stirred in the breathless calm. There was no moon, but the heavens seemed to grow full of stars as the daylight faded. They quivered and shook with a liquid silvery lustre. And below on the earth sparkled and danced to and fro a thousand golden gleaming specks, threading a mazy pattern just above the crests of the tiptoe wheat. They were fire-flies. When one of the bright insects chanced to come near Veronica, she saw him glow and pale with a palpitating intermittent flame. And sometimes the whole field full of them appeared to shine and fade simultaneously, like the successive showers of sparks from a strident star that respond to the deep breath of the laboring bellows.

It was all as different as possible from Dunchurch. And yet very beautiful. Began to think of certain summer night in Shipley long ago, when she and Maud were children together, and her father had thrown open the window telling them stories of her Italian life. She remembered the dark blue sky, and the stars that looked more than cloudy, sultry, starless sky. She remembered the sound of her mother's voice, and Maud's thin-lipped face, and the look that the sounds of Maud's soft, warm, little hand, stroking her (Veronica's) hair in a sort of rhythmic accompaniment to her mother's narrative. She did not think she had been very happy in those days. She pitied herself as she recalled some of the hours. Remembered her own passionate and unreasoning longing in her heart, and filled her eyes with tears. A conviction, which she tried to ignore, was in the air. She did not fight against it by self-deluding arguments; she simply tried to avoid acknowledging its existence, as we turn away our eyes from a disagreeable object that we know to be lying in wait for us on a path wherever we must pass. But it was there; she knew it was there. She felt it in her heart, that she had given all and gained nothing—that she had been duped and defrauded.

She did not yet believe that what she aimed at would, if obtained, have turned to dust and ashes. And she knew that she had not got what she aimed at. The horrible sense of the nevertheless of the past came over her. The tears brimmed over from her warm cheeks, and they brought no solace. They only humiliated, and made her angry.

A small, gaping into one of the upper rooms to close the shutters for the night, looked out and saw "milndi" leaning, with folded arms, against a column at the edge of the loggia, and apparently absorbed in watching the fire-flies.

It was an odd idea to stand there alone, when the night chill was coming on a sofa, and drink iced lemonade in the saloon! But gentlefolks were odd—especially foreign gentlefolks. And Regina—who, even to the servants' quarters, not ill-contented with her own lot, and prepared to discuss her master and mistress, and to thank any stars—even to a side glance at Antonio, the footman—that she was not tied to that "vecchio bronzolone"—that grumbling old fellow, as she perversely called Sir John Gale.

Meanwhile Veronica, who had become herself long to any painful mental impression, returned to the house, and entered the saloon where Sir John and the prince were engaged over their game of piquet.

The room was brilliantly lighted, and dazzled her, coming from without. She felt more angry with her mood than ever. Becoming suddenly aware, as she entered the saloon, that her eyelids were swollen, and her eyes weak, and that they must be red and dull.

"Oh," she cried, stopping short, and clasping her hands before her face, "what a glare! It blinds me!"

Sir John was too intent on his game to regard her. Cesare de' Barletti looked up, and fell instantly into a state of admiration. He was perhaps dismayed that glittered on Veronica's slender finger. He played a wrong card (as he afterward confessed, and never could) and was discomfited.

Sir John was pleased. So was Veronica. The former attributed the victory to his own skill, and his—he had never been ill—he valued himself. The latter had no doubt that her presence had gained all the credit for forgetting his game. Barletti himself was well satisfied to have put his host into good-humor. The stakes for which they played were very trifling, and he thought the small sum he had lost not ill-invested.

"Will you have your revenge, prince?" asked Sir John, throwing himself back in the chair with a complacent smile.

Barletti declined, doubtfully.

"Aha! You show the white feather? Positively I did not think I should be able to tell the card from another. It is so long since I have played. You ought to have beaten me, you really ought. Ha, ha, ha!"

Veronica seated herself on a couch near the window. Her white dress was soft and flowing, and her black hair shone in its rich ripples, as she leaned her head against the dark velvet couch. Diamonds glittered on her neck and arms and hands, and trembled in her hair. There was no point of color about her dress, and its pure whiteness enhanced the rich glow of her brunette complexion. She still shaded her eyes with one hand, complaining of the light.

Sir John, having finished his game, was full of solicitude for her. Should he have the candles removed to another part of the room? Should she like a screen? Had she caught cold, or what was it? Her eyes were usually so strong! Being now the central object of attention, her spirits rose buoyantly, and she forgotten and commanded, and made Sir John move and remove the wax tapers a dozen times before their position was satisfactory to her. At last he got tired, and rang for Paul to carry them away and bring a shaded lamp instead. Barletti took no animating part in this, only on the lamp being carried in, there appeared in its train a tray with glasses and chicken, and wine, and cakes (these English are odd creatures!), his spirits rose too, and they were all three quite brilliant over the little impromptu supper. The conversation was carried on in French, Sir John not being able to speak Italian fluently. Barletti suddenly Veronica addressed Barletti in Italian, and intensely enjoyed his admiring surprise at the purity of her accent.

"How absolutely you speak Italian!" he exclaimed, with enthusiasm.

"My mother was an Indian," said Veronica.

"Was she?" asked Sir John, carelessly. "Tions! I never knew that. Or—stay—oh yes, to be sure! I think I remember hearing it mentioned."

"How distrait you are to-night!" said Veronica, with an assumption of tolerant good-humor.

Cesare Barletti took away in his brain three phrases on each his thoughts, passions, and prejudices made endless variations, as he drove down the Avenue of the Poggio Imperiale. The first was: I shall shut a man's eyes with a knife or remember who his wife's mother was! The second was: Milndi wanted to make it appear that Gale were not smoking in presence, or absence of mind; now, Gale is never "distrait;" it is not in his character. The third was: That handsome creature is not an Englishwoman, pure unique! The fact of her having had an Italian mother brings her more into the category of human beings whose motives one can know

MILK, AND WHAT COMES OF IT.

ORANGE COUNTY has long been a land flowing with milk and—butter. Three or four of these most beautiful autumn days have been spent by us among the farms which are supposed to butter our New York city bread, and quality our tea and coffee. Recent mechanical improvements have taken away much of the traditional romance of the farm, but, on the whole, the loss is more than made up by the gain of perfect system and wonderful adaptation. Instead of four or five cows, known by such names as Brindle, Bess, and Sukey, milked by rosy-cheeked maidens, we have now droves of fifty or a hundred, milked by men, who know them only as "good" or "poor milkers." In some fine farms a large and luxuriant pasture, with running brooks and border of woodland, affords, with the herd feeding in it, a beautiful picture; and the substantial barns constructed to keep the cattle comfortably cool in summer and warm in winter, with ample drinking troughs and stalls for fastening up at night, are indicative of the good shelter at hand when winter storms drive the cows indoors. To the farm-yards the cows are brought night and morning, in summer, to be milked. The strained milk is put into large cans holding forty quarts, such as the milkmen use in delivering it through the city. These cans are then put into tanks made in some cool running stream, where the water comes nearly to the top of the can. Frequent stirring is necessary until the animal heat is quite gone. The milk is then fit to be sent to the city. This process can never safely be omitted; for, paradoxical though it may seem, milk is "fresher" and sweeter when it reaches the consumer if it is delayed at the farm for at least twelve hours. Even in hot weather, it is more certain to keep sweet when twenty-four or thirty-six hours elapse between the milking and the using in the city. There has been much discussion as to the best means of cooling milk for market, and patent pails have been tried in which the milk passes directly from the cow through small, cooled tubes surrounded by ice. But this rapid cooling does not work well, and practical experience indicates that the old and simpler process is the best. Every well-appointed farm must have, therefore, a cool and unfailing stream of water. There are two such streams in one of the farms we visited. One passes through the barn, furnishing drinking-troughs for the cattle, and a tank for cooling milk in winter. The other, running through the pasture, supplies a trout-breeding pond, and furnishes a tank for summer use. It is a little lost under the trees, the milk-cans are kept in a stream which even the severe drought of last summer did not dry, nor the heat raise to a temperature of 60°.

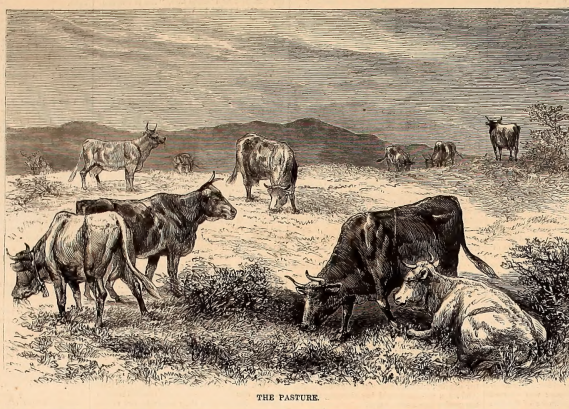
We are assured most positively that none of the spring-water finds its way over the mouth of the can into the milk. Its dilution, of which there is so much just complaint, must be done, if at all, in the city, for the wholesale buyer is said to have such means of testing the milk as effectually protects him against the farmer. Most of us must be busy at work who is to give each family such a protection! We have heard it said that one end of a small piece of common tape placed in a pan of milk will carry from it all the water into another vessel in which the other end of the tape should be placed; but we have never found this a safe test.

Strange to say, no butter is made on these large milk farms. The supply for the family is obtained from market, or, more rarely, from a neighbor who churns all his milk for the accommodation of those who send all theirs to the city. Our notions of the way to make butter were decidedly overturned on going to such a dairy. No setting of the milk in shallow pans for cream to rise; no skimming and putting away in jars until "churning day," when the thick cream was agitated by a strong arm until the butter came, then worked and salted. Instead, there is a daily pouring of the unskimmed, soured milk into a common churn, perhaps somewhat larger than ordinary. The dasher is fastened to a shaft, which is moved by a crank. The crank is turned by means of a nearly horizontal wheel some eight or ten feet in diameter, which is kept in motion by a dog, sheep, or calf standing on it, something after the manner of the old tread-mill. When taken from the churn, the butter is worked by hand, as of old. The farmer with whom we talked said he was about determined to send his milk to the creamery, since butter-making made it so hard for the women. Surely woman is less a drudge than she used to be. If, after being relieved from the labor of churning, the remaining working of the butter is considered too hard for the farmer's wife, the day of woman's redemption must be near at hand.

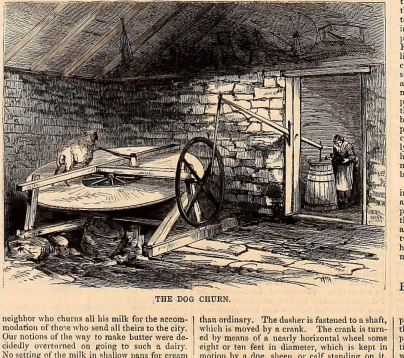
Only one butter farm have we been able to find, and not enough is made there to supply the immediate neighborhood. Where, then, does all the Orange County butter come from?—Mostly from the West. Farmers buy from the vicinity of the Alleghanies, and even further West, large quantities, which they sell in the original packages or repack in pails. Since railroads have become so numerous, New York drinks up all the milk in Orange County, and must butter her bread elsewhere.

The largest institution for the disposition of milk is the Creamery, which is, in other words, a cheese factory. Here is brought the milk which the farmers themselves are unable properly to prepare for market, for want of cool springs or sufficient help. Received here, it is placed in deep but narrow tin pails holding twelve or fourteen quarts. These are floated in large tanks of water. Such a one as our picture shows holds some four hundred pails. From these pails the cream is carefully taken and sent to market. The skimmed milk is then placed in a large vat and heated, by means of steam-pipes, to about 80°. Then the rennet is put in. From twenty to thirty minutes suffices for curdling, and the mass is then stirred to separate the curd from the whey. After which it is heated still more; and then the whey, passing off through a strainer, goes to feed hogs, while the curd remains in the vat, to be salted and worked before putting into the presses. In two or three hours the curds become hard enough for the canvas to be put upon them, and a few hours more in the presses make them ready for the shelves. Very carefully they must then be watched, lest the fly lying in wait for them makes in them a snug house for her family. Greasing and turning must be a daily labor, and some weeks must pass before they are sufficiently cured for market.

For the benefit of city consumers, who are paying ten and twelve cents a quart for milk, from a tenth to a quarter of which is not infrequently pure Croton, we may add that the highest price the farmer ever gets for his milk is seven cents a quart; and he sometimes sells it for as low as two cents and a half. Our friends, the milkmen, have, therefore, it will be seen, a pretty good margin for freight and profit.

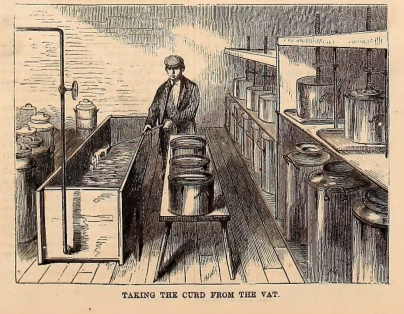


THE PASTURE.



THE DOG CHURN.

TANK FOR COOLING MILK.



TAKING THE CURD FROM THE VAT.

BRINGING TOBACCO TO MARKET

IN VIRGINIA FORTY YEARS AGO.

THE mode of transportation illustrated on page 797 was almost universally in vogue among the tobacco planters of Virginia within a comparatively short period, viz., up to the introduction of railroads into that State. A pair of rough wheels, composed of heavy planks buttered together, sawed round, and exceeding the hogs-head of tobacco two feet or thereabout in diameter, were firmly pinned to the heads of the hogshead, the pins running through into the tobacco. An axle, not running entirely through, nor properly an axle, as the wheel did not revolve upon it, projected on each side, and formed an attachment for the shafts; the box in front across the shafts was to carry provisions and forage. This rude means of transport was called "Rolling tobacco." A steer and horse hitched "tandem," as shown in the sketch, were frequently the "team." The darkey in coon-skin cap and woolen mittens cracks his whip at the straining animals; his small companion gathers a lingering persimmon (or "simmon," as he would call it) from a sapling; the hurehound, who has followed his sable master from home, is awakened for a moment by a rustling sparrow; the "Roll-er" crooks and grouns—and thus, within the memory of thousands now living in Eastern Virginia, the "cheering weed" was trundled to market, bespattered and unsightly.

PRIMITIVE MODE OF BRINGING TOBACCO TO MARKET IN VIRGINIA FORTY YEARS AGO.—DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.—[SEE PAGE 796.]

NEGRO BOYS PLAYING MARBLES—A STREET SCENE IN RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

CRAPPED HANDS AND FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured at once by the use of Hegeman's Camphor Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—HEGEMAN & CO., New York.

HOSTETTER is the best policy in medicine as well as in other things. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is a genuine preparation of that unequaled spring, medicine and blood purifier, decidedly superior to the poor imitations heretofore in the market. Trial proves it.—Cowen.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR BLACK WORMS and PIMPLES on the FACE, use PERRY'S COMEDONE AND PIMPLE REMEDY. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold every where.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

C. A. STEVENS & CO.,

49 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

are offering

A choice selection of Diamonds, Pearls, Sapphires, and other Gems, mounted in the most artistic manner. Also, Fine Jewelry of every variety. Watches from the best American and European manufacturers.

Silver and Plated Ware, a choice selection constantly on hand.

Particular attention given to the Resetting of Diamonds, and the manufacture of Silver Ware for Testimonials and Weddings, from original designs.

AGENTS for the SALE OF WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO. of MARION, New Jersey. Send for Circular.

Waltham Watches.

Bevvas of watches at retail should be on their guard against buying watches represented as "American," and which are usually advertised in connection with the words "Original Institution &c.," or other words calculated to attract attention. None of such of the many watches we advertise, or are now movements as are sold as Waltham, but only such as are made at the factory at Waltham. Beware of these worthless and false base colorable imitations of our trademarks. To avoid imposition, buyers who do not know responsible jewelers should first procure a descriptive catalogue of the different styles of watches made by the American Watch Company, of Waltham, Mass. The catalogue contains, in addition, much useful information to watchmakers. Address

ROBBINS & APPLETON, General Agents, 182 BROADWAY, New York.

A LIE UTTERED

by a million is still a falsehood. Bleeding is no error. Dosing is, too, and will be shunned; while WOLCOTT'S PAIN PANACEA will stand on the rock of truth. All can try it free at 181 Chatham Square, New York, and prove it. A plat sent, free of express charges, on receipt of $5, or a gallon for $20, double strength.

Ned Buntline's New Story

Buffalo Bill

The King of the Border Men

The Wildest Truest Tale he Ever Wrote

Will be Commenced at once in the

New York Weekly

BRAINARD'S

MUSICAL WORLD.

AN ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

Only $1 00 per Annum.

The best and most popular musical monthly in the world. Circulation, 20,000 copies. November and December Numbers, containing

SIX NEW PIECES OF MUSIC, sent to any address, as specimens, on receipt of Ten Cents. Elegant premiums for Clubs. Address

S. BRAINARD & SONS,
Music Publishers, Cleveland, Ohio.

DO NOT BE

CAUGHT

buying a CHRISTMAS PRESENT for your friends and children until you have seen the

Lozo Pendulum Board,

which is the best PARLOR GAME BOARD ever invented, being only 25 feet long and 12 inches wide.

It is lined with the finest brilliant cloth, and contains a combination of four popular and fascinating games, viz.:

BAGATELLE, TEN PINS, and POCKETS, RING TOSS.

We invite every body to call at our salesroom and examine it. If you can't come yourself, write to some friend in New York asking them to call.

Send for a descriptive catalogue and price-list.

It can be sent to any part of the United States before the Holidays.

NOVELTY GAME CO.,
14 MURRAY St., New York.

RUPTURES CURED

DR. J. A. SHERMAN,

Artistic Surgeon, respectfully offers his service in the application of his Rupture Curative Appliances, at his office, 697 BROADWAY, corner 4th Street.

The great experience of Dr. SHERMAN, resulting from his long and constant devotion to the treatment and cure of this disease, assures him of his ability to relieve all, without regard to the age of the patient or duration of the infirmity, or the difficulties which they may have heretofore encountered in seeking relief. Dr. S., as Principal of the Rupture Curative Institute, New Orleans, for a period of more than fifteen years, had under his care the worst cases in the country, all of which were effectually relieved, and many, to their great joy, restored to sound body.

None of the pains and injuries resulting from the use of other Trusses are found in Dr. Sherman's Appliances; and, with full knowledge of the assertion, he promises greater security and comfort, with a daily improvement in the disease, than can be obtained of any other person, or in the inventions of any other person in the United States.

Prices to suit all classes. It is the only, as well as the cheapest method ever offered. Elegant Photographic likenesses of cases before and after treatment furnished on receipt of ten cents.

The Companion is an eight-page weekly paper—practical in its character, wide-awake, and entertertaining.

It gives a great variety of reading, interesting alike to young and old—and has for contributors such writers as

Rev. Edward E. Hale, Harriet Beecher Stowe,
Mrs. Lucian Chandler Moulton, "Sophie May,"
Miss E. Stuart Phelps, Rev. Rufus C. Weeks,

together with many other well known and popular authors.

Subscription Price $1.50. Send for a specimen copy to

PERRY MASON & CO.,
Publishers Youth's Companion,
151 Washington St., BOSTON, MASS.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either Harper's Bazar, Weekly, Monthly, or Both, and The Phrenological Journal, $3, sent to one address for $5, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

AT LOW PRICES.

A Large Assortment of

ROBES DE CHAMBRE and HOUSE COATS,

For HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

E. A. NEWELL,
727 Broadway, cor. Waverly Place.

Eight per Cent. Gold.

The undersigned, as representatives of the ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY, have the honor to offer for sale the

$1,500,000

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

(PAYABLE IN GOLD)

OF THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD CO.,

Bearing Eight per Cent. Interest in Gold, Free of Government Tax, secured by a first and only mortgage on the railway, which runs from St. Joseph to Fort Kearney.

Total length of road, 271 miles.

Distance mortgaged, 111 miles; and at the rate of only $18,560 per mile on a completed road, costing to build and equip more than double the amount mortgaged.

Trustee for Bondholders: FARMERS' LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

This line of railroad is the extension of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, with its connections North and East, and the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad, with its connections South and East, both lines concerning at St. Joseph, and connecting at once with the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad, running West, through Eastern Kansas, into the heart of Nebraska, and connecting with the Union Pacific Railroad at the City of Fort Kearney, making the shortest route known to California and the Pacific States.

These bonds have thirty years to run from August 14, 1869. Payable at maturity, in Gold, in the City of New York.

The interest is payable in Gold on the 15th of February and August in each year, at the rate of 8 per cent., free of Government Tax, in New York, London, and Frankfort-on-the-Main, at the holder's option, without notice, and at the following equivalents:

ON $1000 BOND.

In New York	$40 gold.
In London	£8 4s. 6d.
In Frankfort-on-the-Main	166 Bor.

On $500 Bond, one half these amounts respectively.

The Bonds are in denominations of $1000 and $500. They are Coupon Bonds, but may be registered in the owner's name at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, and, by the execution of the blank power, to be converted into a Registered Bond, with interest payable to the registered owner.

Company's Capital Stock, $10,000,000, to which nearly $7,000,000 is subscribed and paid up by local subscriptions, which amount has and is being expended on the road.

The Company have $1,400,000 acres of superior land immediately adjoining the line. This was a grant direct from the United States Government to aid the Company in their work, and, at the Government price of $2 50 per acre, has a value of $4,000,000, while the loan is only $1,200,000, and is the only debt against the Company.

The issue of $1,500,000 of these Bonds is all that can be loaned by the Company.

Bonds sent and packages received free of express charge, and marketable securities converted without commission, to parties investing in these Bonds. We offer these Bonds at the low price of 87½ and accrued interest in currency, with the reserved right to advance the price without notice.

Pamphlets, maps, and information furnished on application.

Parties desiring safe and lucrative investments should lose no time in investigating these securities.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO.,
Commercial Agents,
54 Pine Street, New York.

TANNER & CO.,
Fiscal Agents,
49 Wall Street, New York.

Having had all the papers and documents relating to the loan examined by competent counsel and pronounced complete and sufficient, and having personally examined the same, which we find regular and perfect, and having had our own engineers examine the road and property, whose reports are satisfactory, we do, with the utmost confidence and satisfaction, recommend the EIGHT PER CENT. FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD BONDS OF THE ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY as a SAFE, SURE, AND PROFITABLE INVESTMENT, worthy the attention of capitalists, investors, and others.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO.
TANNER & CO.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon, all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of special and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly engaged in the department of Illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to the photographers in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions.

As a Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the only illustrated newspaper which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to pre-eminence.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of its most prominent features, its political weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

In No. 623, for November 20, was commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers remitting $4 00 for such single subscription will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and unprecedented ever known in the annals of journalism, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper ever issued. As an instructor and adviser of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. It is a special organ, devoted, in evolving new modes, to the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of Fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to literature, containing serial and short stories, Sketches, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Literature of the BAZAR is always pure, and never even a topic of social interest, fashion, or amusement will be passed over unless permanently secure for the journal the victory which it has won so rapidly and so well deserved.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now entered upon its Fortieth Volume. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by that of any other monthly periodical in America or Europe—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents. In the enlargement of the plan, and the securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions of English and American authors, as to its profusely illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration; to the purity, completeness, and popular treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon the mechanical improvements of the day, and upon current topics; and to the variety and interest of its Literary Editorial Departments—to which, also, a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The elements which have made the success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be the leading characteristics, and its publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to enhance even its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in the English language. Therefore the increase at the disposal of its Publishers will enable them to avail themselves of all the topics current in the day.

The Publishers feel themselves warranted in asking a liberal participating for the future a continuance of the favor which has been accorded to their enterprise in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable strictly in advance by quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 96 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence every year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred to Bank Notes, as, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the owner.

———

☞ Subscribers slowly to either of Harper's Periodicals can be furnished from the present time to the close of 1870 for Four Dollars.

———

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200: Half Page, $150: Quarter Page, $75—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A.T. STEWART & CO.

ARE MAKING

A LARGE REDUCTION

in the prices of the Goods

IN ALL THE DEPARTMENTS OF THEIR RETAIL ESTABLISHMENT, Viz.:

Silks, Velvets, Dress Goods,
Laces, Embroideries, Furs,
ASTRAKHAN and SEALSKIN JACKETS,
SHAWLS, HOSIERY,
Ladies', Misses', Children's, and Infants' Wearing Apparel,
GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING GOODS,
UPHOLSTERY and CURTAIN MATERIALS,
CARPETS, HOUSEKEEPING GOODS, &c.,
and
PARTICULARLY REQUEST AN INSPECTION OF THE SAME, without importunity to purchase.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., and 10TH ST.

S. W. GEERY,
IMPORTER,
Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 710 Broadway,
Established in 1854. New York.
The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.
My stock contains some of the Oldest Liquors in the country.
Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be attended for (in the city) every morning, if desired.
Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

Notes for December,

ADDRESSED TO

THE FEEBLE AND DEBILITATED.

This is a trying season for invalids—indeed, for all who are not blessed with robust constitutions and iron frames.

Cold low come upon us suddenly, sealing up the open pores, and sealing in, as it were, any seeds of disease that may have been lurking in the system, but which remained undeveloped so long as the waste matter of the body and all acid and unwholesome humors were freely discharged by evaporation from the surface and through the bowels.

A tonic, aperient, and alterative medicine is now needed to invigorate the vital powers depressed by a low temperature; to stimulate and purify the secretions, and to keep the system open, notwithstanding inclemence, pain, or danger, the sudden climatic change which ushers in the Winter.

The one great remedy which will fully meet this almost universal need, and will thoroughly and safely perform the latent work, is the leading tonic and alterative of the age,

HOSTETTER'S
STOMACH BITTERS.

This popular specific improves the appetite, invigorates the digestive organs, regulates the flow of bile, enriches the blood, calms the nerves, relieves constipation, promotes superficial circulation and evaporation, and, being composed solely of wholesome vegetable elements, with a pure stimulant as their diffusive vehicle, may be taken by the weakest without fear. The flavor is agreeable; for although the BITTERS are a potent medicine, they contain no nauseating element.

Rascality Rampant!

Swindlers in Arms!—The "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" is illustrated with wood cuts by real exposures of the "Tricks and Traps" of Swindlers. One recent effort, which we "let slumber," is "See Declaration of Banners." Swindlers "ventilated." The "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" for fourteen years upon the platform. Jan. 1869. It is a large illustrated 40-column paper, 8 weeks. Letter size. Sent upon subscribing with splendid reading. It is devoted to Literature, Poetry, Wit, Wisdom and to our fellow-beings subjected to venerable or unjust. The superb Seed Engraving by "Evergreen," 8 x 7 feet in size, mounted on a roller, is sent prepaid and gratis to every subscriber. Only 75 cents a year. Now in nineteenth year. Money will be refunded if you are not perfectly satisfied. Remember, these will be rolled for 75 cents. It will save you money. All newsdealers sell it. Only 5 cents. Send 3 cents stamp for small 1871 size Seed Plate and Engraving gratis. Dec. No. sent for 6 cents. Address STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S
Establishment for the sale of
HOUSE FURNISHING
Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at
1172 Broadway, cor. 28th Street.
Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Work and their own manufactures. Old household articles requiring Replating done on short notice. They are also prepared to contract for Bell Work and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

Carbolic Salve.

Prepared with Carbolic Acid, which is used in Hospitals, by direction of Physicians as of most eminent standing where every. Possesses the most remarkable healing properties ever discovered. 25 cts. per Box. John F. Henry, Proprietor, 8 College Place, N. Y.

SEND ONE DOLLAR, and get by return mail the prettiest Picture you can give a Lady this Christmas—Lovejoy's Floral Picture, beautifully with her initials. Address LORING, Publisher, Boston.

Stammering cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet address Simpson & Co., Box 5076, N. Y.

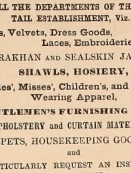
THE CELEBRATED
IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES,
"COLLINS METAL,"
Improved Oroide.



These justly celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established, as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Horizontal Watches, $10, equal in appearance and for time to Gold Watches worth $100. Full-Jeweled Levers, $18, equal to $150 Gold ones: Full-Jeweled Levers, extra fine and superior finish, $20, equal to $200 Gold ones.

We have just completed making a very fine American Watch, full jeweled, Patent Lever, chronometer balance, compensation for heat and position, 4½ centre down weight, equal in appearance and for time to a Gold Watch costing $150.

We charge only $25 for these magnificent Watches. All our watches are in Hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Chatan, Collins Metal, $6 to $8. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

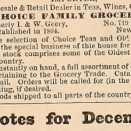
CALIFORNIA DIAMONDS.

We are now making Jewelry of the California Diamonds. These are real stones of great brilliancy and hardness, and can not be distinguished from the genuine stones, even by good judges. They are particularly brilliant at night by artificial light, do not scratch or become dull by use, and retain their brilliancy for an indefinite time. The following are the prices:

Ladies' and Gents' Finger Rings, single stones, one carat wt	$5 each.
Gents' Fine, single stone, according to the size of the stone	$3 to $6.
Ladies' Cluster Pins	$7 50.
Ladies' Cluster Earrings	$7 00.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free.
Goods sent by Express to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.



DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!
A
Novelty Job Printing-Press.
The only Low-Priced Press for envelope printing. Printing can be done on both and on inside up on this press as on the best job printers used, and the printing-offices where artificial power is not used, for business men, agents, lawyers, grocers, country traders, and others who desire to do their own printing, it is entirely found a rival. The Best Holiday Gift for Boys. Price of Presses—$15, $30, $32, and $50. Send for full descriptive illustrated circulars, with testimonials from all parts of the country, and specimens of plain and fancy printing done on the press, and specimen sheets of types, borders, cuts, rules, &c., by BENJ. O. WOODS, Proprietor, 81 Federal Street, Boston, Mass.

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!
NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH
AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It consists of the use of an inhalation of harmless liquids—they are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing, and powerful. Send for a book of comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in due course of time. The inhalation of the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at its fountain head—removes at once all the symptoms, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat, rolling in the head, sneezing, loss of smell, of memory, dimness of vision, and restores the sense of taste and smell. It thoroughly extinguishes this fearsome malady in all its forms forever, and cures the most loathsome. Price, $5. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, office 11 Ann St., N. Y.

CHAS. A. DANA, Editor.
The cheapest, smartest, and best Sun in the universe. Everybody likes the Sun. Only 66c. a month; $4 a year; $2 for six months; ALL OR NONE. Sun subscribers get reports of markets, agriculture, farmers' and dairy, and all the news. Sun subscribers get every Weekly and Semi-Weekly number. A present of valuable goods and cash to every Sun subscriber. Agents wanted everywhere. Cash $100 Gift Enterprise. Grand Pianos, Sewing Machines, Parlor Organs, Sewing Machines, &c., among the premiums. Specimens and Show Bill 2 Dollar and by
I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher Sun, New York.

"One of the best in the country."

So says the Boston Journal of the

NEW ENGLAND FARMER,

the leading Agricultural paper of New England.

Terms: Weekly, $2 50; Monthly, $1 50, per year.
Send stamp for specimens and premium list.
R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

TWO NICE NEW GAMES:
"Words Within Words' and "Blowing Cotton."
Puzzling and amusing to old and young. They are sure to be favorites in every family circle. The two games, in a neat box, by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the publishers,
G. M. WHIPPLE & A. S. BATCHELLER, Concord, N. H.

"Containing Every Thing of Interest,"
SO SAYS THE "ASHEVILLE NEWS" OF THE
NEW YORK OBSERVER.
$3 50 PER ANNUM.
SAMPLE COPIES FREE.
SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

"DOUGH AND READY; or, Life with the Hon. Stephen A. Douglas. By Philip Rugged Dick" Book, cents $1 25 by mail, from LORING, Publisher, Boston.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR
PRIEST and NUN.
Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 1308 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

BOOSEY'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.
A Complete Catalogue now ready. Send free. Boosey's "Ballad Singer," the new Half-Dime Series of the Best Songs. Sold every where, or specimen number mailed for Five Cents.—644 Broadway, N. Y.

TOYS FOR THE HOLIDAYS, at Gidney's Bazaar, 394 Canal St., Public School and Toy Bazaar, 479 Broadway, between Grand and Broome Streets. LEWIS F. GIDNEY.

FRENCH CLOCKS,
BRONZES,
FANCY GOODS,
MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,
Opera Glasses,
FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,
PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES,
WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,
No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,
The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.
☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with employment at home, the whole of the time or for their spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily can from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportionate sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer:—To all who are not well satisfied we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, directions, and valuable which is constantly at work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want profitable, publish work, address E. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Maine.

THE DOLLAR WATCH.—A perfect timekeeper, with superior compass attachment. Cased in pure Oroide of Gold, enameled dial, glass crystal, steel and brass works. Dead watch size. Made entirely of metal, and in elegantly-finished Oroide case. Entirely new—patented. A perfect "curiosity of ingenuity." This is no wooden compass. Warranted five years. Satisfaction guaranteed. Single sample, in neat case, mailed prepaid for only $1, three for $2, by addressing the sole manufacturers,
MAGNETIC WATCH CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

For Family use. Simple, cheap, reliable. Knits every thing. All Stitches. Price $10. Circular and sample stocking FREE. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 19 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

CHRISTMAS and New Year.—Clemence's C. Garment Supporter and Jaconet Family Scissors Sharpener. Price, each, 50 cents. Sent by mail, where prepaid. Supporter, $1; Sharpener, 25c. Great inducements to Agents. Address C. Audibon, Rochester, N. Y.

Kidney Complaints, Gravel, Stricture, and all Organic Troubles cured by using the SAN SPRING WATER.
Book of thirty pages, with certificates, sent free. Address SAN SPRING WATER, Saratoga, N. Y.

A WELL-PAYING BUSINESS is offered to A Agents everywhere, by the Andrews Publishing Co., in their new publication, HOW TO DO BUSINESS or Everything Business for the Winter should wide-awake or our out-door men across the U. S. Circulars, &c., free.

A FEMALE Resident Agent wanted in every town in the United States, to perform easy labor at their homes, by which they can make $2 or $4 an evening. Cash sent in advance. Address
B. DURANT, Box 5643, New York City.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs or poisons, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

THE MAGIC CHURN will change any colored cream or bread to a permanent Black or Brown. One Comb sent by mail for 50 cts. For sale by Merchants & Druggists generally. Address Magic Comb Co., Springfield, Mass.

HOWES Never-Failing Aqua Cure and Tonic Bitters. Howe's Concentrated Compound Syrup for Pulmonary diseases —Incipient Consumption, Catarrh, Cancer, &c., every bottle $1 each. Howes & Co., Seneca Falls, N. Y.

TOOL Chests and Tables.—Are elegant, useful, and instructive. Suitable for boys, machinists, and mechanics. Send for illustrated circular. Address GEORGE PARR, Buffalo, New York.

SYADILOH ERT ROF NUF.—Scientific Paper-Tube. Will make no Lamp. By mail, 25c. FLETCHER & CO., 17 Nassau St.

MRS. WHITNEY'S New Novel "Hitherto," or A Story of Yesterdays," cents $2 00 by mail, from LORING, Publisher, Boston.

Collegiate and Commercial Institute (General Science's School), New Haven, Ct. Winter term begins Jan. 11.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

1.
HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For the General Reference. Edited by Benjamin Vincent, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Revised for the Use of American Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

2.
LOST IN THE JUNGLE. Narrated for Young People. By Paul B. Du Chaillu, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," "Wild Life under the Equator," "Journey to Ashango Land," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," &c. With numerous Engravings. Square 16mo, Cloth, $1 75.

3.
WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By James Greenwood, Author of "The Wilds of London," "Low-Life Deeps," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

4.
MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. By Justin McCarthy, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbours." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

5.
THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. Gustav Hartwig. With "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Harmonies of Nature," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

6.
THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By John S. C. Abbott, Author of "The French Revolution," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

7.
WRECKED IN PORT. A Novel. By Edmund Yates, Author of "Kissing the Rod," "Land at Last," "Black Sheep," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

8.
THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH BONAPARTE, King of Naples and of Spain. By C. A. Fyffe, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

9.
A BOGGAR OR HORSEBACK; or, A County Paper. A Novel. By the Author of "One of the Family," "Carlyon's Year," "Found Dead," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

10.
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Scenery, Biography, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, LL.D. With "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 841 Illustrations, engraved on wood by Lossing and Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume. 1094 pages, Royal 8vo, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco, $10 00; Full Calf, $12 00.

11.
GEORGE ELIOT'S NOVELS. Complete. Harper's Illustrated Library Edition. Complete in 8 vols., 12mo, Morocco Cloth, 75 cents per volume. The set, complete, in a neat case, $6 00.
ADAM BEDE.—THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.—FELIX HOLT.—SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE and SILAS MARNER.—ROMOLA.

12.
TRACKWAY'S NOVELS:
A Story of Life and Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Pensewick. 179 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cts.—The Same. 180 Illustrations. 4to, Paper, 75 cents.—The Newcomes. 162 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.—The Adventures of Philip. 46 Illustrations and Portrait of Author. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—Henry Esmond. 24 Illustrations. The Widow's. 12 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

13.
CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:
Hard Cash. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.—Griffith Gaunt; or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.—It is Never Too Late to Mend. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.—Put Yourself in His Place. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.—Foul Play. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.—Very Hard Cash. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.—The Woffington, Christie Johnstone, and Other Stories. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.—The Cloister and the Hearth. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will for the next thirty days dispose of 1000 Pianos of different styles, at first-class makers, at extremely low prices for Cash during this Month. Those wishing to take from $5 to $25 monthly until paid; the same to let, and if sold, the money applied to rent. New 7-Octave Pianos for $175 and upward; New Organs for $48 and upward, for cash.

Extraordinary power, with wide field of observation, in Pocket Telescope. Price, $3. HINE GLASSES, portable and convenient. Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price. Address H. C. HINE, 667 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's School and Family Charts.
To examine before state in Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. Address D. APPLETON & CO., 549 and 551 Broadway, New York; or HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

HORRIBLE!—I suffered with CATARRH 15 Thirty Years. Tried in vain every thing. Finally discovered a remedy that will send the receipt, postage free, to all afflicted. Address REV. WM. H. MEAD, Hanover 176, Syracuse, New York.

POCKET REVOLVERS. WEST'S SAFETY.
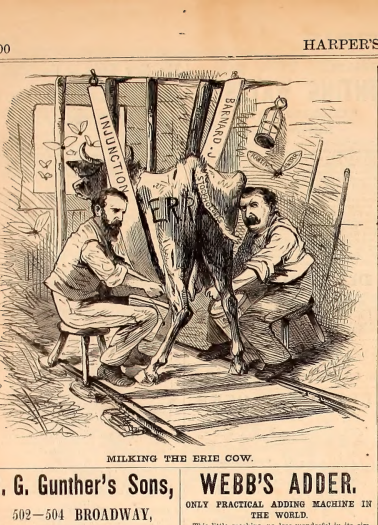
A best, durable weapon; four-inch barrel. Price $1 50, postage 20 cents. Address S. C. WEST, Lisbon, N. Y.

AGENTS can make $200 per month by selling our Silver-Plating Fluid. $8 per dozen.
RICHMOND & ROSTER, Seneca Falls, N. Y.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.
Mrs. M. C. LEGGETT, Brooklyn, N. J.

The Novelty Job Printing-Presses, for Printers, Merchants, & Amateurs. Prices, $15, $30, & $50. Send for descriptive circulars. C. C. THURSTON, Boston, Mass.

$290 First-class new 7-Octave Pianos. Sent on trial. U. S. PIANO CO., New York.



MILKING THE ERIE COW.

C. G. Gunther's Sons,

502—504 BROADWAY,

Offer a very Elegant Assortment of Novelties in

SEAL AND ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, TURBANS, Boas, Ties, &c.

Hatter and Furrier.

DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
717 BROADWAY,
offers at low prices:

LADIES' FINE FURS in every variety: SEAL and ASTRAKHAN SACQUES AND TURBANS; WHITE FOX MUFFS AND BOAS; CHILDREN'S FURS, GENTS' FURS, &c.
Importer of ENGLISH HATS for Gentlemen's Wear.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.

(Patented June 1, 1869.)

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French patents, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY, DURABILITY and CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
Wallingford, Conn.
Sample and Sale Room, 19 John St., N.Y.

The best and cheapest Alarm Till Lock and Drawer in the world. Retail price, only $5. Great inducements offered to agents. Send for private circular.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 118 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 72 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOSCOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUERY & CO.
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

A Holiday Present—Polished & Sun manufacture warranted Genuine Meerschaum Goods. Stores: 819 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel, & 26 John St., middle of block. Send for circular to Letter-Box 3546. Also, Repairing and Boiling done.

Ahearn's Patents.

Purchasers wanted for every State and County not yet sold. $1000 and expenses can be made weekly on every $200 invested. For particulars, address
J. AHEARN, 0 P. O. Avenue, Baltimore, Md.

CHEAPEST PAPER in the WORLD.—Rich, Rare, Racy: full of Fact, Fun, and Fancy; sure to please "all hands." Only 50 cts. a year; valuable premiums to subscribers and agents. Specimens, Six Cents. Say where you saw this.
Address UNION BANNER, Belfast, Maine.

AGENTS.—ORODIE GOLD. AGENTS. $20 a day made easy. Orodie Gold Pen & Pencil Pen. Is indestructible. Writes 4 pages with one dip. Sells at sight—looks like 14-carat Gold. Sample box, 12 pens, for 25 cents, postpaid; also other novelties. City Novelty Co., 484 Liberty St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WEBB'S ADDER.

ONLY PRACTICAL ADDING MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

This little machine, no less wonderful in its simplicity than in its efficacy, has won a more speedy success than any other invention of the day. While the sewing machine had to struggle through long years for adoption, Webb's Adding Machine was accepted at once. Where numbers are called off, it gives instantaneous addition. It carries up the column in a ledger account, two at a time, with mechanical accuracy. The President of the First National Bank of New York writes in his testimonial, "IT RELIEVES THE MIND ENTIRELY, AND REDUCES ARITHMETIC TO A SIMPLE MOTION OF THE HAND!" The machine took the first medals and diplomas at the last American Institute Fair, New York, and also at the last Mass. State Fair, in Boston. It is guaranteed to do every thing claimed for it, and the report comes from nearly all who use it that not enough is claimed—that it does more. Price $8 and $10. Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage (6 cents), or by express, C. O. D., at the customer's expense. To remit (post-office order, registered letter, or draft) saves the return-money charge. For circular, testimonials, &c., enclose stamp. Agents and Canvassers (cash exclusive) for sale. WEBB ADDING MACHINE CO.
E. P. DUTTON & CO., Selling Agents,
713 Broadway, New York.

Le Van's IMPROVED GOVERNOR,
with
Balance-Valve Combined,

Warranted to give entire satisfaction. One will be sent to any responsible party on thirty days' trial, to be returned at my expense, if not as represented. Price-List and Photographs sent free.

W. Barnet Le Van & Co.,
S. E. Cor. 24th and Wood Sts.,
PHILADELPHIA.

FISHERMEN! TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.) Baltimore, Md.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by nearly every Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods, Swiss Carved Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. A. J. PARKER & CO., 650 BROADWAY, N. Y.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the sleeping-room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. Thousands who are using it testify to its merits. Send for Pamphlet.
E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N. Y.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS SOAP AND SAPOLIO
211 WASHINGTON ST., N. Y.

Holiday Presents.—A suitable Present is a Meerschaum Pipe or Holder, Plain or Carved, of the best material; a large variety, at manufacturers' prices, at Kalbfleisch's, 6 John St., next Br'dw'y, & 71 Nassau cor. John. Formerly 23 Wall. Send for Circular & Price-List. P. O. Box 6734.

TO THE LADIES.—One week's time, pleasant employ, will pay for a first-rate Sewing Machine. Address COREY D. KELSEY,
129 Lexington Ave., New York.

IMPORTANT!—Health and pleasure in the use of Ayer's Pat. Pulaski Bitters. Testimonials and description sent by DUDLEY & ROCKWELL, Buffalo, N.Y.

HARVEY FISK. A. S. HATCH.

Office of FISK & HATCH,

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities.

No. 5 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK, November 8, 1869.

To our Customers and Correspondents:

The surprising development of our national resources, and the rapidity with which the Government is now enabled to reduce the national debt, by weekly purchases, render it apparent that the time is approaching when the Five-Twenty bonds may be funded at not over four or four and a half per cent interest.

Meanwhile their high price, as compared with other classes of securities paying an equal rate of interest, is leading to general inquiry for more profitable forms of investment in which money may be safely invested.

During the war the necessities and peril of the Government, and the consequent cheapness of its securities, rendered them so attractive that, from this cause, combined with the patriotic faith of the people in their safety, they absorbed almost the entire floating capital of the country, and diverted attention from other classes of securities which had before been deemed sufficiently conservative and sound to meet the wants of the most cautious investors.

The Government is no longer a borrower. It no longer needs the country's capital, but desires gratefully and honorably to repay it.

The rapid accumulation of capital for investment, and the reduction of the national debt and improvement of the national credit—rendering it certain that hereafter but a comparatively low rate of interest can be derived from investment in Government bonds—is compelling the search for other safe and well-guarded channels into which capital not employed in business may wisely flow.

The enterprises of Peace, no less needful in their time and place, for the common welfare, than were the waste and cost of War, now call for the capital which the Government no longer needs, and offer for its use a remuneration which the Government need no longer pay, and, in some cases, a security as stable and enduring as the faith of the nation itself.

The desire to capitalize the premium which may now be realized upon Five-Twenty bonds, and which a material decline in Gold toward par, and the ability of the Government to fund them at a lower rate of interest, may at any time extinguish, is felt by many holders who desire some satisfactory assurance as to which of the many lower-priced securities in the market would afford the necessary safety to justify an exchange.

The applications for information and advice which are addressed to us daily, show how universal is the desire for this assurance as to what forms of investment more profitable than Government securities at present market rates are entitled to the confidence of investors.

The pressure of this want has led us to feel the importance of directing our own attention as bankers, our large experience, and our facilities for obtaining reliable information, to the work of supplying it in some measure, and to offer the results of our inquiries to those who may be disposed to confide in our good faith and judgment.

We are unwilling to offer to our friends and the public any thing which, according to our best judgment, is not as secure as the national obligations themselves, with which we have hitherto principally identified ourselves.

Since closing the GREAT CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD LOAN, which meets all these requirements, we have carefully examined many others, but have found no other which would fully do so, until the following was placed in our hands:

FIRST MORTGAGE
Six per Cent. Gold Bonds
OF THE
WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.,
OF CALIFORNIA.

The Western Pacific Railroad, connecting Sacramento with San Francisco, furnishes the final link in the extraordinary fact of an unbroken line of rail from the shore of the Atlantic to that of the Pacific.

It is 150 miles in length, including a short branch, and it will be the

METROPOLITAN LINE OF THE PACIFIC COAST,

connecting its chief cities, and traversing the garden of the rich and growing State of California; receiving, in addition to an immense and lucrative local traffic, the through business over the Union and Central Pacific Railroads—between the Eastern States and Sacramento.

It is completed, fully equipped, and in successful operation, and its earnings in October—the first full month—amounted to $105,000 in coin. The net earnings will, by a moderate estimate, amount to $600,000 per annum, in coin, while the interest on its Bonds will be but $163,000.

The value of the property and franchises is not less than

TEN MILLIONS OF DOLLARS, and the amount of the mortgage is $2,800,000.

The bonds are of $1000 each, have thirty years to run, and will be sold at

NINETY, AND ACCRUED INTEREST, in currency. They are made payable, PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST, IN GOLD COIN, in the city of New York. Coupons due January and July 1st.

The near approach of the time when the United States can probably fund the greater portion of its Six per cent. debt, is naturally causing inquiry for other forms of investment which will afford satisfactory security with the same rate of interest. THE WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS must have an immense advantage over all other securities based upon merely local or uncompleted railroads, and may be held with as much confidence as Government bonds, or as first-class mortgages on New York City property.

The loan is small in amount. Its claims to confidence are apparent. It will be rapidly taken. Bonds will be delivered as the orders are received.

Government bonds received at their full market value in exchange.

FISK & HATCH, Bankers.

☞ We buy and sell Government Bonds, and receive the accounts of Banks, Bankers, Corporations, and others, subject to check at sight, and allow interest on daily balances.

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES
AT
UNION ADAMS & CO.

FOR LADIES.

Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Merino Hosiery,
Kid and Castor Gloves.

FOR MISSES.

Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Patent Union Dresses,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Cashmere Hosiery,
Roman and Fancy Sashes.

No. 637 BROADWAY.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 677.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

REYNARD'S BREAKFAST.

THIS spirited illustration of forest life tells its own story so well as hardly to require a word of explanation. Master REYNARD, always a diligent provider for his household, has evidently left his cozy den in the early hours of a winter morning on a foraging expedition. While the gray mist still hangs low over forest and marsh, he has made his way stealthily down to the border of the lake, where, no doubt, he has often replenished his exhausted larder. Creeping noiselessly over the yielding snow, he has surprised a family of ducks, sleeping in fancied safety among the rocks. Not a sound gives warning of danger to their quick sense of hearing. Pushing aside the intervening reeds, without causing the rustle of a leaf, the sly marauder creeps nearer and nearer to the place where they nestle, until within easy reach of them. A quick spring, and he has seized the selected victim by the neck, slung him over his shoulder, and trotted up the bank with his prey; while the startled mate, with a shrill scream of affright, soars away into the air.

How admirably the artist manages the details that tell the story of this little woodland tragedy—the gray, wintry atmosphere, the snow banked against the old tree trunk on the left, and looding down the leafless twigs, the reely bank and the black water from whose margin Master REYNARD has snatched his prey. The half-open wings and drooping neck show that the sharp jaws have done their fatal work. In another moment the lucky forager will turn the corner round the old tree, and, with his victim slung over his shoulder, trot merrily back to his expectant household.

REYNARD'S BREAKFAST.

CURIOUS SHOWERS.

THERE are sometimes real showers of very unreal rain. It is stated by an old writer that in Lapland and Finmark, about a century ago, mice of a particular kind were known to fall from the sky; and that such an event was sure to be followed by a good year for foxes. A shower of frogrefll near Toolouse in 1804. A prodigious number of black insects, about an inch in length, descended in a snow-storm at Fakroff, in Rossia, in 1827. On one occasion, in Norway, the peasants were astonished at finding a shower of rats pelting down on their heads. Showers of fishes have been numerous. At Stanstead, in Kent, in 1666, a pasture-field was found, one morning, covered plentifully with fish, although there is neither sea nor river, lake nor fish-pond near. At Allahabad, in 1839, an English officer saw a good smart down-pour of fish, and soon afterward thousands of small dead fish were found upon the ground. Scotland has had many of these showers of fish; as in Ross-shire, in 1828, when quantities of herring-fry covered the ground; at Islay, in 1830, when a large number of herrings were found strewed over a field after a heavy, gusty rain; at Wick, much more recently, when herrings were found in large quantities in a field half a mile from the beach. In all these, and numerous other cases, when a liberal allowance has been made for exaggeration, the remainder can be explained by well-understood causes. Stray wind blowing from a sea or river; a water-spout licking up the fish out of the water; a whirlwind sending them hither and thither: all these are intelligible. The rat-shower in Norway was an extraordinary one; thousands of rats were taking their annual excursion from a hilly region to the lowlands, when a whirlwind overtook them, whisked them up, and deposited them in a field at some distance—doubtless much to the astonishment of such of the rats as came down alive.

The so-called showers of blood have had their day of terror and marvel, and have disappeared. Not that any one ever saw such a shower actually fall; but red spots have occasionally been seen on walls and stones, much to the popular dismay. Swammerdam, the naturalist, told the people of the Hague, two centuries ago, that these red spots were connected with some phenomena of insect life; but they would not believe him, and insisted that the spots were real blood, and were portents of evil times to come. Other naturalists have since confirmed the scientific opinion.

AFRICAN DISCOVERY.

At the time of writing his last dispatch (dated June, 1868), Dr. Livingstone had not reached Lake Tanganyika, which is believed to flow into the Nile; but he had found a chain of lakes to the south which drained toward the north, and, as he believed, through Lake Tanganyika into that river. These lakes are fed by numerous rivers of considerable size, and should they prove to be the head-waters of the Nile, we must look for the sources of the mighty river at least four hundred miles south of the most southerly point of the Victoria Nyanza. The River Chambese seems to connect these lakes with each other and with the Tanganyika, and the whole volume of water which they contain in all probability finds its way into the Nile. We must wait for further information before we can say positively that these lakes and rivers are within the basin of the Nile, but there is every probability that the opinions which have been expressed in favor of this hypothesis will soon be verified. Meanwhile we can not but feel extremely interested in the descriptions which Dr. Livingstone gives of the places which he has visited, and which prove that in the region now opened up for the first time there are spots as beautiful and as blessed by nature as any thing that we can imagine. Speaking of Lake Liemba, one of the chain which he has discovered, Dr. Livingstone tells us that "it lies in a hollow, with precipitous sides 2000 feet down; it is extremely beautiful, sides, top, and bottom being covered with trees and other vegetation. Elephants, buffaloes, and antelopes feed on the steep slopes; while hippopotami, crocodiles, and fish swarm in the water. Guns being unknown, the elephants, unless sometimes deceived into a pitfall, have it all their own way. It is as perfect a natural paradise as Zenophon could have desired. On two rocky islands men till the land, rear goats, and catch fish, the villages ashore are empowered in the palm-oil palms of the west coast of Africa." Livingstone's present journey has only confirmed what was brought to light in his previous travels, viz.: that instead of the interior of Africa being a sandy desert, as was formerly thought, it is really rich in vegetation, and studded with lakes." But there is another fact which Livingstone has discovered in connection with Lake Liemba, and which goes far toward outweighing all others in importance. The effluent of this lake the doctor ascertained to be 2840 feet, thus showing that Speke's observations were incorrect, and that Mr. Emley was probably right in saying Speke had made a mistake of about 1000 feet in his calculations. But we must wait until Dr. Livingstone communicates the detailed information which will enable geographers to pronounce their final judgment on the Nile question. If the great explorer traces the lake system which he has discovered into the Tanganyika, and should find, on arriving at Ujiji, the stores and medicines sent there for his use, he will proceed to the northern end of the lake, and perhaps follow its effluent to Sir Roderick Murchison thinks he will return to Zanzibar after having ascertained the direction of the drainage of the Tanganyika; but Captain Osmond Osborn considers that he will probably follow the outlet, and see for himself whether it flows into the Albert N'yanza, and thence into the Nile. In the latter case, Dr. Livingstone would, in all likelihood, meet Sir Samuel Baker, and the result of this meeting would be to clear up the great mystery which for centuries has shrouded the head-waters of the Nile.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1869.

ARE SPAIN AND PERU AT WAR?

THERE is one important point in regard to the Spanish gun-boats. Is there war between Spain and Peru? And if so, can the United States permit the departure of war vessels built for one of the belligerents, upon any pretext that is not a declaration of war by the vessels? England acknowledged the belligerent rights of the rebellion in this country. If, then, the agents of the rebel authority had said to the British Government that the Alabama was intended, not to make war upon the United States, but to be a marine police, to prevent the escape of slaves, or to do any thing that might be required, excepting to harm the United States, would the British Government, in the opinion of this country, have been justified in allowing the departure of the Alabama?

Suppose that one of the Spanish gun-boats sails from New York, receives her armament and encounter a Peruvian ship, will the quietly sail by? Or suppose that, sailing from New York and receiving her armament, one of the gun-boats takes the place of some other Spanish ship of war, and so releases it to fight the Peruvian ship, have we not flagrantly violated our neutrality? What is the essence of neutrality? It is not that the neutral will not take either belligerent to strengthen himself in the neutral port? Or can a neutral permit a belligerent who is engaged both in a domestic and a foreign war, to strengthen himself in the neutral port upon the plea that his intention is the domestic and not the foreign difficulty? If a belligerent is strengthened, is he not necessarily strengthened against all his antagonists? In a word, if you give a man food, must you take his word for it that the nourishment is all going into his stomach, and not into the legs? Can you feed him without strengthening both arms? If there be war between Spain and Peru, how can we, as our most neutral, permit Spain to use us as her naval base?

These are very serious questions, and the rightful departure of the Spanish gun-boats would seem to depend upon the plain, whether there is war between Spain and Peru. About eighteen months since, the relations of those two countries were the subject of correspondence between their Ministers and our Government, when Peru wished us to allow the departure of the two monitors, the Oneota and the Catawba. The Spanish Minister at Lima, in 1858, that if there was still war between the countries, it was not the fault of Spain, which had suspended hostilities since 1866, but at the friendly request of Mr. SEWARD; but peace had not been accepted by the allied states of Peru and Chili, and therefore he hoped that we would not violate our neutrality. In reply, Mr. SEWARD said that Peru insisted that war had ceased by the suspension of hostilities, and that Spain had virtually acknowledged the claim by making an arrangement with Chili to clear ships of war from British ports. The President would not undertake to decide whether war had actually ceased. The question was difficult. Collateral facts must determine it. The Peruvian Minister declared that the situation of the two countries was one of "imperfect peace." There had been no treaty; but actually the war had ceased, and Peru would not resume it unless provoked by fresh hostilities. Yet the Minister insisted that, while there was no treaty, the war might "be renewed at any moment."

After deliberate consideration, the United States permitted the departure of the monitors, not upon the ground that war did not exist, but that there was then no condition of belligerency between the two powers which would justify their detention. Has the situation changed, and can the Peruvian Minister now justly declare that there is war between the countries? It is not two years since the Minister of Peru said that war might be renewed at any moment: not begun, but renewed. It can not be supposed that the recognition of Cuba by Peru has tended to confirm the belligerent, and any overt act upon the part of Peru would renew the war, which the Spanish Minister in May, 1868, insisted must not be considered ended.

The United States did not express an opinion upon the question of war. The Government merely recognized the practical but not binding suspension of hostilities. It is for Peru to take another view upon the representation of the Minister of either power or of both powers. If, in May, 1868, the Spanish Minister, during the armistice, said that Spain and that there is nevertheless a state of war, and the Peruvian Minister in July, 1869, says also, during the same armistice, that there is war, why should not the United States say that war must be accepted as the situation, since both powers declare that, despite the suspension, there is war? As the existing rights of neutral duties are obvious; and the gun-boats must apparently be detained, unless it can be shown that they are merchandise not amenable to the laws of neutrality.

THE BATTLE OF THE SCHOOLS.

IN a battle the great point is to choose your ground wisely, and then stand to your guns. This is what must be done in the battle that we must fight for the common school system in this country. Oddly enough, the country is so large and hospitable, offering a home to the world, and announcing a political principle which gives them all equal rights, that its perils spring from the multitudes it invites and the conditions upon which it prides itself. For instance, by one peculiar provision of the great electoral system, two or three great States may elect a President. Of the chief of these great States the chief city is a foreign mass, politically, almost to control the State. The population of that city is largely composed of foreigners, and the worst part of the foreign-born population, and announcing a political power

The confidence expressed by Mr. POMEROY is probably well-founded that the legislation of Congress, at least for some time to come, will conform to what shall be recommended in behalf of this powerful interest. Few, however, will expect any very prompt and effective measures from this quarter for resuming the specie payments.

The fact is, that by reason of speculation on a large scale, and the undue access of our people over our exports, adjusted for the present by sending our bonds to foreign countries, the difficulty in returning to specie payments is greater now than when Congress repealed in February, 1868, the law which permitted contraction.

In England specie payments are maintained because, in addition to the amount of the precious metals held by the Bank of England, a larger amount is in the pockets of the people, ready to be called on in case of emergency in banking. In lieu of this in the pockets of the people are stuffed with notes down to the denomination of ten cents, while in England no notes are allowed under about twenty dollars. This wide difference in policy drives the precious metals away from the United States and encourages their accumulation in Great Britain.

We can not trust our way to the fact that contraction, attempted under more favorable circumstances as to debt than at present, was abandoned out of regard to the debtor interest; and as the indebtedness of individuals has been increased by speculation and extravagance, it is safe to assume that the same interest will be equally powerful in the ensuing Congress.

On looking back to the period of Mr. M'CULLOCH'S recommendations, above referred to, it will not only be found that they were timid and sound, but it will be regarded as a misfortune that they were not firmly followed. But although contraction is the true road, the unfortunate tendency of our people to constant and heavy indebtedness makes it difficult.

The truth should be widely disseminated that, until we determine to persist in the policy of improving our circulating medium, there can be no recovery from the fluctuations in the price of products which constantly attends our system. When we are upon the solid ground of specie, we shall be able to compete with all nations, and secure an amount of prosperity known to no other portion of the globe.

HONOR AND MURDER.

The death of Mr. RICHARDSON will again raise the question in the courts whether jealousy is a justifiable homicide. The principle of civilized society is plain enough. It is, that a man must not assume to punish crimes upon his own responsibility. A savage scalps his foe whenever he can get at him. But civilization replaces individual vengeance by the forms of law. Yet there are certain circumstances under which it permits individual redress, such as personal assault or burglary. There are still other circumstances which have been tacitly held to justify such redress where there is no violent personal attack, but merely an offense against honor. The form this redress took was the duel. But Honor is a very elastic word, and is variously accompanied as well as by honorable men; and it consequently happened that, under the code of honor, an honorable man was at the mercy of any scoundrel or dastard who chose to throw a glass of wine in his face or to call him liar. So the duel, as essentially absurd and involving greater perils than it could heal, has been shaken by the growing good sense of civilization.

But there are still circumstances under which public opinion apparently justifies individual vengeance. Probably a jury in this country would convict a woman who should shoot the man who attempted her dishonor. It is doubtful if it would convict a father of crime if accidentally shot another; although it might be very difficult to show that she had not consented. The reason of such a verdict would probably be found in the general, general impression that women are usually at a disadvantage, and that if the shooting was not exactly justified by the special testimony, it was venial upon general grounds. The same toleration is shown toward men who attack others whom they charge with offenses against their domestic happiness.

But this is a relic of sheer barbarism. If we justify a husband in killing a man whom he accuses of sending his wife's affections, we must justify the wife in killing any woman whom she may accuse of being his paramour or of diverting his preference. Thus the most atrocious lives might be sacrificed to a whim of jealousy, or to a grotesque sense of honor. This justification of assaults, by what are called injured husbands, serves, however, to show how ingrained is the feeling that a wife's life is in some way his property. If a husband shoots the alleged seducer, or merely the guiltless confidant, of his wife, the public shrugs its shoulders, and remarks that the victim ought to have counted the cost. But if the wife should shoot a poor woman of the town because of her husband's offense, or any innocent woman whose society her husband sought, there would be immense consternation. And yet, is not the marriage vow equally binding upon husband and wife? If the husband may punish what he calls offenses against his honor, may not the wife avenge outrages upon her?

There is but one remedy, and that is to insist, by the conviction of plainly proved offenders, that offenses shall not be privately punished. If a man's attacks rise upon the highway, or breaks into your house, you will justifiably defend yourself by every practicable means. But to notify a chief justice or surgeon to murder, by a man's allegation that his honor has been assailed and his domestic peace disturbed, is to reduce the whole foundation of civilized society. If a wife's affections are alienated there is at least room for suspicion that the husband's conduct has not been such as to retain them. Certainly the common welfare demands that there be some better reason than "outraged honor" offered in extenuation of murder.

A PREMIUM UPON CRIME.

The most remarkable fact in regard to great robberies at this time is that the robbers are not punished, but the crime is compromised. In compromising with the thief to give him half the booty, with a promise not to trouble him upon condition that he will return the other half. Sometimes a compromise is an arrangement by which the thief is certainly proved to be a condition of not prosecuting the thief. But a compromise is always a proceeding by which society suffers. It is hardly necessary that some merchants in New York, of what is called "respectable standing," are accused of swindling, and will be criminally prosecuted unless large amounts of the plunder are given him by good reason why this principle should not be carried further? Shall we not compromise with gentlemen of good standing accused of assault and battery, and consent not to prosecute if they will pay the doctor's bill for their victim? Cases of murder, indeed, would seem to be difficult, because the erring gentleman who did the deed could not recall the victim to life. But possibly some arrangement might be made by which his social comfort or the recovery other people if he should be excused from responsibility for the accomplished fact. Indeed, the principle is susceptible of great breadth of application.

It is really becoming necessary to remember that cheating is cheating, however respectable the "standing" of the cheat and robber. The very is robbery, whatever may be the number of church pews owned by the robber.

It is no new thing for merchants of what is called respectable standing to be found in the Custom-house. Indeed, there is an old saying that all is fair in love, in politics, and at the Custom-house, and a man ought to expect to prepare himself for the rules of law who would most glibly swear falsely to pass an invoice. But this is a dangerous kind of sophistry. All human transactions rest at last upon good faith, and confidence in real honor. When a man's oath is known to be a lie, there follows a profound disturbance of the foundations of society: for no man can not be habitually false in one way without weakening their truthfulness in every way.

If it be true that certain merchants are implicated by evidence in dishonest transactions at the Custom-house, it is a thousandfold better that they be criminally prosecuted and tried and punished, than that the people of the United States should recover by compromise the money which the "respectable" merchants are said to have stolen. For, in the first instance, upon such a trial, that the general feeling in regard to the oppression of tariffs, and to all Custom-house transactions, made it very doubtful whether a general stigma could be attached to perjury and theft committed there, the cause of Free Trade would have acquired a prodigiously powerful ally, in the conviction that the Custom-house is more pernicious, as a source of the kind of immorality which is fatal to any people, than advantageous as a system of levying taxes. In the second place, the whole is try the experiment, and to ascertain whether a man's reputation would be injured by legal conviction of defrauding the Government at the Custom-house.

A CURIOUS INJUSTICE.

There is a good custom in Massachusetts by which the Governor at Thanksgiving pardons two couples whose cases have arisen during the term in the State prison has been most exemplary. This year the usual pardon was issued; but to the public astonishment, it appeared that the two men were not pardoned, and that pardon should be granted, but of whom it should be asked. For they were innocent persons unjustly convicted, and the general feeling, of course, then was, that it was both an injustice to them and to two other well-deserving prisoners to release them only. They were entitled to their liberty. It was no grace of the government, but its plainest duty, to release them; and the spirit of the annual custom of pardon required that two justly convicted prisoners should be set free. No one, however, supposed that this was not as evident to the Governor and Council, and to the old and experienced warden of the State prison, as it was to every body else. But there was no explanation, and the whole affair seemed unintelligible.

At the end of a week, however, the warden, Mr. HAYNES, wrote a letter detailing the facts. The two men were convicted of highway robbery upon the positive evidence of the man robbed. It was a case of mistaken identity. Upon entering the prison the men asserted their innocence, but nothing came to happen. Recently, however, facts, unknown to the prisoners, were communicated to the warden proving their innocence. Having no authority to release them, instantly laid them before the Governor and Council, who are the sole releasing power. But it was only on the day before Thanksgiving that the last document in the case were received, and too late for the Council to examine the testimony in some other cases which the warden intended to present for the usual pardon. Consequently the two innocent prisoners were released as pardoned; and the two others, who should have had the benefit of a pardon, will be detained in prison until Christmas. The warden adds that he agrees fully that the two men had a right to justice, and not to pardon; but that the Legislature had provided no other means than a pardon to reach such cases.

This is an injustice which the Legislature of Massachusetts should remedy as the very earliest moment. The warden certainly proves that the Governor and Council may release an unjustly convicted person, with a public acknowledgment of the innocence of the man, as with the gift of a sum of money large enough to be serviceable to a man so unhappily seized and so injuriously branded. But, in this instance, it would also be well if it were possible for the warden, who was convinced of the innocence of the prisoners in question, to have supplied, in time, to the Council, the evidence necessary for the release of two proper convicts. He would then have left with the Executive Chamber the responsibility of deciding whether the two customary pardons were exhausted in the case of the innocent men. But it is shameful to any honorable State that its only remedy for the enormous injustice of the unjust imprisonment of a citizen is the obloquy of a pardon.

wrongly deprives him of liberty, and, by way of reparation, brands him forever as a pardoned criminal.

NOTES.

The Delaware Gazette, published at Wilmington, tells its readers all about Harper's Weekly. It is "remarkable for its illustrations." It is "a production of an inferior order of its kind." It is edited "with neither taste nor ability." Its contributors are "of the most shallow minds and commonplace talents." Its columns are, therefore, filled with "written and pictorial trash and claptrap productions of the most ridiculous and sensational description." So much for us. And next, good readers, you catch it. You are "a class of dishonest or superficial persons, to whom an uncultivated fancy and narrow prejudices at [the Weekly] pandders and appeals." It seems, gentle readers, that you are also our victims. "Over these people"—that is you, illiterate and superficial multitude—"its corrupting influences are exercised, and dangerously exercised." Why? Because you are more gratified "by adaptations to the eye and the passions of nature than by appeals to the manhood, the reason and the judgment of a well-balanced mind." Well, at least, the world has one comfort left. While Harper's Weekly lives "prostitutes and 'contaminates' and 'warps' by "lying and blackguardly cartoons," and "indecency," and "amalgamation" and "miscegenation," there is still the Wilmington Gazette proudly surviving, as an inspiring example of "the judgment of a well-balanced mind."

The third volume of Francis Parkman's series of histories of the early settlement of the country is just published by Little, Brown, & Co.; and this time it is "The Discovery of the Great West." These volumes, as our readers know, or should know, form together a general history of "France and England in North America." It is a subject which Mr. Parkman has made as much his own as Motley the Dutch Republic or Macaulay the English Revolution. He is thorough master of his material, which is much scattered, and exists largely in manuscript; and his narrative has a picturesque narrative style, and his admirable perception of the true point of interest, give to his successive works a wonderful charm and symmetry. It is to the pages of Mr. Parkman that we must go for the most delightful reading on the most central of our young fancies with Ucas and the red heroes that it is very difficult to divest our estimate of the Indian of a false and foolish glamour. Mr. Parkman, however, knows him by personal experience and long and thoughtful study. In the second volume of the "Pioneers of the French in North America," and in this last, "The Discovery of the Great West," he paints the Indian as full length, the most interesting, the most central of human beings. And it is curious to observe that at their best the Indians are not interesting. We do not respect them, nor like them as much as we do noble animals. We follow their movements with a languid attention; but the monument Hennepin, or Marquette, or La Salle appears, we salute the hero of the scene. In "The Discovery of the Great West" there is not, of course, the same extraordinary story of human heroism as in the tragedy of the early Canadian Jesuits, which was told in the last volume. But there are equally graphic and admirable sketches of the Jesuit fathers who are more known to us, and a delightful, and we may final, account of the discovery of the Mississippi River. Indeed, with singular tact Mr. Parkman gives us in his compact volumes about all that the reader cares to know of that period of our history; and his work, which is indispensable to complete knowledge of the settlement and civilization of the North American continent, is done in a way which assures his position among our historians.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Congress assembled on the 6th instant. The following new members were sworn in: Mr. S. S. Cox, of New York; Mr. George Bowman Fonda, Massachusetts; Mr. Beschard, of Illinois; and W. H. Barnum, of Connecticut.

The annual Report of Commissioner Delano for the year ending June 30, 1869, shows that the total receipts from Internal Revenue sources, exclusive of the direct tax upon lands and the duty upon the circulation and deposits of national banks, were, for the fiscal year, $191,030,594 79. This includes the sum refunded for taxes illegally assessed and collected, amounting to $36,000 15, nearly one-half of which was for taxes assessed and collected in previous years. The receipts for the next current year are estimated at $170,000,000.

The Report of the Comptroller of the Currency gives the total number of national banks organized up to October, 1869, and the number in active service thus, 1,650. The total amount of notes of all denominations issued, up to the 30th of September, 1869, he gives as $199,159,035; adding to this for fragments of notes outstanding, $1,000,000, and deducting for those which have been redeemed, $940 45, and the total circulation is $200,159,596.

In consequence of the abrogation of the Postal Convention between the United States and France, the exchange of United States mails with that country will cease on the 1st of January next. The letters for and from France, by steamers running direct, the postage upon which is now ten cents the single rate of half an ounce, to be prepaid when sent, and collected on delivery when received; on newspapers, two cents each, and on books, etc., four cents for each four ounces. Letters may now be sent to be sent by mail for England without prepayment. Letters now sent by British mail for other countries will be forwarded after December 31.

A new Postal Convention has been agreed upon with Great Britain, by which the ocean postage between the United States and Great Britain is reduced to six cents, if paid in advance, with a fine of six cents added if the postage is unpaid, the arrangement to take effect January 1, 1870.

The Public Debt statement for November exhibits a decrease in the debt during that month of $7,571,487, and since the 1st of March of $71,321,824.

The coin in the Sub-Treasury, New York, has been counted. It amounts to $76,061,000.

Albert D. Richardson, who was shot by M'Farland in the Tribune office, on the evening of the 4th instant, lingered until Thursday morning, December 9, when he expired. The day previous, perceiving that his end was approaching, he was married at his own request to Mrs. Sage (formerly Miss Abby Hopper). The ceremony was performed by Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, assisted by Rev. E. E. Frothingham.

An affray among Democratic politicians occurred in the Fifth Ward, Brooklyn, on the 11th inst., in which Florence Seaman, a candidate for Alderman, received a pistol-shot wound which will disable him for life, and several others were badly injured.

A successful swoop was made on the illicit distilleries situated near the Navy-yard, in the Fifth Ward, Brooklyn, on the 8th December by the United States Regulars and a company of the Grand Army of the Republic, under the command of Colonel Spaulding. Thirteen distilleries were broken up, and the material removed to the Navy-yard and stored. The expedition was attacked by the mob when retiring from the last of the distilleries, and several persons were seriously injured.

The National Board of Trade met on the 1st inst. in the capitol at Richmond, Virginia.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The French Senate and Corps Legislatif were opened by the Emperor November 29. In his address he ascribed the disturbances of the last few months to the "subversive passions" and the "excesses of the press and of public meetings," but said that liberty was menaced and freedom compromised. France desires peace, and, therefore, he asked the Legislature to help him secure liberty, he will answer for the order. The Emperor spoke of the visit to the World's Fair, the freeing of the Roselan serfs, the Irish Church reform, the Mexican claims, the Council, the Pacific Railroad, the telegraph, the Mount Cenis Tunnel, and the Suez Canal, with the latter of which he claimed a free right, of which all have reason to be proud. In conclusion, he declared that there was no fear of any particular agitation of the nation in its own affairs, which would not be put down by the empire.

On the 1st inst. the Corps Legislatif was agitated by a demand from Rochefort that he and Henri Grand be ordered to guard the hall of the Corps in future, in consequence of the numerous duels and deadly encounters which followed, after the first burst of sensibility among them in the hall. The proposition was applauded, but the majority protested against the disposition, and the favor with which it had been received. M. Guizot has written a letter to a member of the Corps Legislatif, in which he declares himself ready to support the Parliamentary Empire.

The Pope, on the 8th inst., on the landing of the French telegraph cable on American shores, in addressing a large assembly of bishops, was adjusted as an auspicious augury.

The Œcumenical Conference was held at Rome on the 1st inst., at which an allocution was delivered, and the articles of the Œcumenical Council took the official oath.

The last conspiracies have again been discovered in Spain, and numerous arrests have been made in several localities. Several of the suppressed Republican journals in Madrid have appeared under new names, and the Constitutional guarantees, suspended some time ago on account of public order, have been restored. Admiral Prim has stated to the Cortes that since the commencement of the Cuban rebellion there have been 200,000 men, including two Iron-clads, had sailed for Cuba, transporting about 40,000 troops.

There is a report of a want of harmony between the Chinese Government and Mr. Burlingame, and in China it is said they are ascribed to persons in China, who are opposed to the commercial and progressive policy of the Chinese Government. His mission will not, however, be recalled. Mr. Burlingame was received on the 2d inst. by the King of Prussia, and presented his credentials.

A letter from Pekin states that the Chinese Government is desirous to have it clearly understood that Mr. Burlingame's treaty with this country has not been rejected, but action on it only deferred, it being thought best to wait until the results of the negotiations of the mission with other countries were received, when the whole subject might be disposed of at once.

The bark Nut, bound to Bombay, the first merchantile vessel to pass through the Suez Canal with a cargo, has been detained in the Red Sea, eighty miles from the port of Suez.

The Viceroy of Egypt, it is said, has presented the Empress Eugenie, who has returned to Paris, a diamond diadem worth 4,000,000 of Francs.

EGYPT AWAKENED.—Drawn by W. L. Sheppard.—[See Page 807.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

THE DEBT.

ARNOLD was the first who broke the silence. "Is your father seriously ill?" he asked.

Geoffrey answered by handing him the card.

Sir Patrick, who had stood apart (while the question of Herncastle's relapse was under discussion) sardonically studying the manners and customs of modern English youth, now came forward, and took his part in the proceedings. Lady Lundie herself must have acknowledged that he spoke and acted as became the head of the family, on this occasion.

"Am I right in supposing that Mr. Delmayn's father is dangerously ill?" he asked, addressing himself to Arnold.

"Dangerously ill, in London," Arnold answered. "Geoffrey must leave Windygates with me. The friend I am travelling by meets the train his brother is traveling by, at the junction. I shall leave him at the second station from here."

"Didn't you tell me that Lady Lundie was going to send you to the railway in a gig?"

"Yes."

"If the servant drives, there will be three of you—and there will be no room."

"We had better ask for some other vehicle, suggested Arnold.

Sir Patrick looked at his watch. There was no time to change the carriage. He turned to Geoffrey. "Can you drive, Mr. Delmayn?"

Still impenetrably silent, Geoffrey replied by a nod of the head.

Without noticing the unceremonious manner in which he had been answered, Sir Patrick went on:

"In that case, you can leave the gig in charge of the station-master. I'll tell the servant that he will not be wanted to drive."

"Let me save you the trouble, Sir Patrick," said Arnold.

Sir Patrick declined, by a gesture. He turned again, with undiminished courtesy, to Geoffrey. "It is one of the duties of hospitality, Mr. Delmayn, to hasten your departure, under these sad circumstances. Lady Lundie is engaged with her guests. I will see myself that there is no unnecessary delay in sending you to the station." He bowed—and left the summer-house.

Arnold said a word of sympathy to his friend, when they were alone.

"I am sorry for this, Geoffrey. I hope and trust you will get to London in time."

He stopped. There was something in Geoffrey's face—a strange mixture of doubt and bewilderment, of annoyance and hesitation—which was not to be accounted for as the natural result of the news that he had received. His color shifted and changed; he picked fretfully at his finger-nails; he looked at Arnold as if he was going to speak—and then looked away again, in silence.

"Is there something amiss, Geoffrey, besides this bad news about your father?" asked Arnold.

"I'm in the devil's own mess," was the answer.

"Can I do any thing to help you?"

Instead of making a direct reply, Geoffrey lifted his mighty hand, and gave Arnold a friendly slap on the shoulder which shook him from head to foot. Arnold steadied himself, and waited—wondering what was coming next.

"I say, old fellow!" said Geoffrey.

"Yes."

"Do you remember when the boat turned keel upward in Lisbon Harbor?"

Arnold replied: "I he could have called to mind his first interview in the summer-house with his future old friend, he might have remembered Sir Patrick's prediction that he would sooner or later pay, with interest, the debt he owed to the man who had saved his life. As it was, his memory reverted at a bound to the time of the boat-accident. In the ardor of his gratitude and the innocence of his heart, he actually resented his friend's question as a reproach which he had not deserved.

"Do you think I can ever forget," he cried, warmly, "that you swam ashore with me and saved my life?"

Geoffrey ventured a step nearer to the object that he had in view.

"One good turn deserves another," he said, "don't it?"

Arnold took his hand. "Only tell me!" he eagerly rejoined—"only tell me what I can do!"

"You are going to-day to see your new place, ain't you?"

"Yes."

"Can you put off going till to-morrow?"

"If it's any thing serious—of course I can."

Geoffrey looked at the entrance to the summer-house, to make sure that they were alone.

"You know the governess here, don't you?" he said, in a whisper.

"Miss Silvester?"

"Yes. I've got into a little difficulty with Miss Silvester. And there isn't a living soul I can ask to help me but you."

"You know I will help you. What is it?"

"It isn't so easy to say. Never mind—you're no saint either, are you? You'll keep it a secret, of course? Look here! I've acted like an infernal fool. I've gone and got the girl into a scrape—"

Arnold drew back, suddenly understanding him.

"Good heavens, Geoffrey! You don't mean—"

"I do! Wait a bit—that's not the worst of it. She has left the house."

"Left the house?"

"Left, for good and all. She can't come back again."

"Why not?"

"Because she's written to her missus. Women (hang 'em!) never do these things by halves. She's left a letter to say she's privately married, and gone off to her husband. Her husband is—Me. Not that I'm married to her yet, you understand. I have only promised to marry her. She has gone on first (on the sly) to a place four miles from this. And we settled I was to follow, and marry her privately this afternoon. That's out of the question now. While she's expecting me at the inn I shall be bowling along to London. Somebody must tell her what has happened—or she'll play the devil, and the whole business will burst up. I can't trust any of the people here. I'm done by, old chap, unless you help me."

Arnold lifted his hands in dismay. "It's the most dreadful situation, Geoffrey, I ever heard of in my life!"

Geoffrey thoroughly agreed with him. "Enough to knock a man over," he said, "isn't it? I'd give something for a drink of beer." He pondered for an exhausting pipe, from sheer force of habit. "Got a match?" he asked.

Arnold's mind was too preoccupied to notice the question.

"I hope you won't think I'm making light of your father's illness," he said, earnestly. "But it seems to me—I must say it—it seems to me that the poor girl has the first claim on you."

"THAT WILL DO THE BUSINESS! READ IT YOURSELF, ARNOLD—IT'S NOT SO BADLY WRITTEN."

Geoffrey looked at him in surly amazement.

"The first claim on me? Do you think I'm going to risk being cut out of my father's will? Not for the best woman that ever put on a petticoat!"

Arnold's admiration of his friend was the solidly-founded admiration of many years' admiration for a man who could row, box, wrestle, jump—above all, who could swim—as few other men could perform those exercises in contemporary England. But that answer shook his faith. Only for the moment—unhappily for Arnold, only for the moment.

"You know best," he returned, a little coldly. "What can I do?"

Geoffrey took his arm—roughly, as he took every thing; but in a companionable and confidential way.

"Go, like a good fellow, and tell her what has happened. We'll start from here as if we were both going to the railway; and I'll drop you at the foot-path, in the gig. You can get on to your own place afterward by the evening train. It puts you to no inconvenience; and it's doing the kind thing by an old friend. There's no risk of being found out. I'm to drive, remember! There's no servant with us, old boy, to notice, and tell tales."

Even Arnold began to see dimly by this time that he was likely to pay his debt of obligation with interest—as Sir Patrick had foretold.

"What am I to say to her?" he asked. "I'm bound to do all I can do to help you, and I will. But what am I to say?"

It was a natural question to put. It was not an easy question to answer. What a man, under given muscular circumstances, could do, no person living knew better than Geoffrey Delmayn. Of what a man, under given social circumstances, could say, no person living knew less.

"Say?" he repeated. "Look here! say I'm half distracted, and all that. And—wait a bit —tell her to stop where she is till I write to her."

Arnold hesitated. Absolutely ignorant of that low and limited form of knowledge which is called "knowledge of the world," his inbred delicacy of mind revealed to him the serious difficulty of the position which his friend was asking him to occupy as plainly as if he was looking at it through the warily-gathered experience of society of a man of twice his age.

"Can't you write to her now, Geoffrey?" he asked.

"What's the good of that?"

"Consider for a minute, and you will see. You have trusted me with a very awkward secret. I may be wrong—I never was mixed up in such a matter before—but to present myself to this lady as your messenger seems exposing her to a dreadful humiliation. Am I to go and tell her to her face: 'I know what you are hiding from the knowledge of all the world;' and is she to be expected to endure it?"

"Bosh!" said Geoffrey. "They can endure a deal more than you think for. I wish you had heard how she bullied me, in this very place. My good fellow, you don't understand women. The grand secret, in dealing with a woman, is to take her as you take a cat, by the scruff of the neck—"

"I can't face her—unless you will help me by breaking the thing to her first. I'll stick at no sacrifice to serve you; but—hang it!—make allowances, Geoffrey, for the difficulty you are putting me in. I am almost a stranger. I don't know how Miss Silvester may receive me, before I can open my lips."

These last words touched the question on its practical side. The matter-of-fact view of the difficulty was a view which Geoffrey instantly recognized and understood.

"That will do the business," he said. "I'll write. Have you got a pencil?"

Arnold produced a pencil, and opened his pocket-book, and added a line, and brought his hand down on the table with a cheery smack. "That will do the business! Read it yourself, Arnold—it's not so badly written."

Arnold read the note without appearing to share his friend's favorable opinion of it.

"This is rather short," he said.

"Have I time to make it longer?"

"Perhaps not. But let Miss Silvester see for herself that you have no time to make it longer. The train starts in less than half an hour. Put the time."

"Oh, all right! and the date too, if you like."

He had just added the desired words and figures, and had given the revised letter to Arnold, when Sir Patrick returned to announce that the gig was waiting.

"Come!" he said, a little sadly. "You haven't a moment to lose!"

Geoffrey started to his feet. Arnold hesitated.

"I must say good-by to my aunt," he pleaded. "I can't leave Blanche without saying good-by. Where is she?"

Sir Patrick pointed to the steps, with a smile. Blanche had followed him from the house. Arnold ran out to her instantly.

"Going?" she said, a little sadly.

"I shall be back in two days," Arnold whispered. "It's all right!" Sir Patrick consents."

She held him fast by the arm. Her married parting before other people seemed to be not a parting to Blanche's taste.

"You will lose the train!" cried Sir Patrick.

Geoffrey seized Arnold by the arm which Blanche was holding, and tore him—literally tore him—away. The two were out of sight, in the shrubbery, before Blanche's indignation found words, and addressed itself to her uncle.

"Why is that brute going away with Mr. Brinkworth?" she asked.

"Mr. Delmayn is called to London by his father's illness," replied Sir Patrick. "You don't like him?"

"I hate him!"

Sir Patrick reflected a little.

"She is a young girl of eighteen," he thought to himself. "And I am an old man of seventy. Curious, that we should agree about any thing. More than curious that we should agree in disliking Mr. Delmayn."

He roused himself, and looked again at Blanche. She was seated at the table, with her head on her hand; absent, and out of spirits—thinking of Arnold, and yet, with the future all smooth before them, not thinking happily.

"Why, Blanche! Blanche!" cried Sir Patrick, "one would think he had gone for a voyage round the world. You silly child! he will be back again the day after to-morrow."

"I wish he hadn't gone with that man!" said Blanche. "I wish he hadn't got that man for a friend!"

"There! there! the man was rude enough, I own. Never mind: he will leave the man at the second station. Come back to the ball-room with me. Dance it off, my dear—dance it off!"

"No," returned Blanche. "I'm in no humor for dancing. I shall go up stairs, and talk about it to Anne."

"You will do nothing of the sort!" said a third voice, suddenly joining in the conversation.

Both uncle and niece looked up, and found Lady Lundie at the top of the summer-house steps.

"I forbid you to mention that woman's name again in my hearing," pursued her ladyship. "Sir Patrick [she warned you of this, remember?] that the matter of the governess was not a matter to be trifled with. My worst anticipations are realized. Miss Silvester has left the house!"

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

THE SCANDAL.

It was still early in the afternoon when the guests at Lady Lundie's luncheon began to compare notes together in corners, and to agree in arriving at a general conviction that "something was wrong."

Blanche had mysteriously disappeared from her partners in the dance. Lady Lundie had mysteriously absented herself from guests. Blanche had not come back. Lady Lundie had returned with an artificial smile, and a preoccupied manner. She acknowledged that she was "not very well." The same excuse had been given to account for Blanche's absence—and, again, at the same time privately, to explain Miss Silvester's withdrawal from the croquet! A vet among the gentlemen declared it reminded him of declining a verb. "I am not very well; thou art not very well; she is not very well"—and so on. Sir Patrick took it. Only think of the sociable Sir Patrick being in a state of seclusion—hobbling up and down by himself in the loneliest part of the garden. And the servants again! it had even spread to the servants! They were presuming to whisper in corners, like their betters. The housemaids appeared, spasmodically, where house-maids had no business to be. Doors banged and petticoats whisked in the upper regions. Something wrong —depend upon it, something wrong! "We had much better go away. My dear, order the carriage."—"Louisa, love, no more dancing; your papa is going."—"Good-afternoon, Lady Lundie!"—"How! thanks very much!"—"So sorry for dear Blanche!"—"Oh, it's been too charming!" So Society jabbered its poor, nonsensical little jargon, and got itself politely out of the way before the storm came.

This was exactly the consummation of events for which Sir Patrick had been waiting in the seclusion of the garden.

There was no avoiding the responsibility which was now thrust upon him. Lady Lundie had announced it as a settled resolution, on her part, to trace Anne to the place in which she had found refuge, and discover (purely in the interests of virtue) whether she actually was married or not. Blanche (driven overwrought by the excitement of the day) had broken into an hysterical passion of tears on hearing the news, and had then, on recovering, taken a view of her own Anne's flight from the house. Anne would never have kept her marriage a secret from Blanche; Anne would never have written such a formal farewell letter as she had written to Blanche—if things were going as smoothly with her as she was trying to make them believe at Windygates. Some dreadful trouble had fallen on Anne—and Blanche was determined (as Lady Lundie was determined) to find out where she had gone, and to follow, and help her.

It was plain to Sir Patrick (to whom both ladies had opened their hearts, at separate interviews) that his sister-in-law, in one way, and his niece in another, were equally likely to prove duly restrained—to plunge headlong into acts of indiscretion which might lead to very undesirable results. A superior authority was surely needed at Windygates that afternoon—and Sir Patrick was fain to acknowledge that he was the man.

"It will be no load for, and much is to be said against, a single life," thought the old gentleman, buttoning up and down the uneven garden-path to which he had retired, and applying himself at shorter intervals than usual to the knob of his cane—"I like women, generally. I take it, certain. A man's married friends can't prevent him from leading the life of a bachelor, if he pleases. They may chaw, can, and do, take devilish good care that he sh'n't enjoy it!"

Sir Patrick's meditations were interrupted by the appearance of a servant, previously commanded to keep him informed of the progress of events at the house.

"They're all gone, Sir Patrick," said the man.

"That's a comfort, Simpson. We have no visitors to deal with now, except the visitors who are staying in the house?"

"None, sir Patrick."

"They're all gentlemen, are they not?"

"Yes, Sir Patrick."

"That's another comfort, Simpson. Very good. I'll see Lady Lundie first."

Does any form of human resolution approach the firmness of a woman who is bent on discovering the residence of another woman whom she hates? You may move rocks, under a given set of circumstances. But here is a delicate being in particular, who shrinks if a spider drops on her neck, and shudders if you approach her after having eaten an onion. Can you move her, under a given set of circumstances, as set forth above? Not you!

Sir Patrick found her ladyship instituting her inquiries of my respectable admirably educated system which is pursued, in cases of disappearance, by the police. Who was the last witness who had seen the missing person? Where was the last servant who had seen Anne Silvester? Begin with the men-servants, from the butler at the top to the stable-boy at the bottom. Go on with the women-servants, from the cook in all her glory to the small female child who weeds the garden. Lady Lundie had cross-examined her way downward as far as the page, when Sir Patrick joined her.

"My dear lady! pardon me for reminding you again, that this is a free country, and that you have no choice whatever to investigate the Governess's proceedings after she has left your house."

Lady Lundie raised her eyes, devotionally, to the ceiling. "I looked like a martyr in duty. If you had seen her ladyship at that moment, you would have said yourself, 'A martyr to duty.'"

"No, Sir Patrick! As a Christian woman, that is not my way of looking at it. This unhappy person has lived under my roof, and the unhappy person has been the companion of Blanche. I am responsible—I am, in a manner, morally responsible. I would give the world to be able to dismiss it as you do. But no! I must be satisfied that she is married. In the interests of society. Not for the interests of my own conscience. Before I lay my head on my pillow to-night, Sir Patrick—before I lay my head on my pillow to-night!—"

"One word, Lady Lundie—"

"No!" repeated her ladyship, with the most pathetic gentleness. "You are right, I dare say, from the worldly point of view. I can't take the worldly point of view. The worldly point of view hurts me." She turned, with impressive gravity, to the page. "You know where you will go, Thomas, if you tell lies."

Jonathan was lazy, Jonathan was pimply, Jonathan was fat—but Jonathan was orthodox. He answered like he did know; and, what is more, he mentioned the place.

Sir Patrick saw that further opposition on his part, at that moment, would be worse than useless. He wisely determined to wait, before he interfered again, until Lady Lundie had thoroughly exhausted herself and her inquiries. At the same time—as it was impossible, in the present state of her ladyship's temper, to provide against what might happen if the inquiries after Anne unluckily proved successful—he decided on taking measures to clear the house of the guests (in the interests of all parties) for the next four-and-twenty hours.

"I only want to ask you a question, Lady Lundie, he resumed. "The position of the gentlemen who are staying here is not a very pleasant one while all this is going on. If you had been content to let the matter pass without notice, we should have done very well. As things are, don't you think it will be more convenient to every body if I relieve you of the responsibility of entertaining your guests?"

"As head of the family?" stipulated Lady Lundie.

"As head of the family!" answered Sir Patrick.

"I gratefully accept the proposal," said Lady Lundie.

"I beg you won't mention it," rejoined Sir Patrick.

He quitted the room, leaving Jonathan under examination. He and his brother (the late Sir Thomas) had chosen widely different paths in life, and had seen but little of each other since the time when they had been boys. Sir Patrick's recollections (on leaving Lady Lundie) appeared to have taken him back to that time, and to have inspired him with a certain kindness for his brother's memory. He stopped at the door, looked at a tall flunkey in powder, and said, kindly, "Poor Tom!" he said to himself, softly, after he had shut the door on his brother's valet—"poor Tom!"

On crossing the hall, he stopped the first servant he met, to inquire after Blanche. Miss Silvester was still very poorly, and was under the medical care of her own maid. "Quiet?" thought Sir Patrick. "That's a bad sign. I shall hear more of my niece."

Pending that event, the next thing to do was to find the guests. Deterring instinct led Sir Patrick to the smoking-room. There he found them, in solemn conclave assembled, wondering what they had better do. Sir Patrick put them all at their ease in two minutes.

"What do you say to a day's shooting to-morrow?" he asked.

Every man present—sportsman or not—said yes.

"You can start from this house," pursued Sir Patrick; "or you can start from a shooting-cottage which is on the Windygates property—among the woods, on the other side of the valley. The weather is fine; the fuel settled (for Scotland), and there are plenty of horses in the stables. It is useless to conceal from you, gentlemen, that events have taken a certain unexpected turn in my sister-in-law's family circle. You will be equally Lady Lundie's guests, whether you choose the cottage or the house. For the next twenty-four hours (let us say)—which shall it be?"

Every body—with or without rheumatism—answered "the cottage!"

"Very good," rejoined Sir Patrick. "It is arranged to ride over to the shooting-cottage this evening, and to try the moor, on that side, the first thing in the morning. My servants here will allow me, I shall be delighted to accompany you, and do the honors as well as I can. If not, I am sure you will not misunderstand my motive, and permit Lady Lundie's steward to see to your comfort in my place."

Adopted unanimously. Sir Patrick left the guests to their billiards, and went out to give the necessary orders at the stables.

In the mean time Blanche remained portentously quiet in the upper regions of the house; while Lady Lundie's inquiries in the vicinity ingircles down stairs. She got on from Jonathan (last of the males, indoors) to the coachman (first of the males, out-of-doors), and from the groom, to man, through the mat servatum, until she struck the stable-boy at the bottom. Not an atom of information had been extracted, in the house or out of the house, from man or boy, her ladyship had sunk on the vestibule chair, pulled the bell, and summoned the cook—Hester Dethridge.

The remarkable looking person entered the room.

Elderly and quiet, scrupulously clean; eminently respectable, looking out on the neat and smooth under her modest white cap; her eyes, set deep in their orbits, looking straight at any person she spoke to; her voice, in its best view, was a steady, trustworthy woman. Here also, on closer inspection, was a woman with the seal of some terrible grief lying on her for the rest of her life. You felt it, rather than saw it, in the look of immovable endurance which underlaid her every expression. The death-like tranquility which never disappeared from her manner. Her story was a sad one—so far as it was known. No bad antecedents, no bad service at the period of Lady Lundie's marriage to Sir Thomas. Hester Dethridge (the late clergyman of her parish) described her as having been married to an inveterate drunkard, and as having suffered unspeakable misery for a husband's lifetime. There were drawbacks to engaging her, now that she was a widow. On one of the many occasions on which her husband had personally ill-treated her, he had struck her a blow which had produced very remarkable nervous results. She had lost command over her keys together, and had recovered with the total loss of her speech. In addition to this objection, she was old, at times, in her manner; and she made it a condition of accepting any situation, that she should be privileged to sleep in a room by herself. As a set-off against all this, it was to be said, on the other side of the question, that she was sober; rigidly honest in all her dealings; and one of the best cooks in England. In consideration of this last merit, the late Sir Thomas had decided on overlooking the rest, and had discovered that he had never dined in his life as he dined when Hester Dethridge was at the head of his kitchen. She remained, after his death, in his widow's service. Lady Lundie was far from liking her. An unpleasant suspicion attached to the cook, which Sir Thomas had overlooked, but which persons less sensible of the immense importance of having well could not fail to regard as a serious objection to her. Medical men, consulted about her case, discovered certain physiological anomalies in it which led them to suspect the woman of feigning dumbness, for some reason best known to herself. She obstinately refused to return the deaf and dumb alphabet—on the ground that dumbness was not associated with deafness in her case. Stratagems were invented (among that she really did possess the use of her ears) to entrap her into using her speech, and failed. She refused to reply to written questions relating to her past life in her husband's time. She flatly declined to reply to them now and all. After two interviews, strange impulses to get a holiday away from the house appeared to seize her. If she was resisted, she passively declined to do her work. If she was threatened with dismissal, she impenetrably bowed, her head, as much as to say, "Do as you please, sir! I go." Over and over again, Lady Lundie had decided, naturally enough, on no longer keeping such a servant as this; but she had always carried the decision to execution. A cook who is a perfect mistress of her art, who asks for no perquisites, who always no wages, who quarrels with the other servants, who drinks nothing stronger than tea, who is to be trusted with untold gold—such a cook easily reconciles to herself a little mortal life we put up with many persons and things, as Lady Lundie put up with her cook. The woman lived, as it were, on the premises; but this fact the woman kept her place—getting her holidays when she asked for them (which, to do her justice, was not often), sleeping always (and where she might with the family) with a locked door, in a room by herself.

Hester Dethridge entered slowly to the table at which Lady Lundie was sitting. A slate and pencil hung at her side, which she used for making such replies as were not to be expressed by a gesture or by a motion of the head. She took up the slate and pencil, and waited with stony submission for her mistress to begin.

Lady Lundie opened the proceedings with the peculiar tenderness of inquiry which she had used with all the other servants.

"Do you know that Miss Silvester has left the house?"

The cook nodded her head affirmatively.

"Do you know at what time she left it?"

Another affirmative. The first time which Lady Lundie had received to that question yet. She eagerly went on to the next inquiry.

"Have you any idea where she left the house?"

A third affirmative reply.

"Where?"

Hester Dethridge wrote slowly on the slate, in singularly firm upright characters for a woman in her position of life, these words:

"On the road to the railway. Nigh to Mistress Chew's Farm."

"What did you want at Chew's Farm?"

Hester Dethridge wrote: "I wanted eggs for the kitchen, and a breath of fresh air for myself."

"Did Miss Silvester see you?"

A negative shake of the head.

"Did she take the turning that leads to the railway?"

Another negative shake of the head.

"She went on, toward the moor?"

An affirmative reply.

"What did you do when she got to the moor?"

Hester Dethridge wrote: "She took the footpath which leads to Craig Fernie."

Lady Lundie rose discretely to her feet. There was but one place that a stranger could go to at Craig Fernie—the inn. She hastened her ladyship.

"She has gone to the inn!"

Hester Dethridge waited immovably. Lady Lundie put a last precautionary question, in these words:

"Have you reported what you have seen to any body else?"

An affirmative reply. Lady Lundie had not bargained for that. Hester Dethridge (she thought) must report to Sir Patrick, second her.

"Do you mean that you have told somebody else what you have just told me?"

Another affirmative reply.

"A person who questioned you, as I have done?"

A third affirmative reply.

"Who was it?"

Hester Dethridge wrote on her slate: "Miss Blanche."

Lady Lundie stepped back, staggered by the discovery that Blanche's resolution to trace Anne was known. She had entered Anne as firmly settled as her own. Her step-daughter was keeping her own counsel, and acting on her own responsibility—her step-daughter might be an awkward obstacle in the way. The manner in which Anne had left the house had mortally offended Lady Lundie. An inveterately vindictive woman, she had resolved to discover whatever compromising elements might exist in the governess's story, and to make them public property (from a paramount sense of duty, of course) among her own circle of friends. Blanche's private Blanche acting (as might certainly be anticipated) in direct opposition to her, and openly espousing Miss Silvester's interests—was manifestly impossible.

"The first thing to be done—and that instantly—was to inform Blanche that she was discovered, and to forbid her to stir in the matter.

Lady Lundie rang the bell twice—thus intimating, according to the laws of the household, that she required the attendance of her own maid. Hester Dethridge left the cook—still washing her pleasure, with stony composure, slate in hand.

"You have done wrong," said her ladyship, severely. "I am your mistress. You are bound to answer your mistress—"

Hester Dethridge bowed her head, in icy acknowledgment of the principle read down—so far.

The bow was an interruption. Lady Lundie resented it.

"But Miss Blanche is not your mistress," she went on, sternly. "You are very much to blame for answering Miss Blanche's inquiries about Miss Silvester."

Hester Dethridge, perfectly unmoved, wrote her justification on her slate, in three stiff sentences: "I had no orders not to answer. I keep nobody's secrets but my own."

That reply sealed the question of the cook's dismissal—the question which had been pending for months past.

"You are an insolent woman! I have borne with you long enough—I will bear with you no longer. When your month is up, you go!"

In those words Lady Lundie dismissed Hester Dethridge from her service.

Not the slightest change passed over the sinister tranquility of the cook. She bowed her head again, in acknowledgment of the sentence pronounced on her—dropped her slate at her side—turned about—and left the room. The woman was alive in the world, and working in the world; and yet (so far as all human interests were concerned) she was as completely out of the world as if she had been screwed down in her coffin, and laid in her grave.

Lady Lundie's maid came into the room as Hester left it.

"Go up stairs to Miss Blanche," said her mistress, "and say I want her here. Wait a minute." She paused, and considered. Blanche might refuse to submit to her mother's interference with her. It might be necessary to appeal to the higher authority of her guardian. "Do you know where Sir Patrick is?" asked Lady Lundie.

"I heard Simpson say, my lady, that Sir Patrick was at the stables."

"Send Simpson with a message. My compliments to Sir Patrick—and I wish to see him immediately."

The preparations for the departure to the shooting-cottage were all completed before the next question that remained to be settled was, whether Sir Patrick could accompany the party—when the man-servant appeared with the message from his mistress.

"Will you give me a quarter of an hour, gentlemen?" said Sir Patrick. "In that time I shall know for certain whether I can go with you or not."

As a matter of course, the guests decided to wait. The youngest men among them (being Englishmen) naturally occupied their leisure time in betting on Sir Patrick's chances. Better of the domestic crisis? or would the domestic crisis get the better of Sir Patrick? The domestic crisis was backed, at two to one, to win.

Punctually at the expiration of the quarter of an hour, Sir Patrick made his way to the domestic crisis had betrayed the blind confidence which youth and inexperience had placed in it. Sir Patrick left on the day.

"Things are settled and quiet, gentlemen; and I am able to accompany you," he said. "There are only two to the shooting-cottage. One—the longest—passes by the inn at Craig Fernie. I am compelled to ask you to go with me by that road. While you push on to the cottage, I must drop behind, and wait for a person who is staying at the inn."

He had evidently Lady Lundie—he had even quieted Blanche. But it was evidently on the condition that he was to go to Craig Fernie by their place, and to see Anne Silvester himself. Without a word more of explanation he mounted his horse, and led the way out. The shooting-party left Windygates.

ON THE ROCKS.

THE old horse, dragging the old wagon, pursued his way at a melancholy jog-trot through the woods. His equine soul was bitter within him. This was the twenty-first time that a fortnight that he had passed over that very road. He hated—as a horse may—the entire season, the summer months, and the pestilent habit of a daily picnic, which had taken possession of "the Quintette." But what could he do? He was weary and ill-fed to run away. Nothing better occurred to him than to doggedly resolve not to go home, and in this determination he adhered—come what might.

Four only of "the Quintette" occupied the wagon. Jessie, with Lucy and Ned perched in front, his legs dangling over the traces. He was wont to boast a little of his skill in keeping Dolly in the middle road, so that their artistic snappings and cuttings were all in vain. Mab and Amy, dividing the responsibility of the reins, came next; and behind, on the back seat, sat Hilda—alone.

This was something to out of the common order of things, and Jessie had taken notice of it in their own fashion. Laurence had attempted a trifling joke or two, received in stony silence, and now the girl, after twisting their heads round every minute, on various pretexts, to study Hilda's face, let it stay no one. The face looked a little pale, but quite unreadable. She joined in the talk now and then—perhaps as often as usual—but her voice had its usual ring, and a silent conviction that matters were going wrong took possession of the party.

"Hilda! that's the fifth time," cried Laurence, suddenly, in a tone of relief.

"Where? I don't see her."

"Up that path to the right—just coming out of a gate. Where are your eyes, child?"

"Oh yes—stop, Laurence—he's coming to meet us."

Dr. Sterling emerged from the woods and approached them. "A strong active figure—not very tall, but with something of a military learning in the square shoulders and about the well-set head. Cool gray eyes, too, and a firm mouth, at or one accustomed to command.

"Doctor, won't you get in now and ride the rest of the way?"

The Doctor took one look at Hilda before answering. Her face was averted; but the profile, with its drooped eyelids and compressed lips, looked cold and uninviting.

"Thank you; no, Miss Amy. Dolly has a sufficient load, I think. I prefer to walk;" and with a slight, general bow the alert figure moved on, outstripping Dolly in a moment, and vanished round a bend. Laurence tried a few series of persuasions upon the luckless Dolly, but without avail, and a damp seemed to fall on the spirits of the party.

"What does it mean?" whispered little Mab. A shake of the head and a grim little nose was the only reply she got. Amy didn't know—nobody knew—what it was that, happening on the beach that morning, had made Hilda and the Doctor so strange to themselves.

Nobody ever can know but the parties most concerned the intricacies of a lover's quarrel. It springs up, rapid as a thunder-gust, from some cause, absurdly small perhaps—a trifle, easy to pass over in the case of an indifferent person, but possessed suddenly of momentous importance in this. The two natures, all charged with electrical perceptions; thrilling under unfounded capacities, sensitive, wishes; bewildered with the new Heaven and new Earth upon which they have suddenly grouped, as in the dark, to find out the whole of each other—of themselves; the whole world tremulous with fresh mysterious meaning—and wonder if in this wonderful, half-discovered realm they sometimes come together with a clash, and that clash strikes fire! To those who have pledged heart to heart in calmer storms may come and pass, leaving the air freer and the sky more blue. But Hilda and her lover had not yet reached that stage. Little by little they had drawn close to each other. The silent, drifting chain of circumstances, which seem in life to make or to mar our every event—uniting, now separating—had in this case been favorable. No contrary eddy had set in—the winds blew softly. All this happy time of delight they had neared each other with rapid progress. Each day, with its radiance of peace and pleasure, had wrought some assured point over their hearts. And yet this morning a storm-wind had begun, and it might go on to blow and tear asunder the two lives which seemed so nearly one.

"A trifle light as air." Yet here was the Doctor, far on his way to "The Head," chewing the end of bitter fancies, and shattering the bushes with quick, impatient cuts from his cane; as he passed on there was Hilda sulking in the back seat of the wagon.

No; I for Hilda's pardon. It was not sulks—her nature was too fine for that. Poor child! she felt all turned cold with ice—all but her heart—that ached pitifully. She was too proud to show it, however; and so her fair, clearly-cut face looked hard and set.

The road ran through fragrant thickets of arbor-vitæ and juniper. Overhead the intense sky looked through the tree-tops. Cat-birds and robins were saying—it was a day for happiness; but dear me! how little she cared! How little any of us care about such things when we are going to be miserable!

And now the woods were passed, and they came out upon a sparkling little cove fringed with a line of creamy foam. To the right was a field of yellow grain which swept its waving tassels up the sides of a vast rocky headland; beyond and all around that, encircling every thing, was a ring of waveless turquoise, whose horizon line rose and met the curving dip of another sky whose azure was flecked with clouds of gold and snow-like bright islands. The serenity, the perfection of color, the softness of the whole which met their eyes gave no token of the might that lurked within this beauty; but the deep, low thunder of the surf upon the far-away reefs spoke of the force with which, even on the calmest days, the water threw itself upon the land. What a storm might be now! "The Head" very few people had ever cared to experience.

A fisherman's hut stood at the entrance of the little cove. A few women were playing with a child, in the doorway stood a tall old woman—their grandmother.

All of them knew her, and they stopped to speak. The stern face softened at the courteous greeting and the sweet young faces.

"Come in, won't you?" she said. "And have some blueberries and milk."

"Oh, thank you; but I guess not, Mrs. Judson. We are in a hurry to get to the rocks. The surf is so fine to-day, and the tide changes in an hour or two. We're very much obliged to you, though."

"Just as you like."

At the fence the Doctor stood, with a bat down, to help them over. A spray of wild rose was in his hand. He glanced at Hilda as she passed, and bundled the flowers to Mab.

"Thank you," said Mab, a little frightened; and she made haste up the hill after her familiar Kate. She had a feeling as if the roses burned her fingers. This was little Mab's first experience of a love affair. She had watched it with intense interest—the apparent hitch grieved her not a little.

"What can we do about it, Amy?" she whispered, as they panted up the hill. "It is so forlorn and strange. Can't we do any thing?"

"Nothing at all. Just act as if every thing was as usual; perhaps it will all come right yet. Any way, it will get worse and worse if we take notice."

Amy sighed as she spoke. She, too, had invested a deal of tender sympathy in Hilda's romance, and she had experience enough to know the mischief small misunderstandings make. Those "little rifts within the lute"—what sweet music they have turned to!

Hilda and the two young men walked side by side without speaking. The path here receded in the climb she excepted from Laurence. It was a hard scramble up the steep hill, with its matted trees-roots and its slippery mosses and lichens; but a harder still on the other side, where the jagged granite boulders fronted the sea. Lithe and young, and strong from rock to rock, the girls made the descent and reached at last their bourne, a flat, broad platform just above the water. It was exactly half the party, and here they had spent many a happy morning during this eventful fortnight.

Directly opposite was a low, cavernous opening in the hollow cliff. Into this each moment great emerald-green billows were pouring, sucked in with a bellowing like thunder, and then shaken forth a cataract of yeast-white foam. The sun struck the edge of each wave with sharp, dazzling glints as it passed before the eyes, and showed the opaque silence mouth, changing its white into a mass of seething, tumbling commotion. Beyond lay the sea, tranquil in calm, unruffled blue, and the islands in the bay gleamed golden in the sun.

What lovely days they had spent on that rock! Days filled with the exhilaration of the wonderful air and the ever-changing scene, with which each attends a thing we feel to be so infinitely greater than ourselves. Days of supply silence mostly, when tone and look and gesture made a talking, laugh broke the quiet, but where conversation was wont to lapse into repose as tranquil but more intense than any speech. The girls and the Doctor occupied usually a rocky shelf so near the waves that they occasionally baptized it by a shower of spray. Mab, with her unconscious plaid, they would sit for hours, speaking sometimes in low tones, but more often lost in a silence no less sweet than speech. Today neither of them approached the familiar spot. Hilda nestled down in a remote corner by little Mab, and Dr. Sterling, absorbed in dropping bits of rock into the water, had now and then a word for Amy, but for no one else.

Something was wrong. All felt it. No snatches of song arose. Laurence didn't venture on a single conundrum. Puzzled little Mab felt the silence oppressive, but she couldn't think of a word to say. The hollow roar of the spouting horn came with a foreboding moan.

"How rough it is to-day!" said Laurence at last, chucking a pebble into the waves.

"It's just the day for Miss Archer to drop her hat again, isn't it?" said Amy.

"Who's Miss Archer?"

"Don't you remember? The girl who tossed her hat into the sea one day off that rock, and dared her lover to jump in after it."

"And did he?"

"Yes. But he was obliged to swim all the way round to the Cove before he could land. He would have been landed by now here."

"More fool he," said Laurence. "I'd have seen the young lady hanged first."

"It's just like you, Mr. Lorge (ore again, isn't it?" put in little Mab.

"Then I hope he threw the wet hat in her face; don't you, Doctor?"

"No," said Dr. Sterling. "A gentleman wouldn't do that. But I hope from that day he saw her as she was and forgot what she had been."

Something in the tone brought a flush to Hilda's pale cheek. "How hard he is!" she sighed to herself. "And not to feel, and the pain it has dealt grew more muscular.

It is now we have to say," said Laurence, desperate at the failure of each attempt at enlivenment. The baskets was produced, the sandwiches eaten, the cake gingerbread, with a special screed to brighten the gloom. Little Mab nibbled her biscuit like a frightened mouse, and even Laurence could get up no effort in silence.

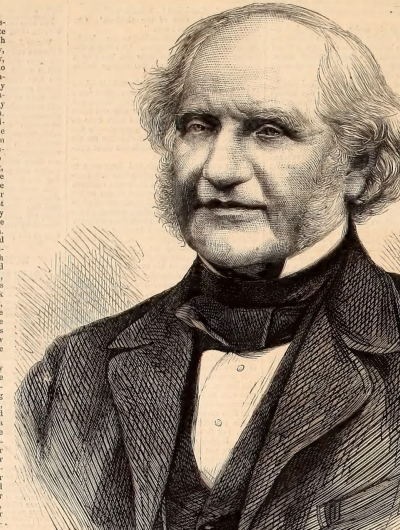
It was no use. The Head was not like itself that day. The foam was white, the distance blue as ever, and the surf came and went with the same melodious ravings—but the charm was gone. Long before the usual time they turned to go, and in the gingerbread basket served

MR. PEABODY'S FUNERAL.

WE give on page 809 an illustration of the funeral of the late MR. GEORGE PEABODY, which took place in Westminster Abbey, where, on the 14th of November, his remains were deposited to await their removal to this country. The ceremony was unusually impressive. Seldom has the venerable Abbey been so densely crowded on a funeral occasion. Nearly every one present, including many representatives of the working-classes, was dressed in mourning; and some of the English papers remark upon the absence of whispering and tittering, and uneasy shifting about, and the general hush that prevailed in the audience, as something singular and unusual; as if even the most thoughtless and frivolous, if any such were there, were for once awed into silence and decorum. The seats of the choir were draped with black cloth, and the space between the stalls was covered with a black carpet: the pulpit and reading-desk were hung with black, and beneath the lantern there was placed a bier covered with black velvet, relieved by a white border, on either side of which seats were reserved for the mourners. The sacrarium was inclosed by barriers of black cloth, and only a few highly privileged spectators were admitted to seats within its area.

Before the doors of the Abbey were opened many persons were waiting for admission, and, although there was little crowding and no confusion at the entrances, very soon every seat in nave and choir and transept was filled, a very considerable proportion of the occupants being ladies. Soon after twelve o'clock the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs arrived, clad in their scarlet gowns, and at once proceeded to the seats reserved for them in the sacrarium. Lord CLARENDON, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, General GREY, and Mr. HUGHES, representing her Majesty, had anticipated their arrival, and were already seated; and not long afterward Mr. GLADSTONE passed quickly through the nave, and took his place by the noble earl. Neither the Premier nor any other member of the Government was in official costume. All wore plain mourning dress, and all, like the rest of the spectators, carried some mark of mourning for the deceased philanthropist.

The grave, as shown in the illustration, had been prepared in the middle of the nave, not far from the west door; and here, with the usual ceremonies of the Church of England, the body was temporarily deposited. It will be brought to this country in her Majesty's ship Monarch, a turret ship of the most recent construction, convoyed by national ships from the American and French navies. The Monarch was to leave Portsmouth on the 8th of December, and is probably now on her way to our shores.



GEORGE PEABODY.

The portrait of Mr. PEABODY on this page is from an excellent photograph of the distinguished philanthropist by Mr. HENRI CLAUDET, of London. The view of the house in which he was born is from a photograph by BLACK, of Salem, Massachusetts, and represents the building as it now stands. It was erected near the beginning of the seventeenth century, and, except new covering, has since undergone very little alteration. The building on the left is part of the well-known glue manufactory of Mr. E. W. UPTON, which, with its several departments, occupies an area of about thirty acres of ground.

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL, IN NEW YORK.

WE give on page 812 an engraving of St. Patrick's Cathedral, on Fifth Avenue, between Fiftieth and Fifty-first streets, New York, as it will appear when completed. This magnificent structure, the corner-stone of which was laid in July, 1858, will be the largest ecclesiastical edifice in America, and will compare favorably, in size and architectural beauty, with the most celebrated cathedrals of Europe. The material of which it is constructed is white marble, within and without, with a substantial filling of brick masonry between the inner and outer walls. The style of architecture is highly ornamented mediæval Gothic, not the usual Romanesque or Byzantine to be found in most of the Roman Catholic churches in this country.

The area covered by this building, including the walls and buttresses, is 46,500 square feet. The space within the walls will afford ample room for fourteen thousand people; and it is computed that even nineteen thousand could be accommodated, should a great occasion ever draw so large a congregation together. The outside length of the edifice is 330 feet from buttress to buttress; inside the walls, 301 feet. The breadth at the transept is 172 feet. 120 above and below the point of intersection of transept and nave. The height from floor to the crown of the arched ceiling will be 110 feet, while the ceilings of the side aisles are 54 feet from the church floor. Along the aisles will be a row of chapels, fourteen in number, the height of each 17 feet. There are to be eight sacristies and two baptisteries at the east end of the church.

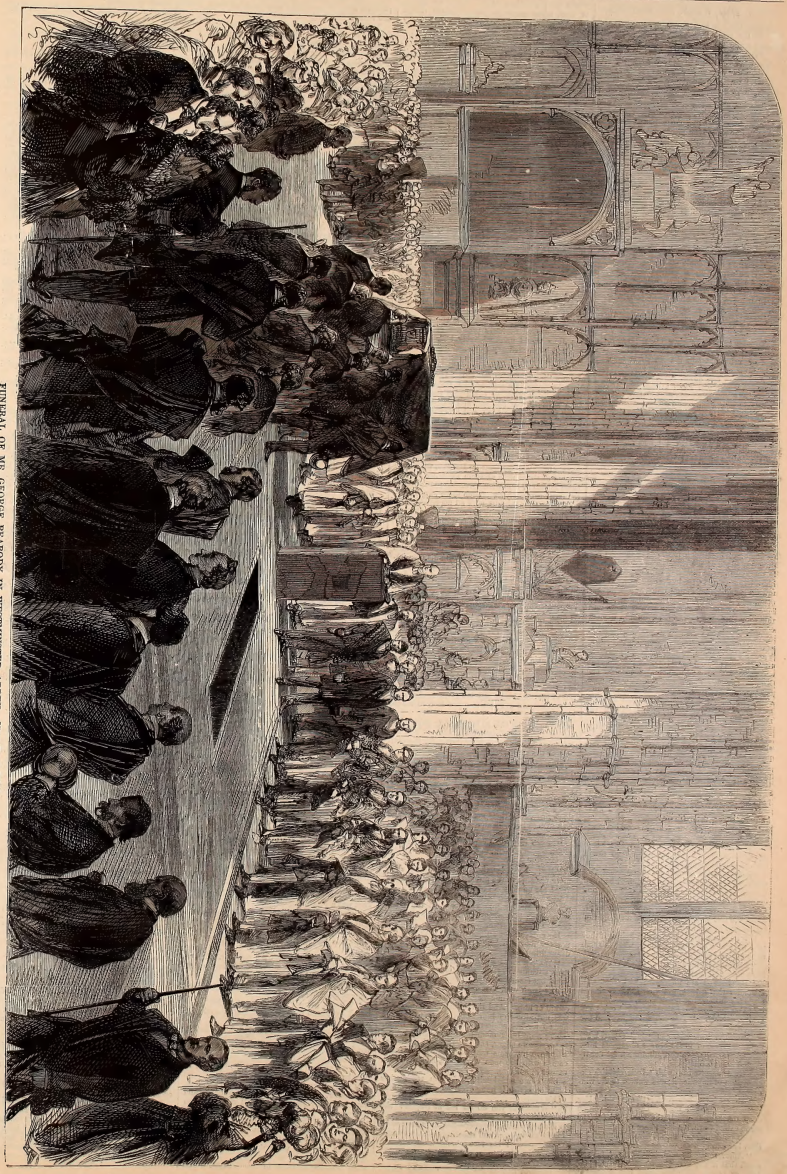
The high altar is to stand 48 feet east of the line of intersection of nave and transept. Back of this is to be a chapel, 48 feet in length, dedicated to the Virgin, richly and elaborately ornamented.

Our engraving shows the richness of the architectural design. The central portal, on Fifth Avenue, which is already erected, is 50 feet in height, and, like the others, is richly decorated. Over the great door a grand circular window will admit the light to the interior, through double panes of rich stained glass. Rising above this window will be a crocketed gable and finial cross. On each side of the great portal, and over the side doors, two towers will rise square at the base, but finish octagonally. They are to be 320 feet in height, and crowned with a finial cross. The transept doors, which will open on Fiftieth and Fifty-first streets, are to be 20 feet wide by 45 high; over each a grand window, ornamented with rich tracery, surmounted by a paneled gable, and terminated by a pinnacle 150 feet from the ground.

The number of large windows in the building will be forty-seven in the rear, thirteen on each side, and thirteen in the clear-story, to light the nave or central aisle. These windows are to have two thicknesses of glass, the outer frame being set two inches from the inner one. The interior will be richly ornamented. In one of the towers over the grand portal on Fifth Avenue the great bell is to be hung, and in the other the chimes. The cathedral will be heated by steam.

The cathedral walls have attained a height of about 50 feet, and the work of building is steadily progressing; but several years must elapse before the completion of the edifice.

BIRTH-PLACE OF GEORGE PEABODY, SOUTH DANVERS, MASSACHUSETTS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BLACK, SALEM, MASSACHUSETTS.]



FUNERAL OF MR. GEORGE PEABODY IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—[SEE PAGE 808.]

WHEN YOU WERE SEVENTEEN.

WHEN the hay was mown, Maggie,
In the years long ago,
And while the western sky was rich
With sunset's rosy glow,
Then hand in hand close-linked we passed
The dewy ricks between,
And I was one-and-twenty, Mag,
And you were seventeen.

Your voice was low and sweet, Maggie;
Your wavy hair was brown;
Your cheek was like the wild red rose
That showered its petals down;
Your eyes were like the blue speedwell,
With dewy moisture sheen,
When I was one-and-twenty, Mag,
And you were seventeen.

The spring was in our hearts, Maggie,
And all its hopes were ours;
And we were children in the fields,
Among the opening flowers.
Ay! Life was like a summer day
Amid the woodlands green,
For I was one-and-twenty, Mag,
And you were seventeen.

The years have come and gone, Maggie,
With sunshine and with shade,
And silvered is the silken hair
That o'er your shoulders strayed
In many a soft and wayward tress—
The latest ever seen—
When I was one-and-twenty, Mag,
And you were seventeen.

Though gently changing Time, Maggie,
Has touched you in his flight,
Your voice has still the old sweet tone,
Your eye the old love-light;
And years can never, never change
The heart you gave, I ween,
When I was one-and-twenty, Mag,
And you were seventeen.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book FIFTH.

CHAPTER V.

A SHADOW ACROSS THE SUNSHINE.

THE summer passed away monotonously at Ville Chiari. The heat increased steadily, reached a climax, and then began very steadily to abate. All through the blazing months Sir John remained at the villa. The house was kept open, and figures were seen seated beneath the loggia, or pacing the shadiest garden walks, and the sound of footsteps echoed on the flagged court-yard.

As the days and weeks and months went by, and brought no tidings from Maud or the vicar, Veronica grew restlessly discontented. For some time anger supported her spirits. But by degrees she became tormented by apprehensions for her father's health. The apprehensions were only momentary, but they returned oftener and oftener. She doubted the possibility that none of her letters had been received, and twisted the matter this way and that way in her mind.

Once she wrote to Sir John on the subject.

It was after a fit of depression and tears, and she was unable to suffer alone. She felt impelled to make him share her pain.

"I do wonder how papa is!" she said, unexpectedly, as they were sitting alone together in the twilight.

Sir John made no answer, but turned uneasily in his chair.

"I do wonder. I want to know. I must know!"

"What is the meaning of this sudden anxiety?"

"It is not sudden. Because I have kept it to myself so long you can not understand that I have been suffering all this time!"

Veronica really thought for the moment that she had been unusually sparing him. She knew herself to have been unhappy at intervals, and omitted to observe that the first moment she had felt the desire to speak of her unhappiness to Sir John, she had yielded to it without a thought of restraining herself for his sake.

"Well, and I do? Can I help it if they take no notice of you? Besides, what is there to be anxious about? No news is good news."

"I wrote to Maud. I did think she would have answered me!"

"Ah! You are infatuated with that girl. I wonder that a person of your intellect should be so taken in by her missish airs."

"You know nothing about Maud!" cried Veronica, quickly. "You can not understand her one bit."

"I understand, seem can you," retorted Sir John. Praise of Maud always displeased him. Veronica's reverence and admiration for her irritated him peculiarly.

Veronica started up with a little childish exclamation of impatience, and walked to the window.

"I must know how papa is!" she said. Her voice was changed now. There were certain deep tones in it which the mention of Maud alone called forth.

Her gentleness disturbed Sir John much less than her earnestness.

"Abior mio," he said, soothingly, "rest assured that if say evil had happened to your father, or if any evil threatened him even, you would not fail to hear of it. There are plenty of kind, pious people in that Arcadian village who would cheerfully take on themselves the duty of imparting any thing disagreeable."

She was willing to be pat on good terms with herself at any body's expense—save Maud's—and she smiled contemptuously at the recollection of the Shipley people.

"Can't you fancy their gloating over such a chance of punishing you for having made the courage to escape from among them?"

"Il Principe Cesare de' Barletti," announced a servant at this moment, and the tête-à-tête interview was at an end.

The prince was a constant, and nearly the only, visitor at Ville Chiari during the summer. One or two other men came occasionally; a stray attaché, left behind in solitary responsibility during the absence of his chief, and bewailing his fate; a belated Prussian grandee, passing through on his way from the sea-bathe at Leghorn to the northern side of the Alps. No English came, and no ladies.

Early in September people began to return to Florence. Veronica made various indirect attempts to see and to be seen by such of the fashionable world as were already to be found driving in the Cascine toward the sunset hour, and inhaling the evening miasma heroically. But Sir John opposed her desire in this particular. And had it not been for a hope which never abandoned her altogether (though it flickered low at times), and for Perugini's promise to write, she would, she told herself, have found the ennui of her secluded life intolerable.

Sir John rarely remained long to come. If he had not desired Barletti's presence at the villa, Sir John would unquestionably have been restrained by no delicacy from making his sentiments manifest.

There were several causes which made Sir John willing to receive Barletti. The first was, that the Neapolitan amused him, played piquet fairly well (in truth, he could play much better than his host, but he took care never to appear to never to hint at the fact), and brought up from the city little gossiping stories which Sir John relished. The second was, that Veronica was either pleasantly gay and good-tempered under the excitement of the stranger's presence, or, if she were otherwise, vented the naughty self-asserting humor of the hour on Barletti, whom she treated at times with absolute insolence. Both these modes of her wayward nature Sir John (the latter especially so. Then there was the circumstance that Barletti, with all his poverty and pluiney, was undoubtedly the scion of an illustrious race. Now Sir John was not the scion of an illustrious race. He would have openly admitted the fact, but he knew it. And it was ineffably soothing to any irritating doubts which he might occasionally entertain on the score of importance in the world, and as to the supremacy of wealth, to contemplate a penniless prince fascinating his rich and pretty guest.

As we are all apt to believe what we wish, Sir John rather overestimated the attractions of his guests, and the impression that his riches made on Barletti.

Early in October Sir John announced his intention of going to Florence for the winter. Veronica was genuinely delighted at the news. But, with a petty perversity which she sometimes indulged in (with fatal results), she received it very coldly. He had made her summer pass in inexpressible boredom; and she was resolved not to gratify him by any appearance of readiness to be amused, the moment it suited him to amuse her.

"We shall be able to have a little gayety and society in Naples," said Sir John. "You deserve some compensation, poverina, for the dullness of the summer."

This provoked Veronica, and she answered without deigning to turn her eyes toward him: "I doubt the power of Naples to give me compensation."

Sir John happened to be in a good temper. His dinner had been varied, savory, and digestible—three conditions not often combined—and he humored her with an exasperating ostentation of forbearance.

"Mechante! Did you in truth find the summer spent alone with me so dull?"

"Very!"

"Ha! I wonder, then, that you do not show more pleasure at the prospect of a change."

"I see no prospect of a change."

The words were barely uttered before she repented them. Sir John's good temper, so roughly strained, had snapped. It was at all times brittle and untrustworthy.

He growled out an inarticulate oath. It was not the first she had heard from his lips addressed to herself.

"What is to do I am?" she thought; "I never take advantage of his good moods. Oh, if I could but command myself!"

The truth was, that his "good moods" were almost the only moments in which she was not afraid of him. And the moments in which she was not afraid of him tempted her to revenge herself for her subjection at most other times. There were other moments when, being roused to passionate anger, she lost fear and prudence. But such moments were still rare in her intercourse with the man whom she had made the master of her fate.

She came and knelt beside him, resting her hand on his as it hung over the cushioned arm of his chair.

"What will you do for me at Naples?" she asked, coaxingly.

He was about to answer—not, as it seemed by his frowning brow and sneering smile, very graciously—when his face changed. He made a strange inarticulate sound, and leaned back, gasping, in his chair.

Veronica flew to the bell to summon assistance, then she bathed his forehead with some perfume from a bottle that stood near at hand, and fanned him with her handkerchief.

"What is it? What is the matter?" she kept asking, wildly. She reiterated her questions when Paul came into the room.

Paul waited no time in summoning her. With a swiftness very surprising and unexpected in one whose movements were habitually so deliberate, he loosened his master's cravat. Then he ran to Sir John's bedroom and returned with a traveling flask, from which he poured a few drops of brandy between his master's throat.

When he had done so, he answered Veronica as calmly as though she had that instant put some civilized question to him.

"A faintness, miladi. He will be better now. It is passing."

Veronica stood by, scared and trembling. Paul fetched some cold water, and threw it sharply on his master's cheeks and forehead.

"Shall I not call some of the other servants?" said Veronica, clasping and unclasping her hands nervously. "Some one must be sent for a doctor."

"Better not, just yet. We shall hear what he says. He is coming to himself."

Sir John did revive. Some semblance of life returned to his face, which had grown strangely livid.

His eyes fell on Veronica, and he turned them away with a look of impatience.

"What is it?" he muttered, bending over him. "Can you not speak to me?"

Sir John feebly tried to raise his handkerchief to his mouth, but failed. He looked appealingly at Paul, who immediately wiped the water from his master's face, in a steady matter-of-course way. Still Sir John did not speak.

Paul watched him intently; and at last said to Veronica: "You had better go away, miladi. I shall call Annina to my help, and help Sir John to his room. He will lie down and repose for an hour or so, and then he will be quite well again. That is my firm faith."

During this speech Paul kept his eyes fixed on his master's face, and seemed to read in it approval and confirmation of his words; for he added, almost instantly: "Yes, yes; that is it. The heat made him faint. It is nothing; and you had better go away, miladi."

Veronica obeyed in bewilderment. She was glad to escape from the scene; and yet she somewhat resented being sent away.

She was walking quickly along the corridor that led to her own room when she heard a voice close behind her: "Miladi!"

Her heart leaped at the suddenness of the sound, and she turned round in terror. It was Paul.

"Pardon, miladi. I fear I startled you. The heating is a little of a human footstep. I only wanted to say that Sir John much wishes that the other domestics should not be told of his little indisposition. He dislikes a fuss, he says, miladi."

"Oh! he has spoken to you, then! How is he?"

"Sir John is much better, miladi. The heat made him faint. It is nothing."

Veronica went to her boudoir, and tried to think steadily of what had just happened. She did not believe that it had been a mere fainting fit. There was a strange look in Sir John's face, unlike any thing she had ever seen before. Was he very ill? Was he going to die?

She rose and moved restlessly about the room. Then she stopped suddenly, and reflected that Paul had given an explanation. Paul had not even recommended that no doctor should be sent for. Paul knew Sir John well. He must know whether there was danger or not!

If—oh, if Sir John were going to die!

Her knees shook under her, and she threw herself on a sofa. As she sat there, stretched at full length, with her face buried in the cushions, her hair pushed aside, and her hands covering her ears, a loud knock went out some terrible sound, for a long time.

Once she had heard of a heavy door echoed through the house, and for many minutes after the last reverberation had died away her heart had throbbed painfully; and she waited in the tremor of suspense and fear, expecting to be summoned by Paul's voice. No one came. The afternoon passed away, and at last she heard one of the women-servants singing a Tuscan love-song, as she moved about the house at her work. That was a comforting sound. It was a very, very feeling dizzy and half blind as she faced the light. There were no tears on her face, but it was dashed with a few ominous streaks, where she had pressed her cheek against the cushion. Her first act was to look the door which communicated with the corridor. There was another door in the boudoir leading to her bedchamber, to which there was no other access. She locked that, and the looking-glass had contemplated herself.

"What a ghost I look!" she thought, "and how I have been tormenting myself! And perhaps for nothing, after all!"

She hesitated for a moment, but finally took a book from the table, unlocked the door of the boudoir, rang the bell, and returned to the sofa.

"Miladi rang?" said the maid, coming to the door. Veronica had taught all the servants to give her that title.

"Yes. What o'clock is it? I shall not dress for dinner. I fell asleep over my book, and have made my head ache. Get me some eau de cologne. Put on my peignoir, and shut out that glare. How red the sunset is! You must brush my hair in the dark as well as you can. I can not bear the light."

It was not dark when the maid had closed the persienes, but it was dim. Veronica's white wrapper gleamed in the twilight. The maid stood patiently brushing out her mistress's thick tresses in silence.

"Did you ever faint, Beppina?" asked her mistress.

"Faint? No, miladi."

"You have seen people in fainting fits, perhaps?"

"Yes; I saw a girl once, who was in a dead swoon."

"There is no danger in them, of course?"

"Who knows!" answered Beppina, with an expressive shrug.

"What made the girl you saw faint?"

"Hunger, miladi."

"Hunger!"

"Yes. Her damo* had been a Garibaldino, and he got wounded in the wars; and when he came back to Florence, was sick and sickly, he could get no work, and his people were too poor to help him, so Gigia—she was a dress-maker's apprentice—kept him, and gave him nearly all her food. And one day, when she was going to her work, she turned giddy, and fell down in the street, and they took her to a hospital, and the doctor said she had not had enough to eat; and that was all that was the matter with her."

"How dreadful! It must be awful to be so poor!"

"Eh, che vuole? She couldn't have loved him more if she had been rich! And she saved his life, and that was a consolazione di Dio."

"Sir John is, miladi, and will you excuse him from coming into the dining-room? He will have the honor of joining you in the evening afterward."

Paul said these words from the bondoir, holding the door that communicated with the bedroom in his hand.

"How is Sir John?" asked Veronica, in English.

"Sir John has reposed, miladi, and is quite well, only a little fatigued with the heat."

"I shall not come down to dinner. Tell them to serve it in the little blue room next my boudoir."

"Yes, miladi. Then I shall tell the signor principe that miladi does not receive this evening?"

Veronica was emboldened by the fact that, while Paul's face could be seen illumined by the setting sun, whose light streamed into the boudoir, her own face was in shadow. Tell them sometimes been vexed with herself for being in a kind of awe under Paul's grave glance, and for having assumed more than once airs and manifestation of willfulness to be checked by its silent influence. Now she resolved to consult her own wishes and pleasure, and drew a little superfluous asperity into the voice in which she answered:

"Not certainly not! I have given you no such directions."

"Miladi wishes to have the dinner served for two in the blue room?"

"Yes. No! I will dine in the dining-saloon, and—is the prince here?"

"The signor principe is under the west loggia, smoking a cigar."

"Have you mentioned to him that Sir John was—was not well?"

"Sir John does not choose me to say so, miladi."

"That will do. You will have a cover laid for the prince. I shall try to persuade him to stay to amuse and cheer Sir John a little this evening."

After all, she had not succeeded in simply issuing her commands without apology or explanation to Paul.

The latter bowed and withdrew.

Veronica waited until his footsteps had died away in the distance, and then she said, putting her hand to her forehead with the gesture of one struck with a sudden remembrance: "I'll forget to give Paul a message for Sir John!"

"Shall I go, miladi?" asked Beppina.

"Yes, certainly. Stay! Stay! Give me a lace scarf, or something to wrap over my head. Thus will do. Lay out a dinner dress—a thing light and cool. I shall return in a few minutes."

Veronica passed through her boudoir and descended the staircase leading to Sir John's apartments, which were on the ground-floor. Arrived at the basement story, however, she entered one of the long, stone-flagged corridors which occupied the whole west side of the villa; opened a glass door, and stepped out into the loggia. Cesare de' Barletti was smoking in the loggia, as Paul had said. As soon as he perceived Veronica, his brave away his cigar and advanced toward her, hat in hand.

THE PARRICIDE.

A LEGEND OF THE ROMAGNA.

I.—THE SENTENCE.

"He is guilty, beyond all doubt!" The deep voice of the new Baron di Cruvelli rang sternly through the silent hall. The pale youth in the custody of the guards looked anxiously around, but found no friend.

"He is guilty," continued the Baron. "I tremble—I shudder to assign so dread a crime, and so fearful a punishment to one so young as he; but the law must have its course, and justice must be done."

A low murmur of assent arose from the audience.

It was in the principal hall of the Castello di Cruvelli. Six days before the last Baron had been found dead in his bed. Evident marks of poison were about him. His son had been the only one found near the room. The dead man's brother had charged him with the murder, arrested him, thrown him into the lowest dungeon, and vowed vengeance on him. He had then assumed the title and power of Baron di Cruvelli, and his first act had been the trial and condemnation of his nephew.

* Sweet-heart.

"Parricide!" cried the Baron, in an awful voice. "Is this so at me? What have you to say for yourself?"

"Wretch!" cried the youth. "Do you dare to look me in the face? Murderer of my father, do you dare to murder the son also? Where is my mother? Have you slain her too?"

"Wretched boy! You but add to your crimes. Do not try to lessen your guilt by imputing it to me. As to your mother, she has fled, and has escaped for the present from the punishment due for her share in this foul crime."

"Thank God!" cried the youth, fervently; "she, at least, is safe from you. For my part you can but kill me. Kill me, then, as you killed my father. But remember this, that there is a time hereafter when he and I and all of us will rise up against you!"

The Baron's eyes blazed with fury.

"Fool!" he cried, "every word that you utter only makes your fate the worse."

"My fate can not be worse," calmly returned the other. "But oh! can it be possible that among all my father's followers there is not one who will help his son!"

He looked around appealingly over the assembly. But fear rested upon the hearts of those who otherwise might have helped him.

"There is no sympathy for the parricide, but there is a terrible punishment," said the Baron, savagely. "Hear what our laws assign:

"He who is guilty of the foul and unnatural crime shall be tucked naked in a sack with an ape, a cat, a fox, and a serpent; he shall then be thrown into Styria—a high cliff into the running water, to the end that the earth be not polluted with his blood." Such, wretched youth, is the doom of the wicked, and such shall be your fate. Prepare then for this, for I swear by St. Anthony that ere another hour you shall die."

The young man looked defiantly at his tyrant, and was led away by the guards.

An hour after midnight a number of men were assembled on the topmost tower of the castle.

The Baron stood on one side. His attendants, six in number, were near him. They held the young man firmly, so that he could not escape. The tower overlooked a river, which now, swollen with the rains, swiftly to the sea.

In a short time four more came up. They drew with them a leathern bag of large dimensions. In this bag the horrible colocation—a serpent, a fox, a cat, and an ape. At a sign from the Baron the attendants drew the youth toward the sack.

The others held it partly open.

The young man was thrust in.

There was a fierce struggle inside. The stern guards themselves averted their eyes.

"Away with him!" cried the Baron, in a hoarse voice.

In another instant the bag was hurled from the tower, and, falling like lightning it splashed into the river below.

"Any way, he's got one chance," muttered a guardsman between his teeth; "I gave him my knife!"

II.—ESCAPE.

A few hundred yards below the Castello di Cruvelli there was a thick-grown copse which projected into the river. Here, not long after the scene just narrated, a young man had concealed himself, and was naked. Blood flowed from different wounds, and in his hand he held a knife.

Here, concealed from view, he looked out upon the world around him. The vast pile of the Castello di Cruvelli arose not far away, built upon a high bank of the river which formed the termination of a projecting spur from the Apennines. Near it a little collection of houses was clustered. In the distance the wide Roman Campagna spread away.

Evening was coming rapidly on, and soon the sun sank down below the western horizon. Then the young man left his lurking-place, and stole on cautiously toward the castle. Darkness soon covered the whole land, and he reached the little hamlet unobserved. One of the cottages stood a little apart from the others and outside the limits of the hamlet. There were voices within. He knocked at the door. Soon steps were heard, and a man appeared.

"Who is there?" said he, as he opened the door and peered out into the dark.

"An unfortunate," said the other, "who has been robbed by brigands, and stripped even of his clothes. Have you an old coat to spare, so that I may conceal my nakedness?"

"Brigands!" said the other; "poor devil! I think I may provide you a coat, though it is a ragged one. Wait a moment."

The man went in, and soon returned with several articles of clothing, coarse but serviceable, and the young man received them and put them on with fervent expressions of gratitude.

"Come in," said the cottager, at last.

"No," said the other; "do you come out; I have a word to say to you."

"Ah!" said the other, cautiously; "can you not say it here?"

"I do not fear; it is something which I do not wish to be overheard."

After some hesitation the cottager stepped out and went off to a little distance with the other.

"Well, what is it that you have to say?"

"Do you know me?"

"No."

"Do you recognize my voice, Maffeo?"

"Holy Saints!" cried the other, in a voice of terror. "Who are you? What is it that you want with me?"

"Maffeo, is this your fidelity?"

"Are you not dead, Dan? Oh, my dear master!" cried Maffeo, incredulous at this wonder.

"God has delivered me," said the other, solemnly, "by almost a miracle."

"But you were thrown into the river," said the other, wonderingly.

"Ay, but I had a knife, and I cut the bag. I am safe. I am here. I will be avenged."

"Ah! I will gladly do any thing for you, my lord and master," cried Maffeo, kneeling down and kissing the hand of the young man.

"How is the peasantry? Are they faithful to me, or traitors?"

"Faithful, my lord, to your father's memory and to you. They mourn over your fate, and execrate the murderer."

"The servants in the house are faithful?"

"No, my lord; most of them would gladly have saved your life. But they were afraid. They could only help you in silence, and pray to Heaven to avenge you."

"I must let them know that I am alive."

"Then there is no time to lose," said Maffeo, in an altered voice.

"What do you mean?" cried the young Baron, startled at the change in his tone.

Maffeo was silent for a moment.

"Tell me," urged the other. "Do you think, after what I have suffered, that there is any thing which I can not bear?"

Maffeo hesitated.

"Tell, tell me," the other, vehemently.

"They have captured the Countess."

"My mother!" exclaimed the other, in a despairing voice.

Maffeo was silent.

"No time to be lost. I must save her or perish. If I can not save her, then I will die. Death will then be better than life. Maffeo, you must assist me."

"Until death," said Maffeo, fervently; and he kissed his master's hand.

"It is well," said the young Baron.

III.—THE EXECUTION.

Yes, the Baroness di Cruvelli had indeed been captured. Flying for her life from the murderers of her husband, she had been pitilessly pursued; and the journey had been too close for her to escape. They had seized her at a place which was two days' journey from the castle, and brought her back on the very evening of the day when her son had been thrown over the battlements.

The Baroness had never dreamed that such a fate could possibly befall her enemy. The Baron, who was incapable either of pity or remorse, received her with a malignant smile, and told her of her son's fate. The horror of this overwhelmed her, and she fell senseless to the ground.

They bore away and restore her," said the Baron.

The attendants carried her away, pityingly. They were under the power of the Baron, and dared not refuse. Yet there were few in that company who would not have gladly raised their hands against the tyrant, if some such leader could have appeared and given the word. They could do this which was in store for their loved and gentle mistress, and shudder.

On the following day the Baron summoned his prisoner before his mock tribunal, and subjected her to a cruel examination. He charged upon her the guilt of her husband's death, informed her that the whole family had been punished, according to law, for sharing in the crime, and told her that her sex alone saved her from the same fate. He added that he was willing to be merciful, and, instead of dooming her to a death like his, he would allow her a milder fate: she should only be burned.

The Baroness was too much overwhelmed by her despair to utter a word.

She stood up, with her pale face and mournful eyes, and looked all around upon those who were present. The faces of the servants were around her. They looked at her with sympathy and in deepest sympathy. A low murmur was heard among them. The Baron silenced it with a terrible frown. And the Baroness was led away to her cell.

Her execution was to take place on the morning of the following day.

The morning came.

In the court-yard there was a block fixed, which had been placed there on the preceding night. The executioner stood there waiting, with his axe. He was one who had presented himself on the previous day, with high recommendations from the Duke of Ferrara. The Baron was delighted to receive so accomplished a performer.

The executioner wore a black mask, which, he said, he usually wore, in order to conceal the count of a religious vow. At this time he took his station by the block, and waited.

Soon the Baroness made her appearance. She was accompanied by a priest. She took her stand near the block, while the priest whispered a few words to her. Her eyes were downcast, but there was a flush on her cheek which did not look like the fear of death.

Soon the Baron appeared, and all the servitors in the castle followed. A large crowd stood all around. The Baron came and took his seat close to the block. The executioner stood motionless, leaning his glittering axe.

"Come, baron," said the Baron; "I want my breakfast, and you are delaying me."

The Baroness advanced to the block.

The executioner stooped and whispered a few words in her ear. Again the red flush glowed on her cheek. She said nothing, but laid her head on the block.

The executioner lifted his axe, and looked at the Baron.

"All right. Strike!" said the Baron.

The executioner whirled the ponderous axe around like lightning, and flung its keen edge full against the Baron's neck. So tremendous was the blow, and so well aimed, that the Baron's head, severed from the body, went spinning off through the air, the blood spouted up from the neck, the lifeless body sank down.

The executioner tore off his mask, and rushed up to the Baroness. The servitors stood paralyzed.

"Cuitifis!" he cried, "I am your lord; I am the Baron di Cruvelli.

They recognized the face of the son of the murdered Baron. The priest tore off his robes, and revealed the form and features of Maffeo.

For a moment there was bewilderment. Then a loud shout rent the air. Not one refused to join in that shout.

"Take this carcass," said the young Baron, after he had recovered from the shock, who was now leaning, trembling and half fainting with joy, on his arm,—"take this carcass, and bury it outside. Let no priest say prayers over it. Let it be accursed.

So the young Baron avenged his wrongs.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

GREESBRAUN is the name of a certain Swedish professor, who, if his own account may be credited, has lately made a discovery which bids fair to confer incalculable benefits upon mankind at no cost. The secret process he can put a living serpent to sleep, rendering it rigid as if dead, and then, after any length of time, may be reanimated at my moment. Encouraged by success, the Professor is desirous of experimenting upon a higher order of living creatures, and has applied to the Swedish Government for the loan of a condemned criminal, promising to transform him into a corpulent for the pagals of the Stockholm Town Hall for two years, and to restore him to life and motion at the end of that time. Supposing the authorities of Sweden accede to this proposal, and supposing the experiment succeeded, what a wonderful amelioration might be introduced into our existence! Imprisonment it would be to avoid all the difficulties of life by suddenly transferring one's self into a block of stone for an indefinite period! If a man has but little money to spend, to cut at compound interest, and take a Grosselbachian nap until a competence sufficient to accumulate. Divorce courts could be abolished; for if one wife proved a couple quarrelsome, or them can agree to undergo the Grosselbachian procedure until the honeymoon is over, when looked daisgreen and wicked. Its neck was covered with large sores, like the scales, and three inches in length, which hooked together and formed an impenetrable armor. Its body was of a tawny-yellow color, and altogether hideous. It was accompanied by a smaller specimen of its own species, only a few feet in length, but in shape and appearance resembling the larger one. The monster was about four feet from the vessel, and distinctly seen. The captain gave orders to have a boat lowered. He did not think it fit that under the presence of the vessel seemed to alarm it, and it stopped into the water and disappeared.

It is asserted that there is not such a city in the world as London for vagrancy and vagabondism of every kind. Owing to the fact that there are but few police in the metropolitan district. Besides the force of prevention, the work-houses on the West District furnish relief to the destitute. The North District provides for 24,800 persons. The Central District provides for 24,000 persons. The Eastern provides for seven hundred and thirteen persons are cared for in the East District, and in the Southern District 25,417 persons. The total is a total of 128,000 men, women, and children, occupants of the union workhouses of the metropolitan London, with a population of less than three and a half millions. Besides this number there are thousands of casuals who receive judgage in the workhouses and outside the fearful aggregate there are roaming in and about London at least fifty thousand persons who frequent the work-houses from various reasons, and consequently have to "break out," as it is called in New York.

The petrifaction process of preserving the human giant has exploded. Professors and learned men, who ought to know about such matters, say it is too absurd to talk about, and that it is impossible to do tools of their craft, and these look not very succinct ones, either. The Professor at first it was supposed that the monster might be perhaps three hundred years old, and the Boynton counts his possible existence by days, making the process giant-producing—only a little more than a year old!—which is quite a difference.

A "big thing" has been discovered in Dupage County, Illinois, which is pronounced no swindle. The bones are genuine, belonging to a mastodon or some huge creature of kindred type, which must have been somewhere from fifty feet high and twenty long. These relics were discovered by a farmer while digging a well, and have created quite an excitement.

Another remarkable fossil skeleton has been found in Mariposa County, California—that of a monstrous animal twenty-six feet long: a horned creature with a skull which weighs five hundred pounds. What is particularly curious is, that surrounding this skeleton when found, there were forty or fifty apparently human skulls! Was the monster carnivorous?

An excursion to the Elephantine Island, where stands the ancient Nilometer, built many centuries before Christ's birth, has been proposed by the Viceroy of Egypt. The Nilometer has been visited by few for since 1799. It consists of some gigantic calcareous blocks on the shores of the river Nile near the tropic of Cancer. The ancient Egyptians built it to mark the rise and fall of the Nile, and to know when to avert an inundation. The island on which it stands is uninhabited; but, strange to say, is almost a paradise, glorious with tropical beauty.

Jenny Lind recently made her public appearance before a large audience at Exeter Hall, London. She received a warm reception, and surprised her hearers by the freshness she displayed. She had been absent (died in London in May, 1887; and that, after twenty-two years, she was able to captivate a critical audience by her vocal powers is truly wonderful.

One immediate result of Eugénie's expedition to Egypt was the invention of a new color—the "Waters of the Nile"—a changeable, watery, glittering, shrewy green. The shade is most beautiful in rich silk. A Parisian Madame has invented a variety of buttons to be worn with a costume of this color, and they are regarded as the triumph of the jewelers' art. They represent a whole family of little scarabs, with real and elastic backs and movable tails; the largest of the set is not more than a centimetre in length, and they diminish in size as they approach the throat. As experiments in toilette is predicted to be the style during the coming season, other novelties besides Zone du Nil and crocodile buttons may be expected.

A couple of American gentlemen did a cool thing with two Parisian ladies at an hotel, when a Russian prince, who, perhaps, wished to pick a quarrel, purchased two handsome bouquets and sent them to the ladies with his compliments. The Americans merely glanced over to his table, bowed cordially, and sent the bouquets back, by the waiter, two Napoleons. He was so much charmed that he left the room.

The new and magnificent building of the Young Men's Christian Association on Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street was dedicated on the evening of December 5. The large hall was densely crowded with the friends and members of the society, and on the platform appeared many of the most distinguished men of our State and nation. The exercises, consisting of reading the Scriptures, singing by the choir, prayer, and addresses, were exceedingly interesting.

Gluck died in 1787, and last week in Berlin at the age of fifty-seven, was a native of Bohemia. The splendid voice was not early developed, her first public appearance being when she was seventeen; and though she attracted some attention at that time, it was not until thirty years later that she took a real triumph at Milan in her representation of "Norma." The wonderful personation of the character of Norma gave her the title of "Queen," she lived in retirement many years before her death.

The face of the hair ay about to be numbered. Report whispers that Miss Jane who was the ladies of fashion have resolved to suppress it, and brown hair is to be substituted. Such blasphemy, if it originates, it is said, will be the favorite flower for dressing the hair; but the lotus is becoming to dark persons only—which will be a sad proportion of the fair.

The "Grand Army of the Republic"—an extended organization of the officers and soldiers of our late army—has issued the following plan for securing truthful details of the history of the Rebellion. At each meeting of the society the facts and data which come under the personal observation of the writer. These papers are to be filed, and, in due course of time transmitted to Head-quarters, and preserved in the Grand Army Papers."

The history of officers and privates can each tell his own story, furnishing reliable histories of special battles, incidents in camp life, sketches of comrades who fell in action, and descriptions of specific forces of the field. It is anticipated that this plan will result in securing valuable data for the history of the great civil war.

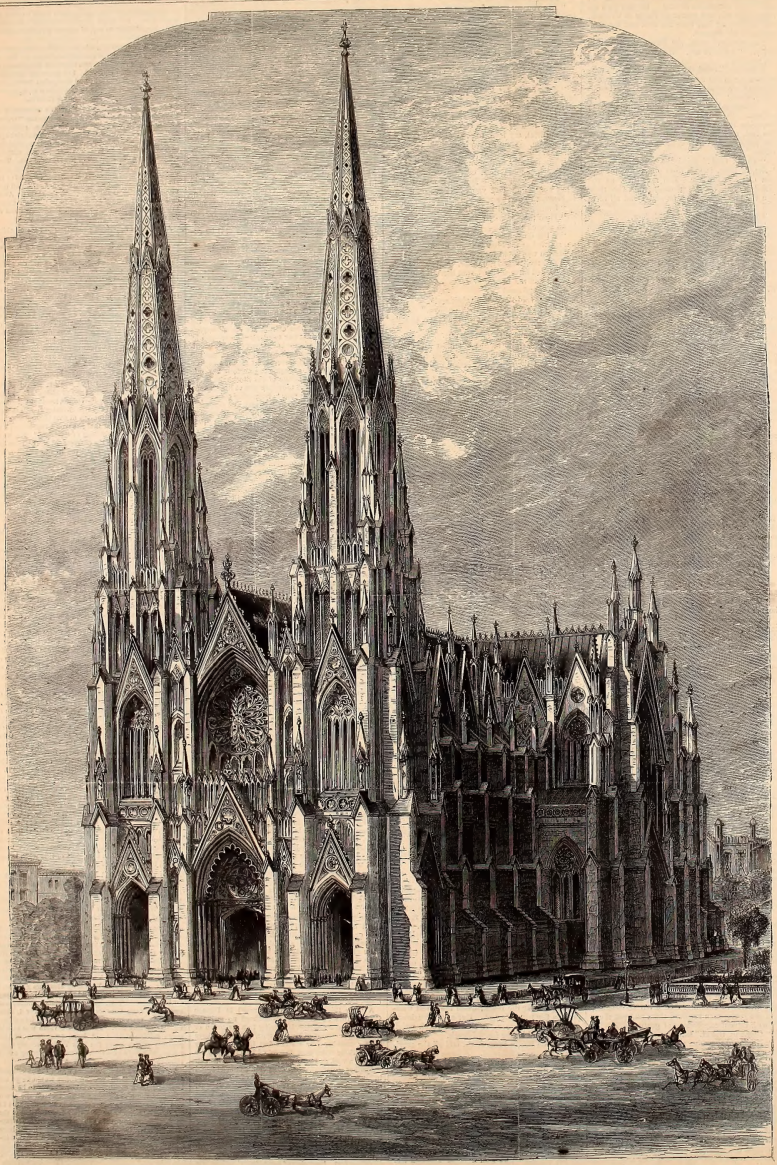
The Alaska Times sends forth an earnest appeal on behalf of the Russian and Aleutian population of that territory. It states that the people are in a state of destitution, and is inclined to blame the old proprietors of the Russian Fur Company, from which many derived their support, directly or indirectly. Other changes have come in with the treaty, which have deprived citizens of their means of support. And the paper calls upon the Government to cause to consider the country worthless, but to do its duty toward it.

Chicago is about to have a new tunnel built under the Chicago River for the purpose of connecting the two divisions of the city. The tunnel is to consist of three passages, two for east one for foot-passengers, and the other two for horses, vehicles drawn by horses. The distance across the river at La Salle street is 1,000 feet, the central line of the tunnel to be placed, is three hundred feet. The open approaches to the tunnel on each side are to be paved with wooden block pavement. The total cost of this work is estimated to be upward of $470,000.

The notorious Bible of Steuben County has been translated to another sphere of action. It is asserted by an exchange, whose veracity we dare not doubt, that it climbed into a hay-mow, pulled the tree up after him, and that was the last we shall hear of him."

There are three wrecking companies in New York city, which were organized for the purpose of rendering assistance to disabled vessels on the coasts and reefs of our coast, or otherwise disabled. They are the Atlantic Submarine Wrecking Company, the Coast Wrecking Company, and the Eastern Submarine Wrecking Company. They are constantly prepared for any contingency. Their steamers are always kept out for a ten days' cruise, and are perfectly equipped with all necessary wrecking materials. During the two years ending October 1, 1889, October 1, 1889, eighty-six vessels were wrecked in the immediate vicinity of this port. Their entire value was over seven million dollars. A large proportion of this property was saved by the New York wrecking companies, who were on the instruction to rescuing about three thousand persons from drowning.

To economize in the articles which the intelligent grocer can add to his ground coffee would be an act beyond human capabilities. But what is to be done now that there is a large manufactory on the south side of the Thames where coffee is manufactured on the berry! Another grocers' trick is developed in the paper with which some of them are accused of wrapping up the articles in which they deal. Sugar-bags that are worked with the name are indeed a notable instance of this. An enterprising individual, after using rounded stencils on the sacks more of his paper pulp, has taken out a patent for making these bags of pulp filings;



ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL, FIFTH AVENUE, BETWEEN FIFTIETH AND FIFTY-FIRST STREETS, NEW YORK.—[SEE PAGE 808.]

REV. JOHN LANAHAN.—[PHOT. BY ROCKWOOD, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.]

THE REV. JOHN LANAHAN, D.D.

THE REV. JOHN LANAHAN, one of the "Book Agents" in charge of the Methodist Publishing House in this city, is a Virginian by birth, though of Irish ancestry. In the year 1838, being then a youth of eighteen years, he joined the "Old Baltimore Conference," so famous in the annals of the Methodist itinerancy. His ministerial life has been spent mostly in Washington, Georgetown, Alexandria, Baltimore, and the adjacent districts. This region, from the year 1845 until the breaking out of the late civil war, comprised the debatable ground between the Northern and Southern Methodist Churches, known as "the border." It was, in its way, a battle-ground. Harassed by the popular excitements which in the Slave States accompanied the progress of the interminable slavery controversy, the border preachers experienced all the bitterness of the ecclesiastical strife which preceded the contest between armed forces. Dr. LANAHAN'S life during this period called for the utmost firmness and decision, and gave these traits, which are predominant in him, constant exercise. Upon the breaking out of the war the preachers of the "border" were subjected to trials of still greater severity. Some of them, with their congregations, went over to the South, others adhering to the National cause. Congregations, families, and social circles were divided without hope of reconciliation. In this crisis DR. LANAHAN soon became conspicuous as an unflinching patriot. During all the war his relations with the government were those of a trusted adviser. It has been his good fortune repeatedly to receive the thanks of the departments for his services to the national cause.

At the last General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which met in Chicago, May 1, 1868, DR. LANAHAN was, quite unexpectedly to himself, elected Second or Assistant Book Agent. The Publishing House, of which the agents have charge, wields a capital of nearly $700,000, publishes a large list of periodicals, besides supplying the Church with denominational books. In this position DR. LANAHAN'S habits of close observation enabled him to detect imperfect business methods; his investigations led him, step by step, to the discovery of the "great mismanagement" and "serious losses" which have excited a painful interest in the public mind.

As a preacher DR. LANAHAN is earnest, and at times highly impassioned. As an administrative officer he is remarkable for his unswerving integrity and his iron-nerved adherence to the decisions of his judgment. A sterling patriot, a faithful minister, he has deserved well of his Church and his country.

GEN. J. L. ALCORN, GOVERNOR-ELECT OF MISSISSIPPI. [PHOTOGRAPHED BY GURNEY, NEW YORK.]

GENERAL ALCORN.

GENERAL J. L. ALCORN, Governor-elect of Mississippi, whose portrait will be found on this page, was born in 1816, in what was then the Territory of Illinois. At an early age he entered college, but remained there only a few terms, leaving his studies to enter upon active life as deputy to his uncle, the sheriff of Livingston County, Kentucky. He subsequently became sheriff, and was afterward elected by the Whigs to the Lower House of the State Legislature. In 1846 he removed, with his family, to Mississippi, and settled in Coahoma County, where he has since resided. Here he commenced the practice of law. He was soon afterward elected to the State Legislature; and at the same time was chosen by the Whigs in his old district to represent them in the Legislature of Kentucky. He was a member of the Mississippi Legislature for twenty years. Strongly opposed to secession, he was elected to the Convention of 1861 as a Unionist; but finding his efforts to prevent the secession of the State unavailing, he cast in his fortunes with the South, and was appointed a Brigadier-General. After serving some time in the field, he retired from active duty, and was elected to the State Legislature, where he strongly opposed the policy advocated by the more desperate leaders of the rebellion. At great personal risk he protested against the law exempting slaveholders from service in the Confederate army, and declared the wholesale conscription measures enforced throughout the Southern States to be a confession of failure.

On the close of the war General ALCORN was elected to the United States Senate, but was not allowed to take his seat. He has since identified himself with the Republican party of his State, and has recently been elected Governor by a large majority.

THE FIRST COTTON-GIN.—DRAWN BY WILLIAM L. SHEPPARD.—[SEE PAGE 814.]

FIRST USE OF THE COTTON-GIN.

OUR engraving on page 813 represents the primitive cotton-gin, which preceded the saw gin invented by ELI WHITNEY toward the close of the last century. This simple contrivance consisted of two cylinders revolving in opposite directions, which admitted the fibre readily but prevented the passage of the seed and larger "trash," but not so thoroughly cleaning the cotton as WHITNEY'S machine. The scene represented by our artist is the introduction of the gin on a plantation, amidst the excited curiosity of the negroes, who see in the machine a welcome relief from the laborious process of cleaning the cotton by hand.

ATTENTION is directed to the advertisement of TANNER & CO., in this paper, of the Eight per Cent. Gold Bonds of the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Co., which speaks for itself. These bonds are also for sale by Messrs. CONVERSE & CO.—[COM.]

A CHRISTMAS OR NEW YEAR'S PRESENT.—A monthly or a weekly publication for young people makes one of the most acceptable presents that can be given during the holidays, and for this purpose the VERNA'S COMPANION, of Boston, is admirably adapted. It will make its appearance new and fresh with each succeeding week, is always delightful, entertaining and practical. Some of the most brilliant writers in the country contribute to its columns.—[COM.]

CHAPPED HANDS AND FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured at once by the use of Hegeman's Camphor Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. See that you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—HEGEMAN & CO., New York.

If your hair is coming out or turning gray, do not murmur over a misfortune you can so easily avert. AYER'S HAIR VIGOR will remove the cause of your grief by restoring your hair to its natural color, and therewith your good looks and good nature.—(COM.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR BLACK WORMS and PIMPLES on the FACE, see PERRY'S COMEDONE AND PIMPLE REMEDY. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold every where.

HOLIDAY GOODS.

No. 652 Broadway.

SWISS WATCHES,
of all styles and prices.

PARIS AND GENEVA JEWELRY,
FRENCH CLOCKS, BRONZES,
MANTEL ORNAMENTS,
CHINA VASES,
FANS, OPERA GLASSES,
MUSICAL BOXES,
and a large selection of
PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES,
well adapted for
HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Ve J. MAGNIN, GUEDIN, & CO.,
Importers and Wholesale Dealers.
Sole Agents for the NARDIN WATCH.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS
AT THE FURNITURE STORE OF
G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.,
661 BROADWAY, Opposite Bond St.
FANCY CHAIRS of every description.
Emerson's PATENT ROCKING CHAIRS, without rockers.
FLOWER and WINDOW STANDS, and Flowers.
Pedestals, Swiss Carved Woods, and Jardinieres.
Also, an Curtain Store, 647 Broadway:
LACE CURTAINS, LAMBREQUINS, and all kinds of Curtain Materials and Trimmings.
TABLE and PIANO COVERS, &c.

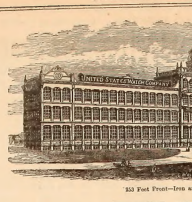
A FOOL
can not be cheated, for no one need buy WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT if they try it, free of cost, at 51 Chatham Square, N. Y. A pint sent, free of express charges, on receipt of $3; or a gallon for $20, double strength.

SANTA CLAUS
At 98 Chambers St.
Toys, Fancy Goods,
and
HOLIDAY PRESENTS
For the Million.
WM. A. HARWOOD.

A GREAT OFFER.
HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of One Hundred Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for cash during the Holidays, or will take from $5 to $10 monthly until paid; the same to let, and rent money applied if purchased. New 7-Octave Pianos for $176 and upward; New Organs for $46 and upward, for cash.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either HARPER'S WEEKLY, MONTHLY, OR BAZAR, $4, and THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $2, sent to one address for $5, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.



33 Fast Front—Iron and Glass.

WORKS OF THE
UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,
(GILES, WALES, & CO.), MARION, N. J.

GILES, WALES, & CO.,
IMPORTERS, MANUFACTURERS, and JOBBERS,
SALESROOM OF THE
United States Watch Company,
13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

Manufacturers Of all the grades of AMERICAN Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders, BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The finer grades all having three pairs Conical Pivots, Cap Jewelled, in Gold Settings, and recently adjusted to Heat, Cold, Isochronism and Position; and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Hair Springs; and for our late improvement in STEM-WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and SMOOTHNESS hitherto sustained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for taking three different times.

☞ Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, enclosing business card. For sale by the trade generally.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
And GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

WATCH No. 1064—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months: its total variation from mean time being only one second per month. WILLARD BERRY,
Of Derby, Shore, & Preston, Jersey City, N.J.

WATCH No. 1174—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co.," manufactured by the United States Watch Co., has been carried by me seven months: its total variation from mean time being only six seconds.
A. L. DENNIS, President N. J. R. R. T. & T. Co.

WATCH No. 1191—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me four months: its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month.
F. A. HASKELL, Con. Hudson River R. R.

WATCH No. 1117—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J." manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months: its total variation from mean time being only an average of two-thirds of a second per day.
E. P. FIELDS, Con. N. J. Central R. R.

WATCH No. 1037—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me since June, 1867: its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month. HENRY SMITH,
Treas. Panama R. R., 88 Wall St.

WATCH No. 12012—bearing Trade-Mark, "United States Watch Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me five months: its total variation from mean time being only twelve seconds. GEO. LOVIS, Gen'l Eastern Pass'gr Ag't Toledo, Wabash, & Western R. R.

WATCH No. 1209—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J." manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me six months: its total variation from mean time being only eight seconds per month. Have been traveling through different sections of the country, from New York to Galveston, Texas, and back, by steamer and railroad.
E. RICE, of Whitney & Rice, 19 Broadway, N. Y.

SUMMIT, PA., Feb. 26, 1869.
WATCH No. 1176—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me three months: its total variation from mean time being only five seconds during that time.
HENRY DE LANCEY, Engineer Phila. & Erie R. R.

WATCH No. 1165—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J." manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me eleven months: its total variation from mean time being only seven seconds in the entire time.
A. H. E. BOYD, Cl. Park Place, N.Y.,
Vice-Pres't Electric Cone Spring Co.,
N. J. Car Spring and R. Co.

WATCHES
manufactured by the
UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,
OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent C. O. D. to any part of the country by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.
☞ Call or send for Price-List.

A Reliable Watch.
"THE UNITED STATES WATCH CO. make the best Time-keepers."
Send to C. A. STEVENS & CO., 40 East 14th Street, New York, for Price-List.

"Full of practical and useful matter."
The MAINE FARMER gives this unqualified endorsement to the
NEW ENGLAND FARMER,
and we make it good by the most numerous commendations from practical farmers in all parts of the country.
TERMS: Weekly, $2.00; Monthly, $1.50, per year.
Send stamp for specimen and premium list.
R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

$290 for first-class new 7-Octave Pianos. Sent on trial. U. S. PIANO CO., New York.

EXAMINE FOR YOURSELVES,
SEE IF IT IS NOT THE BEST PAPER RECEIVED.
THE BEST.
NEW YORK OBSERVER.
$3 50 PER ANNUM.
SAMPLE COPIES FREE.
SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

BOYS! The "JERSEY BLUE" contains Stories, Puzzles, Games, Wit, &c. 8 pages. 75 cts. a year. 3 months, 50 cts. E. S. STEVENS, Jersey City, N. J.

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES
AT
UNION ADAMS & CO.

FOR LADIES.
Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Merino Hosiery,
Kid and Caster Gloves.

FOR MISSES.
Patent Merino Vests,
Patent Merino Drawers,
Patent Union Dresses,
Fleecy Cotton Hosiery,
Fancy Cashmere Hosiery,
Roman and Fancy Sashes.

No. 637 BROADWAY.

Eight per Cent. Gold.

The undersigned, as representatives of the ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY, have the honor to offer for sale the

$1,500,000
FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS
(PAYABLE IN GOLD)
OF THE
ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY
RAILROAD CO.,

Bearing Eight per Cent. Interest in Gold, Free of Government Tax, secured by a first and only mortgage on the railway, which runs from St. Joseph to Fort Kearney.

Total length of road, 971 miles.

Distance mortgaged, 111 miles; and at the rate of one $13,500 per mile on a completed road, coating to build and equip more than double the amount mortgaged.

Trustee for Bondholders: FARMERS' LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

This line of railroad is the extension of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, with its connections North and East, and the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad, with its connections South and East, both lines concerging at St. Joseph, and connecting at once with the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad, running West, through Eastern Kansas, into the heart of Nebraska, and connecting with the Union Pacific Railroad at the City of Fort Kearney, making the shortest route known to California and the Pacific States.

These bonds have thirty years to run from August 14, 1869. Payable at maturity, in Gold, in the City of New York.

The interest is payable in Gold on the 15th of February and August in each year, at the rate of 8 per cent., free of Government Tax, in New York, London, and Frankfort-on-the-Main, at the holder's option, without notice, and at the following equivalents:

ON $1000 BOND.

In New York.....$40 gold.
In London.....£8 4s. 4d.
In Frankfort-on-the-Main.....Thaler 14 Gr.

On $500 Bond, one half these amounts respectively.

The Bonds are in denominations of $1000 and $500. They are Coupon Bonds, but may be registered in the owner's name at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, and by the surrender of the Coupons, can be converted into a Registered Bond, with interest payable to the registered owner.

Company's Capital Stock, $10,000,000,

to which nearly $5,000,000 is subscribed and paid up by local subscriptions, which amount has and is being expended on the road.

The Company have $1,500,000 acres of superior land immediately adjoining the line. This was a grant direct from the United States Government to aid the Company in their work, and, at the Government price of $2 50 per acre, has a value of $4,000,000, while the loan is only $1,500,000, and is the only debt against the Company.

The issue of $1,500,000 of these Bonds is all that can be issued by the Company.

Bonds sent and packages received free of express charge, and marketable securities converted without commission, to parties investing in these Bonds. We offer these Bonds at the low price of 95 and accrued interest in currency, with the reserved right to advance the price without notice.

Pamphlets, maps, and information furnished on application.

Parties desiring safe and lucrative investments should lose no time in investigating these securities.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO.,
Commercial Agents,
54 Pine Street, New York.

TANNER & CO.,
Fiscal Agents,
49 Wall Street, New York.

Having had all the papers and documents relating to the loan examined by competent counsel and pronounced complete and sufficient, and having personally examined the same, which we find regular and perfect, and having had our own engineers examine the road and property, whose reports are satisfactory, we do, with the utmost confidence and satisfaction, recommend the EIGHT PER CENT. FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD BONDS OF THE ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY as A SAFE, SURE, AND PROFITABLE INVESTMENT, worthy the attention of capitalists, investors, and others.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO.
TANNER & CO.

S. W. GEERY,
IMPORTER,
Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 110 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.
The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for more than
My stock comprises some of the Oldest Liquors in the country.
Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Unlabeled sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.
Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

Preparatory Medication.

The human system, the most delicate and sensitive of all created things, should be duly prepared to meet the shock occasioned by a sudden change in the temperature of the air. Even the solid metals contract and expand under cold and heat—so that if man were composed of iron, instead of frail tissues and fibres, circulating fields, and brittle caseous matter, his frame would not be proof against the vicissitudes of climate. As it is, it behooves every one, especially the feeble, to fortify the frail tenement of mortality against the inclemency of the present season. A wholesome, strength-supplying vegetable tonic and alterative is the preparatory medicine required, and among medicinal agents of this character stand supreme. In a successful career of nearly a quarter of a century, the preparation has never been equaled or approached, and its sales are now larger than those of any half dozen articles, purporting to belong to the same class, that have ever been advertised in this country. As a remedy and preventive of DYSPEPSIA, and all its complications, it may be said to have listed down competition, and to be the standard specific of the Western Hemisphere. A course of this genial restorative at the commencement of Winter is the surest safeguard against all the complaints which are ceased or aggravated by exposure to cold.

HOSTETTER'S
STOMACH BITTERS

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!
WITH A
Novelty Job Printing-Press.
The only Low-Priced Press ever invented that will do good printing. Printing can be done as well and as rapidly on this press as on the best that printers use; and for printing-offices where artis-cial power is not used, or for business men, authenticated circulars, with testimonials from all parts of the country, and specimens of plain and color printing done on the press, and specimen sheets of types, borders, rules, etc., to DELOS C. WOODS, Projector, 361 Federal Street, Boston, Mass.

MUSICAL HOLIDAY GIFTS. BOOSEY'S Standard Piano-forte and Vocal Works, elegantly bound, suitable for presentation. Beethoven's Sonatas, complete, $3; Mozart's Sonatas, complete, $3. The Operatic Album, containing 100 gems from the principal Operas, $3. Bishop's Home Music Book, $3. Christmas Melodies, $3. The Messiah, $3; Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words, complete, $3; Chopin's Mazurkas and Valses, complete, $3 each; Schumann's Album for the Young, $3; The Balfour Music Book, $3 (116 Pieces); $2; The 50 Songs of Ireland (50 Songs), $2; The Gems of Scotland (50 Songs), $2; Boosey's Ballad Book (36 Songs), $2; Verdi Album (25 of Verdi's best Songs), $2; English Ballad-Book (20 Songs), $2; Standard Song-Book (50 best Songs ever written), $2. Englishe Song-Book (40 new Songs), $2. Complete Operas, Oratorios, and large collections of Vocal and Piano-Forte Music, in Books, 60 cts. each. Catalogue ready, free to any address. BOOSEY & Co.'s CATALOGUE OF MUSIC in any desired branch, in Full-sheet or Octavo size form. BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N. Y.

CATARRH.

RELIEF AT ONCE!—A PERFECT CURE!
NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH
AND MODE OF TREATMENT

Is an Improvement on all preparations ever before obtained. It consists of the aforesaid inhalation of harmless vapors, and the painless, continuous application, soothing, and powerful curatives. Relief and comfort follow from the first day of its use, and a permanent cure in due course of time. It penetrates through the labyrinths of the very seat of the disease, and clears it up at its fountain head—removes all the wretched symptoms, and all the foul secretions in the throat, and the obstruction of the air passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat, "cool in the head," sneezing, dizziness, loss of sense of smell, dimness of vision, and loss of power of taste and smell. It literally extinguishes this loathsome malady, root and all, so that it never grows, and most hopeless case known. Send a Stamp for Pamphlet to DR. NORTON, office 11 Astor Place, N. Y.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.
Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.
MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.
Price of Presses, $8, $13, $16. Office, $15, $20, $30. Send for a circular to LOWE FRERES,
18 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

FURNITURE COVERINGS
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.
Many styles sold at any other establishment.
Also, CURTAINS of ALL KINDS.
G. L. & J. B. KELLY & CO.,
447 BROADWAY, N. Y.

LAME HORSES.—Contracted feet permanently cured. Spring Sprains, Tarsus, and all diseases arising from contraction. Every horse-owner should know this secret. $25,000 paid by the War Dep't. Used with great success for more than five years. Recommended and practiced by the most eminent horsemen in the country. Enclose $1 to R. B. YOUATT, Drawer 986, Buffalo, N. Y.

PERFUMERY,
FLAVORING EXTRACTS, and TOILET SOAPS.
C. B. WOODWORTH & SON, Rochester, N.Y.
N. Y. Office: 335 Broadway, Room 18.

THE CELEBRATED
IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES,
"COLLINS METAL,"
Improved Oroide.

$15. $10. $25. $20.

These justly celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established, as to require no recommendation. Prices—Horizontal Watches, $15, equal in appearance and for time to Gold Watches worth $100; Full-Jeweled Levers, $18, equal to $150 Gold ones; Full-Jeweled Levers, extra thick, superior finish, $20, equal to $200 Gold ones.

We have just completed making a very fine American Watch, full jeweled, Patent Lever, chronometer balance, adjusted to heat, cold, and position, 4½ ounces down weight, equal in appearance and for time to a Gold Watch costing $300.

We charge only $25 for these magnificent Watches. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $5 to $8. Also, all kinds of jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

Goods sent by Express to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & Co., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

CALIFORNIA DIAMONDS

We are now making Jewelry of the California Diamonds. These are real stones of great brilliancy and hardness, and can not be distinguished from the genuine stones, even by good judges. They are particularly brilliant at night by artificial light, do not scratch or become dull by use, and retain their brilliancy for an indefinite time. The following are the prices:

Ladies' and Gents' Finger Rings, single stones, one carat wt	$8 each.
Gents' Fine, single stone, according to the size of the stone	$4 to $8.
Ladies' Cluster Pins	$7 to $8.
Ladies' Cluster Earrings	$7 to $8.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free.
Goods sent by Express to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

ALEXANDRE'S
SEAMLESS KID GLOVES.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
HAVE JUST RECEIVED
A HANDSOME ASSORTMENT OF THE ABOVE.
Equal, if not superior to ANY THAT HAVE BEEN OFFERED.

PRICES THE SAME AS ALEXANDRE'S REGULAR MAKE,
WHICH ARE GREATLY BELOW THOSE SOLD ELSEWHERE.
BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., and 10TH ST.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 50 BEEKMAN ST., N.Y.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S
Establishment for the sale of
HOUSE FURNISHING
Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at 1172 Broadway, cor. 26th Street.
Also, Rodgers' Cutlery, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Work of their own manufacture. Old household articles required. Inspection and visit solicited.

WORKS FOR THE BLIND.
Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, are now ready, free to any address, BOOSEY & Co.'s CATALOGUE OF WORKS for the Blind, printed in Raised Letters of large size form. BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N. Y.

TWO NICE NEW GAMES:
"Words Within Words" and "Blowing Cotton."
Pleasing and entertaining for Old and Young. They are sure to be favorites in every family circle. The two games, in a box, will be sent to any post-paid on receipt of price, by the publishers,
G. M. WHIPPLE & A. S. SMITH, Salem, Mass.

1870—THE NURSERY, the best, cheapest, and most richly ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN. $1 00 a year, in advance. Sample number, 10 cents. Subscribe now, and get the last two numbers of this year FREE. Address JOHN L. SHOREY, 19 Washington St., Boston.

CURL YOUR HAIR!
A BOTTLE OF MAGNETIC CURLING LIQUID sent FREE. It curls straight hair in beautiful curls on THE FIRST APPLICATION. Address, with Stamp, PROF. BYRON, GARRETTSVILLE, OHIO.

A WELL-PAYING BUSINESS is offered to a good, active worker, by the above term Incorporated Co., insuring their very POPULAR BOOKS. All wanting BUSINESS or for the WINTER should write at once for our extra liberal terms to E. G. STORRS, Auburn, N. Y.

FOGGAN'S GENUINE OROIDE GOLD HUNTING-CASE WATCHES

(Trade-Mark of our Watches and Diamond Jewelry.)

Are manufactured on scientific principles: none but experts can detect them. They have all the brilliancy, durability, and exact appearance of the most costly description of Gold Watches.

Railroad Conductors, Engineers, Expressmen, the most exacting of any class of men, have thoroughly demonstrated the Strength, Durability, Accuracy, and Utility of the Fac-Simile Waltham Watches, and pronounce them unrivaled as reliable time-keepers. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Stem-Winders, $10 each; Gentlemen's Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, Fac-Simile Waltham, $20; Chronometer Balance, $18; Extra-fine finish Chronometer Balance, $30 and $35. Magnificent Heavy Hotel-Clock, Patent Levers, Stem-Wind, $25, $30, and $40 each. Each Watch guaranteed by a special certificate. The Latest Styles of Chains for Ladies and Gentlemen, $8 to $40. Sent by express, to be paid for on delivery; customers paying express charges. Over 10,000 Watches at once will receive one extra as a present. Beware of Imitators, as we can not be responsible unless orders are sent direct to JOHN FOGGAN, Fred'k Oroide Gold Watch Co., 79 Nassau St., N.Y.

FRENCH CLOCKS,
BRONZES,
FANCY GOODS,
MUSICAL BOXES, FANS
Opera Glasses,
FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,
PARIS AND VIENNA NOVELTIES,
AND
WEDDING PRESENTS.
Alex. M. Hays & Co.
No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York.

The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the city, and are offered at Low Prices.

☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50 cts. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The Peoples' Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

Carbolic Salve.

Prepared with Carbolic Acid, which is used in Hospitals, by direction of Physicians, for healing wounds in every where. Possesses the most remarkable healing properties ever discovered. 25 cts., per Box. John F. Henry, Proprietor, 8 College Place, N. Y.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR
PRIEST and NUN.
Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 1306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

TOYS FOR THE HOLIDAYS, at the Children's Free Riding School and Toy Bazaar, 478 Broadway, between Grand and Broome Streets. LEWIS F. TIBBALS.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 48 cartes-de-visite pictures, handsomely printed, for 75 cts.; 9 for $1; $2 25 per dozen. Circulars free. ADDRESS, NEWCOMB, Holyoke, Mass.

MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS, wonderful and amusing, 25 cents a package. LIBRARY OF LOVE, 50 cents. ART STUDIES, 50 cents. Astor Place, N.Y.

PRANTOM MOTTOES.—A package sent on receipt of 25 cents. Catalogue of holiday articles free on application. A. WARNER, 13 Astor Place, New York.

1870 CHEAP READING!—Atlantic, Harper, Galaxy, Ballou, or other $4 publication, and Hall's Journal of Health (or other $2 publication), New York, both sent for $4 50. Address, HALL'S JOURNAL, N.Y.

VINEGAR—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without the use of drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

Collegiate and Commercial Institute (General Roarty's School), New York, where the next term begins October 4.

Stammering cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet address Simpson & Co., Box 5076, N.Y.

"A BLAZE OF BEAUTY."—1870.

THE JANUARY NUMBER of the PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL appears in bright array. A new form, new types, numerous rich illustrations, with sound and sensible reading-matter, render this the best ever issued. Among the contents are the following:

Ferdinand De Lesseps, the chief promoter of the Suez Canal, with a portrait and sketch of his life. Hon. Samuel S. Fisher, United States Commissioner of Patents, with portrait. Bill Sweeney and his career, and a glimpse of the workings of the Patent Office. Gen. Manuel Casquette, the President of the Cuban Republic. George Peabody, the successful merchant, banker, and philanthropist. Mr. Uschenoff, the eminent Biblical discoverer and critic—his life, traveling, and writings, with portrait.

The Relic Race—Physically and Mentally considered, with engravings from life, of young and old savages. Northwestern Australians—Appearance, customs and peculiarities, dress, dynamics, food, weapons, &c.

The Progress of Science—Steam, electricity, invention, scientific discovery, anatomy, physiology, medicine, phrenology.

Brain Waves—Progression of thought; how thought and sentiment are transmitted. What can I Do Best? —Or, the requirements of the teacher. Who believes Phrenology?—Are there among the readers persons of eminence and influence? Faces we Meet—What they tell us and how they affect us. An Afternoon at ——'s—A glimpse at the specimens in our cabinet. Small Confidences—"Just for Once." Marriage with death.

Confessions of a Smoker; what he suffered in consequence of the habit; how he reformed, and the happy results. The Many Wake-Up's—metaphysic and physiology. Application—The necessity for its culture.

Our Country's Agricultural Resources—A survey of our productions during the past fifty years, with tables.

Facts in Natural History—Will a horse-hair become a snake? The Hedge-hog—What it is, how it lives, and where it is found. Illustrated. The Sponge—Its origin, growth, and uses. Educational Matters—Cornell, Harvard, Yale, Michigan. Cathedral or Shrine —The consolidation-place of Old Spanish Kings: Joan of Arc.

This favorite JOURNAL has now reached its 50th Vol., and appears in the usual magazine form. We think it will prove even more popular than ever before. Terms, only $3 a year. 30 cents a No. Newsmen have it. Now is the time to subscribe. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE DOLLAR SUN.
CHAS. A. DANA, Editor.
The cheapest, smartest, and best New York newspaper. Everybody likes it. Three editions DAILY, the DAILY SUN, WEEKLY, $2; and WEEKLY, $1 a year. ALL THE NEWS of the day. Special reports of markets, agricultural matters, and literature. The best Serial Stories. The Weekly and Semi-Weekly number. A premium of valuable plate and fine jewelry worth twice the subscription price, to those who get up Clubs. Specimens, $1.00 List Insurance, Ground Plans, Surveys, Drawings, Reports, Prospectuses, &c., &c., &c., executed by the undersigned. Specimens and fees free. Send a circular to H. ENGLAND, Publisher Sun, New York.

HOCKEY KNITTING MACHINE
For Family use—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking FREE. HOCKEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Batn, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

HORRIBLE!—I suffered with CATARRH 14 Years—could not get rid of it. Now I am a reliable remedy, and will send the receipt, postage free, to all afflicted. Address Rev. T. P. CHAMBERS,
Drawer 176, Syracuse, New York.

Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, and General Debility cured by using the
SHELDON SPRING WATER.
Book of testimonials, certificates, and pamphlet free. Address J. W. BEALS, Treasurer, Boston, Mass.

HOWES Never-Failing Aqua Cure and Tonic Bitters. A Sheet Containing Full Particulars of Diseases—Incipient Consumption, Catarrh, Cancer, &c., every sent free. DR. J. HOWES, 24 Avon Street, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS wanted every where. Brown's Patent Double Thread Lock-Stitch Sewing Machine, price $18, with the latest feed. No Expensive Charges. Send for Circulars. O. H. BRIGGS & CO., 134 Washington St., N.Y.

CALIBAN.—Wanted, a few reliable and energetic salesmen, to sell by sample standard goods. Address H. B. RICHARDS & CO.,
413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

$75 to $200 per Month to Agents, salary or commission. Apply to, or send for, our Family Wire Clothes Lines. Address Hudson River Wire Works, 75 William St., P. O. Box 5066, New York. Mention Harper's Weekly.

AGENTS can make $200 per month by selling our Silver-Plating Fluid. $3 per dozen.
RICHMOND & HOOTER, Seneca Falls, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1870.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States for the Magazine is 24 cents a year, payable quarterly in advance at the office where the Number is received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for each of the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions can commence with any Number. When subscriptions are not specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the first Number issued after January 1st. It will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number issued next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

☞ Subscribers single to either of Harper's Periodicals furnished from the present time to the close of the year for 25 cents.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

C. G. Gunther's Sons,

502—504 BROADWAY,

Offer a very Elegant Assortment of Novelties in

SEAL AND ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, TURBANS, Boas, Ties, &c.

Two Months

FREE! FREE!!

The Most Popular Juvenile Magazine in America.

THE

LITTLE CORPORAL,

Entirely Original and First Class.

All new subscribers for THE LITTLE CORPORAL for the new year, whose names and money are sent in before the last of December, will receive the November and December Nos. of 1869 FREE!

THE LITTLE CORPORAL has a Larger Circulation than any other Juvenile Magazine in the world, and is better worth the price than any other magazine published.

Because of its immense circulation, we are enabled to furnish it at the low price of ONE DOLLAR A YEAR. Single number, 12 cents, or free to any one who will try to raise a club. Beautiful premiums for clubs.

Subscribe NOW. Back numbers can always be sent.

ALFRED L. SEWELL & CO., PUBLISHERS, CHICAGO, ILL.

The Advance.

Of which Rev. Henry Ward Beecher says: "I regard it as standing fairly on the highest ground yet reached by religious newspapers in America;" and which Dr. Hatfield Bushnell pronounces "One of the ablest, best, and most outspoken Religious journals published," is enlisted with

Harper's Weekly,

Harper's Monthly, or Harper's Bazar, at $5 00 per year, making the ADVANCE, whose regular subscription price is $2 50, cost only One Dollar to those who are about to renew their subscription to either of the Harper periodicals. This is an excellent and inexpensive opportunity to make the acquaintance of this bold and aggressive, yet genial and judicious religious family journal, published at the metropolis of the Interior. For both periodicals, at club rates, or for sample copies of the Advance, address

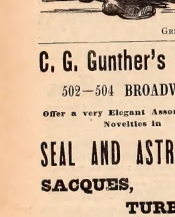
THE ADVANCE COMPANY,
25 Lombard Block, Chicago.

THE PARLOR AIR TARGET PISTOL.
Hawley's Patent, June 1, 1869.

No dirt, dust, nor danger; uses compressed air. No cost for ammunition: from one charging it shoots from five to ten shots, from 20 to 50 feet, accurate as any pistol. A great favorite with Ladies and Gentlemen for practice and amusement. Price $5 50. Sent C. O. D.
AGENTS WANTED. P. C. GODFREY,
119 Nassau St., Room 56, New York.

Send for terms of 'Linden Hall,' Lititz, Lancaster Co., Pa.



CAUGHT

buying a CHRISTMAS PRESENT for your friends and children until you have seen the

Lozo Pendulum Board,

which is the best PARLOR GAME BOARD ever invented, being only 9½ feet long and 12 inches wide.

It is lined with the finest billiard cloth, and contains a combination of four popular and fascinating games, viz.:

BAGATELLE, TEN PINS, and
POCKETS, RING TOSS.

We invite every body to call at our salesroom and examine it. If you can't come yourself, write to some friend in New York asking them to call.

Send for a descriptive catalogue and price-list.

It can be sent to any part of the United States before the Holidays.

NOVELTY GAME CO.,
14 MURRAY ST., New York.

THE BEST! THE BEST!

☞ THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, ☜

A weekly illustrated journal of 16 pages, devoted to Machinery, Agricultural Improvements, Chemical Science, and NEW DISCOVERIES.

$1500 Cash in Prizes will be paid for clubs of subscribers, on the 15th of February.

A handsome large steel-plate ENGRAVING of 19 distinguished American Inventors presented to subscribers.

Specimens of paper, prospectuses, and blanks for names, sent free. Terms, $3 a year: $1 50 for six months. Discount to Clubs. A book of inestimable value to all about to apply for patents sent free. Write for full particulars concerning prizes and patents, to

MUNN & CO., Publishers and Patent Solicitors,
37 PARK ROW, New York.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

CLEANS WINDOWS, MARBLE, KNIVES,
POLISHES TIN WIRE, IRON, STEEL, &c.

Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

AT LOW PRICES.
A Large Assortment of

ROBES DE CHAMBRE
and HOUSE COATS,
For HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

E. A. NEWELL,
727 Broadway, Cor. Waverly Place.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each.
MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 115 pages.
OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 91 pages.
MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 100 pp.
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York,

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.: H. N. HEMSTEAD, Milwaukee, Wis.: LOUIS TRUE, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.: KINCAID BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. MUSICK, Cincinnati, Ohio: J. E. JACKSON, Shelbyville, Ohio; BRAINARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; H. D. MUNSON, Zanesville, Ohio: J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; C. BUSH, Pittsburgh, Pa.; L. B. POWELL, Scranton, Pa.; CLEVE & SON, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HASKINS, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; H. S. MAGEE, Rochester, N. Y.; H. USEY, Buffalo, N. Y.; RENDERTON & HOWE, Syracuse, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, MASS.; COREY BROS., Providence, R. I.; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, CONN.; MATTHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C. W.; E. PELLER & BRO., St. John, N. B.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,
Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,
OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS, and other
FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of

CORAL JEWELRY.

HEARTH AND HOME,

AN ILLUSTRATED

Rural, Literary, and Family Weekly,

OF 16 LARGE, HANDSOME PAGES,

EDITED BY DONALD G. MITCHELL,

Assisted by an able Corps of Associates in all Departments.

HEARTH AND HOME meets the wants of all members of good families every where, and contains the best of every thing for every body in city, village, and country. It gives practical instruction, by the most experienced writers, upon all rural topics: Farming, Fruit-Growing, Flower-Culture, Ornamental Gardening, Rural Architecture, Country and City Homes—their Furnishing and Adornment, Domestic Economy, Housekeeping Hints, &c., &c.

It has Choice Stories, Sketches, Essays, Poems, Wit and Humor, The News, Money and Market Reports, Beautiful Pictures, by the best artists, and, in short, all the features of

A FIRST-CLASS FAMILY WEEKLY.

It contains so much room that every number has an abundant variety for Fathers, Mothers, Sons, Daughters, down to the youngest child!

REDUCED RATES FOR 1870.

INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

Single Copies, $4 00; Three Copies, all at one time, $9 00; Five Copies, $12 00:

making HEARTH AND HOME, to a Club of Five or more subscribers at $2 40 each, the Cheapest, as it is the Most Complete

FAMILY WEEKLY NEWSPAPER

In the world. Subscribers before the first of January will receive the remaining numbers of that date Free, and their year will end January 1, 1871. Specimen numbers sent free.

PETTENGILL, BATES, & CO.,
37 Park Row, New York.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the sleeping-room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. Thousands who are using it testify to its merits. Send for Pamphlet.
E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N. Y.

C. A. STEVENS & CO.,
JEWELERS,
No. 40 East 14th Street, N. Y., are Agents for the UNITED STATES WATCH CO.'S CELEBRATED WATCHES.

"Equal to any in the world."

☞ Call or send for Price-List.

Holiday Presents.—A suitable Present for a Gentleman is a Fine Meerschaum Pipe or Cigar-holder, or Carved, of the best material; a large variety at manufacturers' prices, at Kalkenhorst's, 6 John St., next Nassau, 2 doors from Nassau, or John. Formerly 23 Wall. Send for Circular & Price-List. P. O. Box 6794.

Ahearn's Patents.

Purchasers wanted for every State and County not yet sold. $1000 and expenses can be made monthly on every $200 invested. For particulars, address

J. AHEARN, 9 P. O. Avenue, Baltimore, Md.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE and Claverack College. Term opens December 27th.
Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., President,
Claverack, N. Y.

EDWARD SEARS'
ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,
45 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

NEW GOODS NOW OPENING
FROM
PARIS, LONDON, AND BOHEMIA.

Gilt-Mounted Vases and Jardinieres
GILT AND BRONZE CLOCKS, FIGURES, &c.
JEWEL-CASES, BONBONNIERES, TABLES, &c.
RICH DECORATED
CHINA DINNER AND DESSERT SETS,
VERY CHEAP.

SILVER-PLATED WARE, EXTRA QUALITY.

CHANDELIERS AND GAS-FIXTURES
from OSLER, London, and of our own manufacture.

AGENTS FOR ROGERS' GROUPS.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,
488, 490, and 492 BROADWAY, corner Broome St.

WEBB'S ADDER.

ONLY PRACTICAL ADDING MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

This little machine, no less wonderful in its simplicity than in its efficacy, has won a more speedy success than any other invention of the day. While the sewing machine had to struggle through long years for adoption, Webb's Adding Machine was accepted at once. Where answers are called off, it gives instantaneous additions. It carries up the columns of a ledger account, two at a time, with mechanical accuracy. The President of the First National Bank of New York writes in his testimonial, "IT RELIEVES THE MIND ENTIRELY, AND REDUCES ARITHMETIC TO A SIMPLE MOTION OF THE HAND!" The machine took the first medals and diplomas at the last American Institute Fair, New York, and also at the last Mass. State Fair, in Boston. It is guaranteed to do every thing claimed for it, and the report comes from nearly all who use it that not enough is claimed—that it does more than it pretends to. Price by mail on receipt of price and postage (81 cents), or by express, C. O. D., at the customer's expense. To remit (post-office order, registered letter, or draft) saves the return money, heritage. For circular, testimonials, &c., enclose stamp. State and County Rights (exclusive) for sale.—WEBB ADDING MACHINE CO.
E. P. DUTTON & CO., Selling Agents,
713 Broadway, New York.

Hatter and Furrier.
DANIEL D. YOUMANS,
717 BROADWAY,
offers at low prices:

LAD S FINE FURS in every variety: SEAL and ASTRAKHAN SACQUES AND TURBANS:
WHITE FOX MUFFS AND BOAS:
CHILDREN'S FURS, GENTS' FURS, &c.
Importer of ENGLISH HATS for Gentlemen's Wear.

Simpson, Hall, Miller, & Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
IMPROVED ELECTRO PLATE,
WITH
PURE SILVER.

The experience of FORTY YEARS on the part of our Mr. Simpson, and the use of the most improved labor-saving machinery, enable us to offer to the trade a line of goods of

ORIGINAL AND ELEGANT DESIGNS,
which, for BEAUTY, FINISH, and DURABILITY,
Can not be Excelled.

All goods stamped with our full name.

"Improved Electro Treble Plate,"
ARE OF THE BEST QUALITY PRODUCED;
and, if found defective or not as represented, can be returned, and the money will be refunded.

OFFICE AND FACTORY, WALLINGFORD, CONN.
SAMPLE AND SALES ROOM, 19 JOHN ST., N. Y.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE
Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $30 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES: Price reduced from both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $60. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable for prosecution and punishment by Fine.
Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
Baltimore, Md.
☞ Send for Price List.]

A Holiday Present—Polish & Son manufacture warranted Genuine Meerschaum Pipes. Stores: 819 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel, & 23 John St., middle of Nassau. Send for circular to Letter-Box 3846. Also, Repairing and Boiling done.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 678.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

HOME FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1869.

THE UNITED STATES AND ENGLAND.

THE President, in his singularly satisfactory Message, which renews the confidence of the country in his simple good sense and sagacity, makes two allusions to the Alabama question. One is incidental, in speaking of enforcing the neutrality laws, which, he says, has been done in good faith, although it was very unpleasant, in consequence of "the suffering we have endured for lack of like good faith toward us by other nations." The other allusion is the firm statement of the American view of the Alabama difficulty. The President says, in general, that the nature of the injury to our commerce, industry, and prosperity separates the Alabama claims from ordinary commercial demands. Yet, great as is the difference, nothing was said in the treaty, and not an inference could be drawn from it to prove the sense of the unfriendliness of Great Britain in our struggle for existence. He approves, therefore, the rejection of the treaty.

In a late brief pamphlet upon Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON and the Alabama negotiations, Mr. GEORGE BEMIS, a master of the controversy, and an acknowledged student of international law, reviews the conduct of Mr. JOHNSON and the instructions of Mr. SEWARD in a most conclusive manner against both of those gentlemen. He shows that Mr. SEWARD changed his ground upon the subject after Mr. ADAMS left London, and that Mr. JOHNSON wholly misconceived his instructions, and violated himself by his assertions and admissions. The pamphlet of Mr. BEMIS is a very timely and useful contribution to the debate. The original ground of the United States is, that there was a wrong to the Government as well as injury to individuals. Mr. SEWARD wrote to Mr. ADAMS, on 5 January, 1868, that he had been very unfortunate if he had not made it clearly understood that a violation of neutrality by the Queen's proclamation and kindred proceedings of the British Government "were a national wrong to the United States; and that the lowest form of satisfaction" would be an indemnity without reference to the individual sufferers, "in consequence of a failure of the British Government to preserve its neutrality."

Six months later, in July, 1868, Mr. SEWARD's instructions to Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON are pitched in a much lower key. He tells him first of all to open the Naturalization and St. Juan questions, "if they can be satisfactorily settled, he is to "advert" to the Alabama claims; for it seems to the President that an adjustment can be made "without formally reviving former discussions." Mr. SEWARD then states that a joint commission might be agreed upon to settle mutual claims of the citizens of the United States and British subjects. No word of wrong to the Government: no implication of any thing but ordinary claims. Mr. SEWARD left Mr. JOHNSON that he is not authorized to commit the Government by any proposition, but that he may "sound Lord STANLEY upon the subject when he is satisfied that "the two more urgent controversies" are in process of adjustment. Upon these instructions Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON proceeded to make the treaty of November 19, 1868, which was such a surrender of the American demands that even ANDREW JOHNSON's Cabinet unanimously disapproved it. On the 14th of January, 1865, he sent the treaty which the Senate rejected, and which Mr. JOHNSON said obtained "all that we have ever asked." Yet, notwithstanding that clear statement of mutual individual claims, Mr. JOHNSON, after the inauguration of President GRANT, and when he knew that he was to be recalled, made an offer to Lord CLARENDON of "only so much" of the treaty as would include the claims of the Government! Lord CLARENDON asked his authority, and declined to do any thing until he knew what the new Administration wished. Why did Mr. JOHNSON propose this most important supplement, if the treaty already covered "all that we have ever asked"? The answer to that question convicts him of incapacity as a Minister.

President GRANT now substantially affirms the original Administration position, but as we have often previously said, involves a question of honor as well as of money. The "moral damages," for financially computing which Mr. SUMNER has insisted with officiality, are still claimed. But we must all distinctly understand that moral damages can not be settled by money, which evidently understands this, and she therefore asks by the mouth of every intelligent Englishman, "What is it that you wish?" There is not such an Englishman who does not say, "We wish to be friends, and we will do any thing short of confessing bad faith." If we in the United States mean, therefore, to demand that England shall own that her conduct was dishonorable, we have only to look into our own hearts to read the answer. There is not an American who does not know that, sooner than allow that the United States had acted dishonorably, the longest and fiercest war would be welcomed. The honor of England is not less dear to Englishmen than our own honor to us; and we assume, therefore, that unless we are resolved upon war with England in any case, we shall not ask her to admit that her conduct was rascally.

From the moment of such an understanding the settlement does not seem very impracticable. The exact international legal point, so to speak, must be waived, and become the subject of future conference. It may be waived, upon our part, under the broad declaration of President GRANT in his Message, that "this nation is its own judge when to accord the rights of belligerency either to people struggling to free themselves from a government they believe to be oppressive, or to independent nations at war with each other." The British Government should then express the sincerest regret for the conduct of the Alabama, and its consequences; decline to enter upon the question of international law, but invite a future understanding upon the points involved; and propose to pay individual claims upon an authorized statement of the United States Government. Such a settlement involves no concession which is not the highest policy of both nations to make in the interests of liberty and civilization. The offer of such a settlement proposes to leave the Government of which Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT are the members most known in this country, would be an act of statesmanship not only more honorable, but leading to more cordial friendly understanding than has ever existed between the two countries since the separation.

The subject has been ably discussed by Mr. SEWARD's change of position, and by Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON's absurd determination to have every thing pleasant by calling it so. He was unanimously confirmed by the Senate. It came from the Senate itself, the treaty-ratifying body. He was approved after other gentlemen had been rejected. The whole question between England and the United States was the Alabama controversy. It was a very natural conclusion upon the part of Englishmen that Mr. JOHNSON represented the views of his country; and when every proposition he made was accepted, and the President and Secretary of State approved the treaty, that at least, not extraordinary that the treaty was regarded as our treaty, and that its summary rejection was an astounding surprise to England. Still, the British Government knew that the Senate was the ratifying power; that Mr. JOHNSON was not in political sympathy with it, however his confirmation might have seemed to disprove that fact; that as the time for the next convention of November 10 had been unanimously rejected by a cabinet politically friendly to him, it was certainly not unnatural that the latter treaty would be rejected by a senate politically hostile.

It was a deplorable muddle, and it is now chiefly, as we said when the treaty was rejected, to the very foolish practice of the Senate in confirming any Senator who is nominated by the President to office. That practice is to be done over again; and there is no intelligent Englishman or American who will not heartily repeat the wise words of the President: "I hope that the time may soon come when the two governments can approach the solution of this momentous question with an appreciation of what is due to the rights, dignity, and honor of each; and with a determination not only to remove the causes of complaint in the past, but to lay the foundation of a broad principle of public law which will prevent future differences, and tend to firm and continued peace and friendship."

A TRULY "DEMOCRATIC" POLICY.

THE gentlemen who ordain the policy of the Democratic party in this State were ready at the Governor's in Albany to decide what should be done by the next Legislature. Those who have read the message of Mr. HALL, Mayor of Mayor, and who have seen his speeches upon municipal affairs, have observed the vehement denunciation of the system of governing the city from Albany. It has been supposed, therefore, by some unreflecting persons that the Commissions would be instantly abolished. This is indeed the simple logic of the situation. Consistency demands such a course. But it is a very unreflecting reader, indeed, who supposes that the Tammany chiefs are painfully exercised about consistency in the matter. The difficulty has not been the Commissions, but that the chiefs did not control them. The objection is not to long charges, but to the periods which Mr. HOFFMAN rounded in their intervals, was the patronage and what is sometimes called the plunder. If all the power and possible profits of the Commissions had been in the hands of the Tammany chiefs, does any reader, however unreflecting, suppose that Mr. HOFFMAN would have lamented over the city as deprived of self-government?

It is, therefore, by no means certain that there will be any serious change in the present policy. Should there be an entire change, and the police system of the great and good FERNANDO WOOD be restored, there would be a public apprehension in the city so profound that the Democratic vote, in its strongest hold, would be so seriously reduced as to imperil a contested Tammany ascendency. This result the chiefs naturally wish to avoid; and if they can bury their hands in the public purse by obtaining control of the Commissions, yet without disturbing the public confidence in the present system, they will be very likely to prefer that result. This is plainly intimated in the accounts of the Albany council of the chiefs, and in the tone of their papers.

There is, however, one intention of the party which is, as it were, officially announced; and that is the withdrawal of the assent of the State of New York to the Fifteenth Amendment. This will undoubtedly be recommended by the Governor, and it will be done. This, moreover, is a clear illustration of the real character of the Democratic party. After a long and cruel war, springing from a denial of the equal rights of a large part of the population, slavery is abolished and its defenders vanquished. Common sense and common justice suggest that the question shall be finally settled by removing every disability founded upon color merely; but the Democratic chiefs refuse, and insist that if a man is of a certain color, it is conclusive proof that he should not have an equal voice in the government. He may be ignorant, drunken, degraded, idle, vicious, but if his skin can be called white, he is a proper voter. He may be intelligent, industrious, sober, and the best of citizens; but if his skin can be called black, he is not fit to vote. This is Democracy, and this is its great cardinal principle to-day. And because of this, the ignorant and vicious, as a class, naturally belong to the Democratic party.

Of course the papers and orators of the party affect to argue the point upon other grounds. It was what they did during the many debates upon slavery. They used to say then that whatever might be their opinion of the morality and expediency of slavery, it was a State institution, and the State recognizing slaves as property, its citizens might lawfully take their property with them into the territories. Precisely in the same way to-day, the entire Democratic party in the Northern States was the property of the slaveholders, and they did with it as with their slaves, just what they chose. Slavery was confined, entrenched, established, and finally struck at the national heart, because of the support of the Democratic party of the North, approving this kind of institution. Now it is said by the same old party, which is still carried in what remains of the pockets of the slaveholders, that, whatever may be their opinion of the right of the colored population, it is a subject for the States to decide, and not for the National Government. And when Congress proposes to settle the constitutional constitutional manner by an amendment approved by the necessary number of States, they assert virtually that Congress has no right to propose such an amendment, which is simply equal to that the people of the United States have no right to amend the Constitution in the manner that the Democrat itself provides.

We shall, therefore, probably see this party in the State of New York gravely trying to save all that it can of the remains of the most infamous and atrocious cause in history. Although the final result is inevitable; although the conscience and good sense of the world and of this country hasten to equalize the rights of all citizens of the commonwealth; although it is plain that no other policy in this age and in our civilization promises peace and prosperity, yet the same immediate interest, prejudice, and weakness which, as the Democratic party, defended and sustained slavery, now struggles to retain as much as possible of its infamy and injustice.

THE SITUATION.

THE immediate advance in gold in Wall Street, and the fall of bonds in London, on the promulgation of the financial views of the Administration, are likely to indicate disappointment, but the partial recovery which has since taken place somewhat neutralizes this effect. The truth is, that there are speculators in both markets of immense power, whose action is due to their respective interests, and is founded so much more upon temporary than upon general influences that but little can be derived from market reports.

It is certain that there is to be no contraction of the currency at this session of Congress, and prices, therefore, will, as the year 1870 advances, be influenced as they have been by the amount of paper-money in circulation. The circumstances which for the present keep down the price of gold are these: that the Government will throw upon the market for the interest upon the foreign interest due in January nearly thirty-two millions of dollars in gold, deducting what will be paid on the Sinking Fund and other bonds lately purchased by Mr. BOUTWELL; that large shipments on account of cotton, grain, and provisions are still to go forward; that January sales of coin may possibly be large; that the foreign demand, although exchange is constantly absorbed, the price of it on the closing of the second week of December is low; and that there are no indications of a foreign demand for the balances temporarily invested on foreign account in Wall Street, and none for the present that our bonds held abroad will be returned.

If these indications continue, Wall Street may be induced to wait until after the January payments of interest shall be absorbed before undertaking to put up the price of gold to the point at which it has heretofore been maintained as the effect of the continued circulation of seven hundred millions of paper currency. But the reason of enlarged circulation in the South, and somewhat to the unfortunate tendency in California to allow the displacement of its gold circulation by one of paper, the power of the latter here is partially reduced.

JACOB, in his work on the precious metals, dedicated to Mr. HUSKISSON, then British Minister, stated that the long-continued habit of the great commercial nations of Europe to rely upon paper issues had disturbed the industry in the few mines then worked in Mexico and South America; and in 1849 that California may be so debauched with paper as that the same effect may be produced. Money may be made so much more easily with the printing-press than with labor in the mines that its effect is not impossible. But a failure to keep up the supply of bullion would be lamentable; for it renders the return to specie payments more difficult. The advantage of the Pacific Railroad to California will be greatly neutralized if it shall induce laborers to withdraw from the important industry in the gold and silver mines. The feature of an increase in the promises to pay bullion on the part of important nations, and of a simultaneous diminution in its production, would again be repeated in the history of commerce.

Italy and Russia are largely increasing their paper circulation, which prevents the use of specie in countries more wisely regulated. The United States, notwithstanding these events which are favorable for a return toward specie payments, seems inclined to postpone for the present all steps in that important direction. There will consequently be a powerful tendency toward enlarging bullion in the banking countries, such as China, India, and Japan, there to be hoarded. Our true relations to the world will not be fully considered in this decision of the Treasury Department.

MR. BOUTWELL, in his annual report, recommends that the three per cent. certificates, amounting, with compound interest, now convertible into them, to a fraction short of fifty millions of dollars, shall be redeemed, and that, as a compensation for their withdrawal from circulation, the banks shall then deposit thirty-five millions of new bank capital and circulation to be authorized by Congress. The Comptroller of the Treasury, who more nearly agrees with the committee appointed by the national banks, in his annual report, recommends free banking and unrestricted issues. The door to expansion is thus opened to Congress, and the next few months will inform us what will be done in pursuance of these plans. Will the increased limitations of the Secretary be obeyed, or will the New York system of free banking be established?

We long ago stated that neither at the last nor at this session would any party be able to enforce contraction. Next year members of Congress are to be elected, and on both sides success is deemed of too great consequence. The complexion of the next Congress is relied upon to fix the issues for the Presidential campaign; and this great question of finance is consequently postponed.

The surplus of grain which is exported to Great Britain fixes the price in full seasons of the whole production. Our farmers are beginning to find out that, while they get a gold prices, they produce at extravagant currency prices, which will educate them into sound notions of money and industry. We hear in all quarters of a greater willingness to raise specie payments than before the late, and to them hurtful, fall in gold. It is an extraordinary state of things that a man should earn a barrel of flour per day. The grade of flour which is shipped for the consumption of laborers in England sells for only about $7 per barrel. It was unwise on the eve of great activity of our shipments of cotton, flour, and provisions to beat down the price of gold, when there was no intention to follow it up by an equal contraction of the currency.

Cotton and pork are less affected by the fall in gold, because they stand on special grounds. The production of cotton is supposed by English manufacturers to be insufficient for the wants of the world; and being insufficient, the producer of it may control the market. Pork, by reason of the demand for lard and oil, and because of the present difficulty in producing hogs in the West, is also very much affected by the class of the community—is held by Western farmers with unusual firmness; but their wheat can not be sold at remunerative prices.

We lately referred to the cable telegram announcing failures in England. The Messrs. PEEL, one of those who failed, had established a business in lard and forked meat, and his success was on an extensive scale. "This failure," says the Manchester Guardian, "is looked upon as a serious matter, and an impression prevails that the recent heavy fall in the value of grain will cause much embarrassment in the trade. Possibly, however, the difficulties are less serious than are represented, and the actual position of the trade may not be more unsound than it was at this time last year. It will be recollected," the paper adds, "that during the closing months of 1868 a rapid fall, amounting to about 20s. per quarter, from the highest point of the year, took place in wheat." The whole importation of wheat into the ports of Great Britain, from the first of September to the 20th of November, was 11,002,972 cwt. against 6,929,161; and of flour, was 1,615,115 cwt. against 813,659 for the corresponding period last year. The fact is that our chief reliance for their supplies of grain is upon shipments from the United States, including California, the depression is due as much, if not more, to the fall of grain in our ports as to the excess of importation. Unusual supplies will be required in England up to the period of the next harvest. The next query, doubtless, will relate to what influences we are indebted for our present condition.

If the president presume to lower the price of gold to the limits fixed by the Treasury, which is affecting trade in all its departments most injuriously, were accompanied with the permanent relief which will arise from there proceeding toward specie payments, no just complaint could be made of the policy, for it will ultimately bring all to the same platform; but no such measure is suggested—the contrary, prices must mount upward, and the same experiments upon our industry must be repeated hereafter.

The great lesson should be impressed upon our great farming interest by these events, that so long as their prosperity is suspended "upon the wings of the wind," they will be subjected to these vicissitudes of change, and that their safety depends altogether on reaching the solid ground of specie payments.

THE PRESIDENT AND CUBA.

It has been so vehemently asserted that the President favored the recognition of Cuban belligerency or independence, that the sensible, conclusive, and truly American remarks upon the subject in his Message must have greatly surprised somebody. General GRANT says what has been constantly maintained in these columns and in many others, as by all who have fairly studied the subject, that "the contest has at no time assumed the conditions which amount to a war in the sense of international law, or which would show the existence of a de facto political power of the insurgents sufficient to justify a recognition of belligerency." He says, moreover, what we stated at the time was the duty which the United States could honorably do, that the Government has offered its mediation, but, of course, without a threat, and that it is to be hoped that our good offices may yet be of service.

The position of the United States is thus accurately and authoritatively defined. It is its traditional position, and it is because of its faithful adherence to it that the neutral fame of the country is so spotless. The President says what Henry Clay as Secretary of State said nearly fifty years ago, that while we sympathize with all people struggling for liberty and self-government, yet we do not enforce our views nor take part without invitation, and that our course should be always governed by "strict justice and law, international and local." Indeed, the more the Message is considered the more masterly and truly practical it seems; recalling the sense and honesty of Mr. Lincoln's, and nobly contrasting with the special pleas for injustice which the messages of Democratic Presidents had become. Since the lackeys of slavery disappeared from the White House the whole country breathes a fresher air in the Government no longer intervents excuses for infamy. At last the President speaks like the chief magistrate of a truly free and self-respecting people.

THE MARSHAL OF SOUTHERN NEW YORK.

The New York Tribune strenuously urges that the United States Marshal of this district be removed, and General Sickel appointed in his place. It does not allege that the Marshal is an incompetent or dishonest officer, nor that he is not a faithful Republican; but it asserts that General Sickel's "consent to run for Secretary of State" saved the Republican party from "utter rout and demoralization" in the late election. General Sickel's services to the country are part of our history. His nomination for Secretary of State was heartily approved by the Republican party of New York, as the vote showed. He is a gentleman against whom no evil is breathed. But we very greatly mistake General Sickel, and the great body of intelligent Republicans who supported him, if they think that a most efficient and admirable officer of the United States, of the General's own party, should be removed in order to make a place for him. They know that this is the very worst practice of our civil service, and that nothing has done so much to degrade and demoralize our politics as the remark of the Tribune urges.

It is true that Marshal Harlow has not been confirmed. But he was appointed by the President upon grounds of character, experience, and fidelity. He is as good a Republican as there is in the State; but his appointment was not what is technically called political, any more than that of his predecessor, General Barlow. Indeed there was, as will be remembered, a loud outcry against General Barlow because he refused to do the bidding of certain committees. Undoubtedly similar influences oppose the confirmation of Marshal Harlow. He can not, however, be removed because he is not in every way fit for the place, nor because he is not a good Republican, but solely because he is not the choice of a certain political clique.

Upon the other hand, it is not said that General Sickel would not be an efficient Marshal, nor that he is not an equally faithful Republican, and there are thousands of certain men in the State of whom the same might be said. But it is precisely in such a case as this that an admirable political system like ours shows the deplorable system of our civil service is to be corrected. It is the very case in which President Grant can stand fast by that most admirable and expressive declaration in his Message: "Nor has there been any hesitation in sustaining efficient officials against remonstrance wholly political." The President may be sure that the most intelligent and patriotic men of his own party will heartily and hopefully support him in every firm stand that he may make against the predominance of the public service to the merest party purpose.

CHARACTER.

When it was asserted that General Grant had been an accomplice in the gold scandal, although the assertion was eagerly repeated in many quarters and insidiously deprecated in others, the general public did not believe or regret for a moment. The President's character was his armor from which the shafts of venomous hostility dropped harmless. In like manner, if it should be alleged that Horace Greeley was at an interest in some vast scheme of forgery of the currency, a smile of contemptuous disbelief would express the public indignation. The bishop's character defends him from slander. Against a vague assertion, therefore, undoubtedly a man's character or good name protects him. But in a charge sure to be made in another clear circumstances? If by misapprehension of any kind, meaning any thing but ill, he is placed in a false position, character is not a legal universal fact that the circumstances are interpreted against him? Is he not very likely to be hunted, under a cry of protecting public virtue, with a fierceness and malignity which are infinitely more prejudicial to the public virtue than any specific act which might be proved against him or any man whatever?

Suppose that he has been misinformed, suppose he has acted hastily, or expressed himself warmly, is the worst view of one case likely to be the rule of his and of all men? Is not the most mistaken, he treated as if he were a conspirator against social order and common morality? Is his character of no avail against insinuations and accusations? Or would he be more malignant if they were urged against the most notorious reprobates? Undoubtedly, the higher a man's character for pure Bis fame, the more careful he should be, because of his greater influence. He has become a representative man, and other men expect themselves to be judged by larger dress there selves before a glass. But we appeal to experience whether, when the doubtful circumstance gathers a thoughtful cast, the best of the censure does not suggest a suspicion of the gratification of mean feeling, rather than regard for the public virtue. Public virtue requires first of all, that the truth be told, not that a sensation be created, nor reckless vituperation poured out. Public virtue imperatively demands the sexact of circumstances, and circumstances seem to implicate a man of unspotted fame, his character is his sure defense until it intent be proved; and if it be not proved, but mere misapprehension be established, then public virtue requires that outrageous insinuation and infamous insult not only cease, but that the most private reparation be made to the man.

The power of the press in this country is tremendous. But are "newspaper men" more favored for their power or respected for their use of it? Armies of great journals can produce a thunder in which the after still small voice of truth is utterly lost. They may jump to a vehement denunciation of my opinion, and if there be any apparent reason, he can only bow to the blast, and await the judgment of a calmer hour. But a wise man, in the stormy crisis of assertion, will oppose character to character. Here, on the one hand, may be a man whose good name and blameless life and lofty principle are known of all men; on the other, a chorus which yesterday perhaps saluted a rich man as if he were therefore a public benefactor. Swiftly the chorus turns, we will suppose, upon the man of good name, and denounces him as a betrayer of the religion he profess'd, by Mr. Williams, of Oregon, to the effect that a State Legislature having called a constitutional amendment, any further action on it shall be void. A bill, repealing the laws requiring the test oath, was introduced by Mr. Perry, of Connecticut.—In the House, Mr. Morrill, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill to fund the National debt at a lower rate of interest. The Census bill was taken up, and Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, explained wherein it differed from that under which the census of 1860 was taken. He said that the number of Representatives had been fixed by the Committee at 300, as by taking this number no State would lose a member in the decade.

December 9.—No business of importance was transacted in the Senate. In the House a resolution was offered, directing inquiry to be made into the cause of the recent Erie riot.

December 10.—The Senate was not in session. Among the bills introduced in the House were one for relieving political disabilities, and an additional uniform Naturalization bill. A petition for the recognition of the Cubans as belligerents, signed by 73,000 citizens of New York, was presented.

December 11.—In the House the Census bill was debated, and was ordered to be printed. A bill was introduced to dispense with spies and informers in the National Revenue service.

THE MESSAGE AND DEPARTMENT REPORTS.

The first annual Message of President Grant was sent to Congress on the 6th instant. It furnishes a brief but comprehensive summary of the domestic affairs of the country and the foreign relations. It calls attention to the general prosperity of the nation; to the fact that the laws of the States relative to civil nuances of occasion have been fully restored to their place in the Union; that the Freedmen are making rapid progress in learning and the industrial arts; that the means of paying the interest on the public debt and meeting all other expenses of the government are more than adequate; and suggests that immediate attention should be given to the state of our currency. The Message recommends legislation as will insure a gradual return to specie payments, and that there be no contraction in the value of currency. It also recommends the renewal of the income tax, at a reduced rate, for three years. In regard to foreign relations the message recites the successful consummation of the Alabama treaty; it perserve neutrality in the contest between Spain and the South American republics and the insurgents in Cuba, and calls attention to the present state of the Alabama negotiations with England. The President expresses the hope that these negotiations, interrupted by the failure of the Johnson-Clarendon treaty, may soon be resumed and brought to a favorable termination. In regard to Cuban belligerency the President calls attention to the exclusion of American capital from competition with a foreign company on the island of Cuba, and recommends special legislation to protect the rights of American citizens in such circumstances. He also states that he will endeavor to secure by negotiation an abandonment of the privilege of search except in ocean telegraphic cables.

The Secretary of the Treasury calls attention to the reduction of expenses in his department, amounting to over half a million dollars per annum. He has made arrangements for the manufacture of paper for the currency and other obligations of the United States, and for the printing of the same, which will increase the security against counterfeiters. He states that, including interest earned and not paid, and deducting coin in the Treasury, and the United States on the 1st of March last was $2,253,463,360 91, and subtracting the same liabilities it was $2,060,355,344 61 on the 1st of the present month, showing a decrease of $193,108,015 30. He recommends the funding of the outstanding specie payments until a part of the five-twenty bonds can be funded in a new 4½ per cent gold loan, which he would limit to $1,000,000,000, or as much thereof as could be negotiated at par, and to run and within twenty years, one-third after twenty and two-thirds after twenty-five years, one-third after five and within thirty years, for which Five Twenties and Ten Forties are given in exchange at par, and which would be required to keep as the basis of their circulation, and to be paid for from taxation, and the sum of which should be payable either here or at the leading commercial cities of Europe, at the option of holders.

The Postmaster-General reports that there are in the United States 28,500 postmasters, an increase during the past year of 625. Of these 980 are appointed by the President, and 27,520 by the Secretary and the Postmaster-General. During the past year there were issued 72,000,000 Dead Letter Office Envelopes. The money-order system has been a gratifying success. The business increased from $1,701,000, in 1868, to $24,548,468 in 1869, and the last year paid a profit of $122,000 to the Department.

The Secretary of the Interior announces an increase of sales of public lands, but on last year's cash receipts, and the disposition of public land premises a falling off of a half million dollars. The sales while less than seven hundred and fifty thousand acres have been given to actual settlers under the homestead law.

The Secretary of War suggests a plan of military organization which shall reduce the army from about from 52,434 men to 45,000, of which two-thirds could be kept on the Pacific coast. The sum appropriated for the Quarter-Master's department have been reduced $14,500,000.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

In accordance with instructions from Washington the Fenian prisoners, detained in New York, were discharged from the custody of the United States authorities on December 9, and were given a possession of by the Spanish officials.

The season just closed presents a sad record for the Gloucester, Massachusetts, fishermen. Sixteen vessels were lost, involving a pecuniary loss of more than $84,000; and fifty-six fishermen were lost. Besides these, twenty-two widows and seventy-eight fatherless children.

The Chief Justice of Illinois justice has declared the California State law denying the Chinese the right to testify in evidence to be in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The Ecumenical Council was opened on the 8th inst. by the Pope. The eternal city to the Tiber was crowded by the people as his Holiness, at the head of a procession of 700 bishops, entered the hall of the Council. The galleries of the hall were filled with diplomatic and princely and members of the corps diplomatique. The ceremonies are described as very imposing. The Roman Catholic Bishops of the 9th Pope delivered an allocution before the bishops, in which he declared that their work should be directed in "false human science and worldly luxury," and against "the monstrous errors of the present century." The Council has been adjourned until after the holidays, to give the bishops time for re-assembling. The Pope relies much on the support of the Irish bishops.

The French "Yellow Book" says that France need not influence with the United States in the work of peace between Spain and the Pacific republics, but will prevent, if it can, the intervention of Europe with the Cuban insurgents complicated the settlement.

Stormy debates are the order of the day in the French Chambers. The Left has come to the front on the 16th demanded the impeachment of M. Forcade, the Minister of the Interior. The scene which followed is described as unparalleled in the annals of the Chamber, and no adjournment was effected amidst great excitement.

The London Times suggests the appointment of such men as George Thokker Curtis and William M. Evarts to act with Lord Clarendon in the Alabama case. The Edinburgh Scotsman has a report that Lord Clarendon will submit an ultimatum regulations for the settlement of the claims.

The Insurrection of Candia has yielded to the ultimatum of the Sultan, and accepted the conditions imposed.

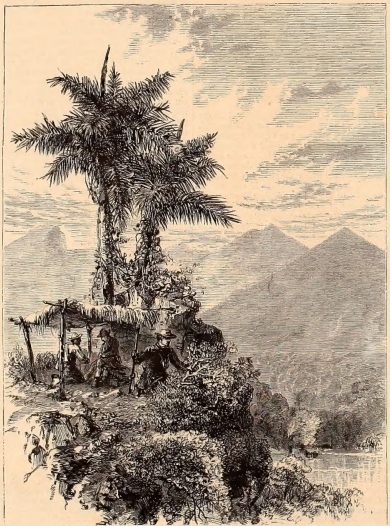
THE WAR IN CUBA—A DASH THROUGH THE WOODS.

THE WAR IN CUBA—THE CUBAN SCOUT.

THE WAR IN CUBA.

THE war in Cuba presents many interesting and romantic features, some of which are depicted by our artist, whose sketches will be found on this page. The character of the country where the insurrection began, and has been carried on more successfully than in any other part of the island, is illustrated in the sketch showing an advanced post in the Trinidad Mountains. Wild and bold, and covered with dense forest, it is just the region for the operations of the scattered bands that compose the bulk of the insurrectionary forces. Under the protection of these mountains are organized raids into districts held by the Spanish troops; and to their friendly shelter the guerrillas return when their work has been accomplished. Another illustration represents a band of these guerrillas making a dash through the woods. The Spanish troops are sometimes drawn into ambuscades in these mountains, and are made to pay dearly for their temerity. Many stirring adventures are related of "El Chico Balladares," a celebrated scout, who is constantly employed on this duty by the insurgents.

The most effective auxiliaries of the insurgents are found among the freedmen whom they have liberated from slavery on the plantations. These men, as shown in our illustrations, are armed with any weapons they can pick up—old flint-locks, bayonets fastened to the end of a stick, lances, cane-knives, etc.; but in general they are employed for more efficient work than service in the field. They are sent out among the slaves on the Spanish plantations, where their presence is less likely to excite suspicion than that of white men would be, for the purpose of inciting them to insurrection. They are also employed, in connection with Chinamen, in the work of burning plantations, and do very effective service in this kind of warfare.



THE WAR IN CUBA—ADVANCED INSURGENT POST IN THE TRINIDAD MOUNTAINS.

SPECTRUM ANALYSIS.

OF all recent discoveries in science, that certainly is the most wonderful which enables us to identify a particle of matter almost too minute to be conceived of, and to pronounce upon the composition of a body existing in remotest space. Such a power is given to us in spectrum analysis, by means of which we detect the presence of 180,000,000th of a grain of sodium, and learn the constitution of the Dog-star, 120,000,000,000,000 of miles away. But what is the spectrum analysis? the unscientific reader may ask. The answer is difficult to give in popular language; but we will attempt one. Every one has observed the band of color produced when light falls upon the triangular piece of glass we call a prism. That is a spectrum. Sir Isaac Newton first discovered that this band of color is produced by the decomposition of white light into its component colored rays. All white light—that of the sun, a candle, or a gas flame—shows this colored band, beginning with red on the one side, and terminating with violet at the other. But if we introduce any single substance capable of giving color to a gas flame, the continuous band of color is broken up, and we see only a few bright lines of the same color as the flame. Further, if two or more substances capable of imparting different colors are simultaneously introduced into a flame, each substance is found to exhibit its characteristic lines of color in the spectrum, and thus an analysis is made of the mixture placed in the flame. An observer with a spectroscope at a fire-work display would be able to tell all the ingredients employed to produce the colored fires which excite so much wonder. The discovery that every element in nature gives a characteristic spectrum was soon fruitful of consequences; for as chemists have now the habit of observing every thing that comes to hand by means of the spectroscope, lines have been remarked which did not apparently belong to any known substance. Then chemical analysts took up the matter, and separated out the unknown ingredient; and in this way, within the last few years, we have been made acquainted with five new elementary substances, and we may conjecture that others still remain to be discovered by the same means.

AIMLESS EDUCATION.

HERE is a rich man's son, who has been educated at great expense and pains, and who has graduated from college, and has come out a gentleman. He has studied, not with a view of fitting himself for any avocation in life, but with a view of being a gentleman. He reads, not for the sake of knowing any thing, but for the sake of being a gentleman. Soon his father breaks down; and he, when he is about twenty-five years old, finds himself a poor man's son, and dependent on his own exertions. And he says to himself, "What shall I do for a living?" He asks his feet, and his feet say, "I do not know." He asks his hands, and they say, "I do not know." He asks his head, and it says, "I never learned any thing about how to get a living." There is but one man that can befriend this poor wretch, and that is the sexton. Could any thing be more useless than such a person? Can there be any thing more pitiable than such histories?

THE WAR IN CUBA—INSURGENT PICKET OF FREEDMEN.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF GENERAL ADOLPH CAVADA, MILITARY DISTRICT OF CIENFUEGOS.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

SECOND SCENE.—THE INN.

CHAPTER THE NINTH.

ANNE.

"YE'LL just permit me to remind ye again, young leddy, that the Hottle's full—excepting only this settin'-room, and the bedchamber yon ter belonging to it."

So spoke "Mistress Inchbare," landlady of the Craig Fernie Inn, to Anne Silvester, standing in the parlor, purse in hand, and offering the price of the two rooms before she claimed permission to occupy them.

The time of the afternoon was about the time when Geoffrey Delamayn had started in the train, on his journey to London. About the time also, when Arnold Brinkworth had crossed the moor, and was mounting the first rising ground which led to the inn.

Mistress Inchbare was tall and thin, and decent and dry. Mistress Inchbare's unlovable leathering fast friend was her iron-gray little yellow curls. Mistress Inchbare's hard bones showed themselves, like Mistress Inchbare's hard Presbyterians, without any concealment or compromise. In short, a savagely-respectable woman, who plumed herself on presiding over a savagely-respectable inn.

There was no competition to interfere with Mistress Inchbare. She regulated her own prices, and made her own rules. If you objected to her prices, and revolted from her rules, you were free to go. In other words, you were free to cast yourself, in the capacity of homeless wanderer, on the scanty mercy of a Scotch wilderness. The village of Craig Fernie was a collection of hovels. The country about Craig Fernie, numbering on one side and moor on the other, held no second house of public entertainment, for miles and miles round, at any point of the compass. No rumbling individual but the helpless British Tourist wanted food and shelter from starvation, in that part of Scotland; and nobody but Mistress Inchbare had food and shelter to sell. A more thoroughly independent person than she was not to be found on the face of the hotel-keeping earth. The most universal of all civilized terrors—the terror of appearing unfashionable in the newspapers—was a sensation absolutely unknown to the Empress of the Inn. You lost your temper, and threatened to send her bill for exhibition in the public journals. Mistress Inchbare raised no objection to your taking any course you pleased with it. "Eh, man! send the bill, whar' ye like, as long as ye pay it first. There's nae such thing as a newspaper ever darkens my doors. Ye've got the Auld and New Testaments in your bedchambers, and the natural history o' Fairlshire on the coffee-room table—and if that's no' reading enough for ye, ye may een gae back South again, and get the rest of it there."

This was the inn at which Anne Silvester had appeared alone, with nothing but a little bag in her hand. This was the woman whose reluctance to receive her she innocently expected to overcome by showing her purse.

"Mention your charge for the rooms," she said. "I am willing to pay for them beforehand."

Her majesty, Mrs. Inchbare, never even looked at her subject's poor little purse.

"It just comes to this, mistress," she answered. "I'm no' free to talk your money, if I'm no' free to let ye the last rooms left in the house. The Craig Fernie hottle is a faimly hottle—and has its ain guide name to keep up. Ye're owre well-looking, my young leddy, to be traveling alone."

The time had been when Anne would have answered promptly enough. The hard necessities of her position made her patient now.

"I have already told you," she said, "my husband is coming here to join me." She sighed wearily as she repeated her ready-made story—and dropped into the nearest chair, from sheer inability to stand any longer.

Mistress Inchbare looked at her, with the exact measure of consideration for interest which she might have shown if she had been looking at a stray dog who had fallen footsore at the door of the inn.

"Weel! weel! sae let it be. Bide awhile, and rest ye. We'll no' charge ye for that—and we'll see if we can find rooms. I'll just tak' the rooms, mistress, to him, instead o' lettin' them to you. And, sae, good-morrow t' ye." With that final announcement of her royal will and pleasure, the Empress of the Inn withdrew.

Anne made no reply. She watched the landlady out of the room—and then struggled to control herself no longer. In her position, suspicion was almost the same thing as guilt. Shame gathered in her eyes; and the heartache wrung her, poor soul—wrung her without mercy.

A trifling noise in the room startled her. She looked up, and detected a man in a corner, dusting the furniture, and apparently acting in the capacity of attendant at the inn. He had shown her into the parlor on her arrival; but he had remained so quietly in the room that she had never noticed him since, until that moment.

He was an ancient man—with one eye filmy and blind, and one eye moist and merry. His head was bald; his feet were gouty; his nose was justly celebrated as the largest nose and the reddest nose in that part of Scotland. The mild wisdom of years was expressed mysteriously in his mellow smile. In contact with this wicked world, his manner revealed that happy mixture of two extremes—the servility which just touches independence, and the independence which just touches servility—attributed to men in existence but Scotchmen. Enormous native impudence, which amused but never offended; immeasurable cunning, masquerading habitually under the double disguise of quaint prejudice and dry humor, were the solid moral foundations on which the character of this elderly person was built. No amount of whisky ever made him drunk; and no evidence of self-tinging ever hurried his movements. Such was the headwaiter at the Craig Fernie Inn; known, far and wide, to local fame, as "Master Bishopriggs, Mistress Inchbare's right-hand man."

"What are you doing there?" Anne asked, sharply.

Mr. Bishopriggs turned himself about on his gouty feet; waved his duster gently in the air; and looked at Anne, with a mild, paternal smile.

"Eh! Am just doostin' the things; and settin' the room in decent order for ye."

"For me? Did you hear what the landlady said?"

Mr. Bishopriggs advanced confidentially, and pointed with a very unsteady forefinger to the purse which Anne still held in her hand.

"Never fash yoursel' about the landleddy!" said the sage chief of the Craig Fernie waiters. "Your purse speaks for you, my lassie. Pet it up!" cried Mr. Bishopriggs, waving temptation

"EH, MY LEDDY! HERE HE IS IN FLESH AND BLUID."

away from him with the duster. "In wi' it into yer pocket! How long ha' ye been in the warld? Is't uphaud it any where—while there's siller in the purse, there's guide in the woman!"

Anne's patience, which had resisted harder trials, gave way at this.

"What do you mean by speaking to me in that familiar manner?" she asked, rising angrily to her feet again.

Mr. Bishopriggs tucked his duster under his arm, and proceeded to satisfy Anne that he shared the landlady's view of her position, without sharing the severity of the landlady's principles. "There's nae man livin', said Mr. Bishopriggs, "looks with mair indulgence at human frailty than my sin self. And I'm no to familiar wi' ye—when I'm auld enough to be a father to ye, and ready to be a father to ye till forther notice? Here's lunch! Order your lit dinner, lassie. Husband or no husband, ye've got a stomach, and ye must een eat. There's fesh and fowl—beef and mutton—for the sheep's head singit, when they've done with it at the table-hoo do ye?"

There was but one way of getting rid of him: "Order what you like," Anne said, "and leave the room." Mr. Bishopriggs highly approved of the first half of the sentence, and totally overlooked the second.

"Ay, ay—just pet a' yer little interests in my hands; it's the wisest thing ye can do. Ask for Maister Bishopriggs (that's me) when ye want a decent, honorable man to gi' ye a word of advice. Set ye doon again—set ye doon. And don't tak' the arm-chair. Hech! hech! yer husband will be coming, ye know, and he's sure to want it!" With that seasonable pleasantry the venerable Bishopriggs winked, and went out.

Anne looked at her watch. By her calculation it was not far from the hour when Geoffrey might be expected to arrive at the inn, assuming Geoffrey to have left Windygates at the time agreed on. A little more patience, and the landlady's scruples would be satisfied, and the ordeal would be at an end.

Could she have met him nowhere else than at this barbarous house, and among these barbarous people?

No. Outside the doors of Windygates she had not a friend to help her in all Scotland. There was no place at her disposal but the inn; and she had only to be thankful that it occupied a sequestered situation, and was not likely to be visited by any of Lady Lundie's friends. Whatever the risk might be, the end in view justified her in confronting it. Her whole future depended on Geoffrey's making an honest woman of her. Not her future with him—that way there was no hope: that way her life was wasted. Her future with Blanche—she looked forward to nothing now but her future with Blanche.

Her spirits sank lower and lower. The tears rose again. It would only irritate him if he came and found her crying. She tried to divert her mind by looking about the room.

There was very little to see. Except that it was solidly built of good sound stone, the Craig Fernie hotel differed in no other important respect from the average of second-rate English inns. There was the usual slippery black sofa—constructed to let you slide when you wanted to rest. There was the usual highly-varnished armchair, expressly manufactured to test the endurance of the human spine. There was the usual paper on the walls, of the pattern designed to make your eyes ache and your head giddy. There were the usual engravings, which humanity never tires of contemplating. The Royal Portrait, of the first place of honor. The next greatest of all human beings—the Duke of Wellington—in the second place of honor. The third greatest of all human beings—the local member of parliament—in the third place of honor; and a hunting scene, in the dark. A door opposite the door of admission from the passage opened into the bedroom; and a window at the side looked out on the open space in front of the hotel, and commanded a view of the vast expanse of the Craig Fernie moor, stretching away before the rising ground on which the house was built.

Anne turned in despair from the view in the room to the view from the window. Within the last half hour it had changed for the worse. The clouds had gathered; the sun was hidden; the light on the landscape was gray and dull. Anne turned from the window, as she had turned from the room. She was just making the hopeless attempt to rest her weary limbs on the sofa, when the sound of voices and footsteps in the passage caught her ear.

Was Geoffrey's voice among them? No.

Were the strangers coming in?

The landlady had declined to let her have the rooms: it was quite possible that the strangers might be coming to look at them. There was no knowing who they might be. In the impulse of the moment she flew to the bedchamber and locked herself in.

The door from the passage opened, and Arnold Brinkworth—shown in by Mr. Bishopriggs—entered the sitting-room.

"Nobody here!" exclaimed Arnold, looking round. "Where is she?"

Mr. Bishopriggs pointed to the bedroom door. "Eh! yer good leddy's joost in the bedchamber, ma doot!"

Arnold started. He had felt no difficulty (when he and Geoffrey had discussed the question at Windygates) about presuming himself, at the inn in the assumed character of Anne's husband. But the result of putting the deception in practice, was to lay the least of it, a little embarrassing at first. Here was the waiter describing Miss Silvester as his "good leddy;" and leaving him, naturally and properly, to take the "good lady's" husband to knock at her bedroom door, and tell her that he was there. In despair of knowing what else to do at the moment, Arnold asked for the landlady, whom he had not seen on arriving at the inn.

"The landleddy's just tottin' up the ledgers o' the hottle in her ain room," answered Mr. Bishopriggs. "She'll be here anon—the weary-ful woman!—speerin' who ye are and what ye are, and takin' a the business o' the house on her ain head, as usual." He dropped the subject of the landlady, and put in a plea for himself. "I ha' lookit after a' the leddy's little comforts, Sir," he whispered, "as I trust in me! trust in me!"

Arnold's attention was absorbed in the very serious difficulty of announcing his arrival to Anne. "How am I to get her out?" he said to himself, with a look of perplexity directed at the bedroom door.

He had spoken loud enough for the waiter to hear him. Arnold's look of perplexity was instantly reflected on the face of Mr. Bishopriggs. The head-waiter at Craig Fernie possessed an immense experience of the manners and customs of newly-married people on their honeymoon trip. He had been a second father (with excellent pecuniary results) to innumerable brides and bridegrooms. He knew young married couples in all their varieties:—The couples who try to behave as if they had been married for many years; the couples who attempt no concealment, and take advice from competent authorities about them. The couples who are bashfully talkative before third persons; the couples who are bashfully silent under similar circumstances. The couples who don't know what to do; the couples who wish it was over; the couples who must never be intruded upon without careful preliminary knocking at the door; the couples who come out and drink in the intervals of "bliss," and the other couples who don't. But the bridegroom who stood helpless on one side of the door, and the bride who remained locked in on the other, were new varieties of the nuptial species, even in the vast experience of Mr. Bishopriggs's mind.

"Hoo are ye to get her oot?" he repeated. "I'll show ye hoo!" He advanced as rapidly as his gouty feet would allow to him, and knocked at the bedroom door. "Eh, my leddy! here he is in flesh and bluid. Mercy preserve us! do ye look the door of the nuptial chamber on your husband's face?"

At that unanswerable appeal the lock was heard turning in the door. Mr. Bishopriggs winked at Arnold with his one available eye, and laid his forefinger knowingly along his enormous nose. "I'm away before she falls into your arms! Ieely on it I'll no come in again without knocking first!"

He left Arnold alone in the room. The bedroom door opened slowly by a few inches at a time. Anne's voice was just audible, speaking cautiously behind it.

"Is that you, Geoffrey?"

Arnold's heart began to beat fast, in anticipation of the disclosure which was now close at hand. He knew neither what to say or do—he remained silent.

Anne repeated the question in louder tones: "Is that you?"

There was the certain prospect of alarming her, if some reply was not given. There was no help for it. Come what come might, Arnold answered, in a whisper:

"Yes."

The door was flung wide open. Anne Silvester appeared on the threshold, confronting him.

Mr. Brinkworth!!!" she exclaimed, standing petrified with astonishment.

For a moment more neither of them spoke. Anne advanced one step into the sitting-room, and put the next inevitable question, with an instantaneous change from surprise to suspicion.

"What do you want here?"

Geoffrey's letter represented the only possible excuse for Arnold's appearance in that place, and at that time.

"I have got a letter for you," he said—and offered it in silence.

She was instantly on her guard. They were little better than strangers to each other, as Arnold had said. A sickening presentiment of some treachery on Geoffrey's part struck cold to her heart. She refused to take the letter.

"I expect the letter," she said. "Who told you I was here?" She put the question, not only with a tone of suspicion, but with a look of suspicion. The look was not an easy one for a man to bear. It required a momentary exertion of self-control on Arnold's part, before he could trust himself to answer with due consideration for her.

"Is there a watch set on my actions?" she went on, with rising anger. "And are you the spy?"

"You haven't known me very long, Miss Silvester," Arnold answered, quietly. "But you ought to know me better than to say that. I am the bearer of a letter from Geoffrey."

She was on the point of following his example, and of speaking of Geoffrey by his Christian name, on her side. But she checked herself before the word had passed her lips.

"Do you mean Mr. Delamayn?" she asked, coldly.

"Yes."

"What occasion have I for a letter from Mr. Delamayn?"

She was determined to acknowledge nothing—she kept him obstinately at arm's-length. Arnold did, as a matter of instinct, what a man of larger experience would have done, as a matter of calculation—he closed with her boldly, then and there.

"Miss Silvester! it's no use besting about the bush. If you won't take the letter, you force me to speak. I am here on a very unpleasant errand. I begin to wish, from the bottom of my heart, I had never undertaken it."

A quick flash of pain passed over her face. She was beginning, dimly beginning, to understand him. He hesitated. His generous nature shrank from hurting her.

"Go on," she said, with an effort.

"Try not to be angry with me, Miss Silvester. Geoffrey and I are old friends. Geoffrey knows he can trust me—"

"Trust you?" she interposed. "Stop!"

Arnold waited. She went on, speaking to herself, not to him.

"When I was in the other room I asked if Geoffrey was there. And this man answered for him." She sprang forward with a cry of horror.

"His he told you—"

"For God's sake, read his letter!"

She violently pushed back the hand with which Arnold once more offered the letter. "You don't look at me! He has told you!"

"Miss Silvester," persisted Arnold, "in justice to him, if you won't in justice to me."

The situation was too painful to be endured. Arnold looked at her, this time, with a man's resolution in his eyes—spoke to her, this time, with a man's resolution in his voice. She took the letter.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," she said, with a sudden humiliation of tone and manner, inexpressibly affecting, inexpressibly painful to see. "I understand my position at last. I am a woman doubly betrayed. Please to excuse what I said to you just now, when I appointed myself to have some claim on your respect. Perhaps you will grant me your pity? I can ask for nothing more."

Arnold was silent. Words were useless in the face of such a self-abandonment as this. Any man living—even Geoffrey himself—must have felt for her at that moment.

She looked at the first time at the letter. She opened it on the wrong side. "My own letter!" she said to herself. "In the hands of another man!"

"Look at the last page," said Arnold.

She turned to the last page, and read the hateful pencil-lines. "Villain! villain! villain!" At the third repetition of the word, she crushed the letter in the palm of her hand, and flung it from her to the other end of the room. In an instant after, the fire that had flamed up in her died out. Feebly and slowly she reached out her hand to the nearest chair, and sat down in it with her back to Arnold. "He has deserted me!" was all she said. The words fell low and quiet on the silence: they were the utterance of an immeasurable despair.

"You are wrong!" exclaimed Arnold. "Indeed, indeed you are wrong! Let me go to excuse—it's the truth. I was present when the message came about his father."

She never heeded him, and never moved. She only repeated the words:

"He has deserted me!"

"Don't take it in that way!" pleaded Arnold—"pray don't! It's dreadful to hear you; it is indeed. I am sure he has not deserted you. There was no answer; no sign that she heard him; she sat there, struck to stone. It was impossible to the landlady in such a moment as this. In despair of knowing how else to rouse her, Arnold drew a chair to her side, and patted her kindly on the shoulder. "Come!" he said, in his single-hearted, boyish way. "Cheer up a little!"

She slowly turned her head, and looked at him with a dull surprise.

"Didn't you say he had told you every thing?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Isn't you despise a woman like me?"

Arnold's heart went back, at that dreadful question, to the one woman who was eternally sacred to him in the whole round from whose bosom he had drawn the breath of life.

"Does the man live," he said, "who can think of his mother and not respect his sex?"

That answer set the prisoned misery in her free. She gave him her hand—she faintly thanked him. The merciful tears came to her at last.

Arnold rose, and turned away to the window in despair. "I mean well," he said. "And yet I only distress her!"

She heard him, and struggled to compose herself. "Let me answer you," she gently said. "Don't mind my crying—I'm the better for it." She looked round at him gratefully. "I won't distress you, Mr. Brinkworth. I forget what you—and I do. Come back, or I shall think you are angry with me." Arnold went back to her. She gave him her hand once more. "One doesn't understand people all at once," she said, simply. "I thought you were like other men—I didn't know till to-day how kind you could be. Did you walk here?" she added, suddenly, with an effort to change the subject. "Are you tired? I have not been kindly received at this place—but I'm sure I may offer you whatever the inn affords."

It was impossible not to feel for her—it was impossible not to be interested in her. Arnold's honest longing to help her expressed itself a little too openly when he spoke next. "All I want, Miss Silvester, is to be of some service to you, if I can," he said. "Is there any thing I can do to make your position here more comfortable? You will stay at this place, won't you? Geoffrey wishes it."

She shuddered, and looked away. "Yes or no?" she answered, hurriedly.

"You will hear from Geoffrey," Arnold went on, "to-morrow or next day. I know he means to write."

"For Heaven's sake, don't speak of him any more!" she cried out. "How do you think I can look you in the face—" Her cheeks flushed deep, and her eyes rested on him with a moment's fiery firmness. "Mind this! I am his wife, if promises can make me so. He has pledged his word to me by all that is sacred!" She checked herself impatiently. "What am I saying? What interest can we have in this miserable state of things? Don't let us talk of it! I have something else to say to you. Let us go back to my troubles. Did you see the landlady when you came in?"

"No. I only saw the waiter."

"The landlady has made some absurd difficulty about letting me have these rooms because I came here alone."

"She won't make any difficulty now," said Arnold. "I have settled that."

"You?"

Arnold smiled. After what had passed, it was an indescribable relief to him to see the humorous side of his own position for a moment.

"Certainly," he answered. "When I asked for the lady who had arrived here alone this afternoon—"

"Yes."

"I was told, in your interests, to ask for her as my wife."

Anne looked at him—in alarm as well as in surprise.

"You asked for me as your wife?" she repeated.

"Yes. I haven't done wrong—have I? As I understood it, there was no alternative. Geoffrey told me you had settled with him to present yourself here as a married lady, whose husband was coming to join her."

"I thought of him when I said that. I never thought of you."

"Natural enough. Still, it comes to the same thing (doesn't it?) with the people of this house."

"I don't understand you."

"I will try and explain myself a little better. Geoffrey said your position depended on my asking for you at the door (as he would have asked for you if he had come) in the character of your husband."

"He had no right to say that."

"No right? After what you have told me of the landlady, just think what might have happened if he had not said it! I haven't had much experience myself of these things. But—allow me to ask—wouldn't it have been a little awkward (at my age) if I had come here and intimated for you as a friend, when, for all that case, the landlady might have made some additional difficulty about letting you have the rooms?"

It was beyond dispute that the landlady would have refused to let the rooms at all. It was equally plain that the absurd scruples Arnold had practiced on the people of the inn was a deception which Anne had herself rendered necessary, in her own interests, from the first moment. It was clearly impossible for her to have foreseen such an event as Geoffrey's departure for London. Still, she felt an uneasy sense of responsibility—a vague dread of what might happen next. She sat nervously twisting her handkerchief in her lap, and made no answer.

"Don't suppose I object to this little stratagem," Arnold went on. "I am serving my old friend, and I am helping the lady who is soon to be his wife."

Anne rose abruptly to her feet, and amazed him by a very unexpected question.

"Mr. Brinkworth," she said, "forgive me the rudeness of something I am about to say to you. Where are you going away?"

Arnold burst out laughing.

"What! am I quite sure I can do nothing more to assist you," he answered.

"Pray don't think of me any longer."

"In your situation! who else am I to think of?"

Anne laid her hand earnestly on his arm, and answered:

"Blanche!"

"Blanche?" repeated Arnold, utterly at a loss to understand her.

"Yes—Blanche. She found time to tell me what had passed between you this morning before I left Windygates. She is your friend—and her an other. I know you are engaged to be married to her."

Arnold was delighted to hear it. He had been merely unwilling to leave her thus far. He was absolutely determined to stay with her now.

"Don't expect me to go after that!" he said. "Come and sit down again, and let's talk about Blanche."

Anne declined impatiently, by a gesture. Arnold was too deeply interested in the new topic to take any notice of it.

"You know all about her habits and her tastes," he went on, "and what she likes, and what she dislikes. It's most important that I should talk to you about her. When we are husband and wife, Blanche is to have all her own way in every thing. That's my idea of the Whole Duty of Man—when Man is married. You are still standing? Let me give you a chair."

At war cruel—unnatural circumstances it would have been impossible—to disappoint him. But the vague fear of consequences which had taken possession of Anne was not to be trifled with. She had no clear conception of the risk (and it is to be added, in justice to Geoffrey, that he had no clear conception of the risk) on which Arnold had unconsciously ventured, in undertaking his errand to the inn. Neither of them had any adequate idea (few people have) of the infamous absence of all merciful warning, of all decent precaution and restraint, which makes the marriage law of Scotland a trap to catch unmarried men and women in. Under this dark shadow Geoffrey's mind was incapable of looking beyond the present emergency, Anne's finer intelligence told her that a danger which offered such facilities for private marriage as the facilities of which she had proposed to take advantage in her own case, was not a contingency which a man could act on. Arnold had acted, without danger of some serious embarrassment following as the possible result. With this conviction in her mind, she resolutely declined to take the offered chair, or to enter into the proposed conversation.

"When you have seen my host about Blanche, Mr. Brinkworth, must be said at some fitter time. I beg you will leave me."

"Leave you—and good by?"

"Yes. Leave me to the solitude that is best for me, and to the sorrow that I have deserved. Thank you—and good by."

Arnold made no attempt to disguise his disappointment and surprise.

"If I must go, I must go," he said. "But why are you in such a hurry?"

"I didn't wish to call me your wife again before the people of this inn."

"Is that all? What on earth are you afraid of?"

She was unable fully to realize her own apprehensions. She was doubly unable to express them in words. The only intelligible and tangible reason which might prevail on him to go, she drifted back into that very conversation about Blanche into which she had declined to enter but the moment before.

"I have reasons for being afraid," she said. "One that I can't explain—and one that I can. Suppose Blanche heard of what you have done? The longer you stay here—the more people you see—the more chance there is that she might hear of it."

"And what if she did?" asked Arnold, in his own straight-forward way. "Do you think she would be angry with me for making myself useful to you?"

"Yes," rejoined Anne, sharply, "if she was jealous of me."

Arnold's unlimited belief in Blanche expressed itself, without the slightest compromise, in two words:

"That's impossible!"

Anxious as she was, miserable as she was, a faint smile flitted over Anne's face.

"Sir Patrick would tell you, Mr. Brinkworth, that nothing is impossible where women are concerned." She dropped her momentary lightness of tone, and went on as earnestly as ever. "You won't pay attention to Blanche's advice—I can. Once more, I beg you to go. I don't like your coming here, in this way! I don't like it at all!"

She held out her hand to take leave. At the same moments there was a loud knock at the door of the room.

Anne sank into the chair at her side, and uttered a faint cry of alarm. Arnold, perfectly impenetrable to the change in his position, asked what there was to frighten her—and answered the knock in the two customary words:

"Come in!"

ST. BERNARD DOGS.

It is chiefly during the eight or nine months of winter that the inmates of the hospice of the Hospice of the Great St. Bernard are called into action. They serve as guides to small caravans of travelers, and to the mail carried from the right direction. They also track those that have been lost in the deep snows or buried by avalanches. For these purposes their assistance is quite indispensable. Of course there can not be any question of beaten tracks in yonder dreary solitudes. The snow often lies forty feet deep; and even the conventuals and servants of the convent would, notwithstanding their familiar acquaintance with the scenery, in times of fogs and storms, never find their way without the assistance of those keen-scented animals. Generally at such times the dogs are sent out on their accustomed rounds; they scarcely ever go alone. But on extraordinary occasions, in thick fogs, thunder-storms and snow-storms, the whole population of the convent will turn out in company with the dogs, furnished with lanterns, cordials, and every thing necessary in cases of accident.

Not less than two dogs are ever sent out—one of them an old, well-trained animal, which will serve as an instructor and trainer to the younger one. Should either of them happen to one of them, the other will go for assistance.

The work of brotherly love to which the monks of the Great St. Bernard devote themselves is attended with great perils. Many fall victims to the fatigues of their laborious calling, and more than one of these noble dogs have found graves beneath avalanches and in deep snow-drifts.

When we hear of the thousands whose lives have been saved by those invaluable animals, we are not to understand that so many have been dug out from beneath avalanches with their assistance. They will track those who, having lost their way, are lying in the snow half benumbed with cold; they will encourage, by barking violently, such as, from exhaustion and despair, have sunk down to their last sleep, and call up assistance when they are unable to do any thing. The deep tracks they leave in the snow have guided many a one to the hospitable halls of the Hospice. Their constant loud baying on expeditions of mercy has been heard by many a forlorn wanderer, who was thus enabled to make known his situation to the brave men sent out to look for travelers lost in the snow.

The climate of the Great St. Bernard is excessively rude; even in midsummer the mercury never rises higher than 16 degrees above zero, according to Réaumur; in winter it sinks down to 27 degrees below the freezing-point. There are, however, few clear and unclouded days during the whole year. The nights are also very cold; while a small Alpine lake, situated south of the Hospice, occasionally remains frozen up for several years in succession. The average temperature is, according to the most careful meteorological observations, the same as that of the southern point of Spitzbergen.

It is quite natural, under these circumstances, that but few animals will endure the peculiar climate of those mountain regions; and we can easily appreciate the love and anxious care which the monks of the Great St. Bernard bestow upon the rearing and preservation of the brave, wonderfully-gifted animals.

The most celebrated of all these dogs was Barry. His successes exceeded those of any other dog of his race. His intelligence and animal love were almost human. During the last of little more than twelve years he saved the lives of forty-eight travelers—some say even more than seventy. Nothing is said of how he acquired his pleasure when he had succeeded in saving a traveler from perishing in the snow. He used to manifest his satisfaction by licking his hand, lurking, wagging his tail—in short, in every conceivable way. Whenever he found a lost traveler lying in the snow, benumbed with cold, he would endeavor to warm him with his breath, or by encompassing him with a full length over his body, until his companion dog had brought up assistance from the Hospice. Once he brought to life a child, for which purpose he actually found him to mount his back, and thus carried him to the convent.

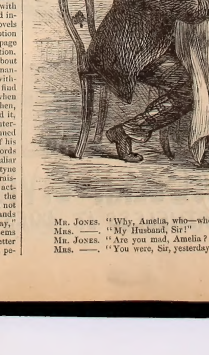
Many of those dogs perished while thus fulfilling their mission. The most tragical fate, however, was that which Barry himself met with near the fifty-second year of his age. Having found a man nearly frozen to death in the snow—a deserter from the Austrian army—the noble animal endeavored to have recorded in resuscitating him. The soldier, unable to account for the presence of a dog in that dreary solitude, fled without out of the reach of the incessant howls, and fancying it to have been sent out by his pursuers to track him, drew his sabre and plunged it into the heart of the faithful dog. Thus died the noblest dog that ever lived. Barry's skin has been carefully stuffed, and is now exhibited in the Museum of Natural History at Berne. This noble creature was considered the most perfect type of the pure breed of the St. Bernard dog.

Mr. Schumacher, at Holligen, about a mile from Berne, Switzerland, keeps an establishment for the breeding of dogs, which is the pride of show to visitors. It consists of an inclosure of about one-fourth of an acre, in the shape of a parallelogram, with a shed at one end, in which the dogs have ample room to take exercise. There are also in opposite corners several kennels provided. In this inclosure twelve or fifteen magnificent dogs are always kept. It is a truly gratifying sight to see these noble beasts, not merely of the finchers, but for the love love to see the perfection of nature. They are almost all white, with large tan-colored spots on their foreheads, ears, backs, and tails. They average about six or seven hands in height. They are especially remarkable for size of head, strength of neck, width of chest, and for their powerful legs and feet—the peculiar marks of the breed. Every visitor is struck by the noble and intelligent expression of their eyes, and their lordly carriage. They may be called the gentlemen among dogs. Gentle dogs they are, but formidable, generous, royal fellows, far beyond the common plebeian run of curs. They will hunt neither bird nor beast. They will never bite but for the destruction of any thing lively; but I verily believe that in a case of emergency they will not flinch from any thing, in whatever form, to defend or present itself—they will either conquer or die. The only real business those royal beasts should ever be put to is that of saving men's and women's lives. They are faithful to their master, but indifferent to all advances or caresses of strangers.

Mr. Schumacher, some time ago, purchased a dog of this breed, named Sultan, which at the International Exhibition at Paris won the only first prize that was given for dogs. A perfect specimen of pure dog-blood was never beheld. We regret to say that Sultan died last summer. By far the greatest part of Mr. S.'s stock, however, blow blood as pure as Sultan's, some of them even resembling him in the color and shape of spots. All the dogs of the true Barry type have hair of medium length, scarcely ever attaining an inch and a half. Nature, however, varies in her freaks. Sometimes puppies are born whose hair will grow long and silky, between two and three inches in length, others with very short hair, scarcely an inch long, all at the same birth with puppies that are considered to be of the true Barry type. One litter contained as many as five, with hair of medium length. This is ascribed to the fact that the original ancestors of the St. Bernards have been—as far back as the fourteenth century, were, it is said, a very short-haired Danish bull-dog and a long-haired shepherd bitch from the Pyrenees. Of course only such specimens are selected for breeding as show the true Barry type; but, as we have already said, Nature will have her own ways; and occasionally return to original forms. The reason why the beautiful long-haired specimens are considered to be of the true St. Bernardine type is simply because their long hair is liable to be

WALTER SCOTT AT WORK.

EVEN when his eyes were failing, and his fingers gouty, Walter Scott frequently threw off thirty or forty pages of print before breakfast; and in fact, was his task when he was at work upon "Waverley," and the "Life of Napoleon;" and till he had accomplished that, he did not think himself at liberty to take his axe and stroll out into the wood on his horse's sharp exercise. At his prime, he thought nothing of throwing off a novel in a month. "Guy Mannering" was written in six weeks about Christmas, and that he thought easy work. Very frequently, however, Sir Walter had a brace of novels on hand together, or a novel and a poem, or two or three reviews for the Edinburgh and the Quarterly. "Ivanhoe" and the "Monastery" were written together also; and he took up "Kenilworth" or "Woodstock" as a diversion to kill time when he was ahead of the press with his "Life of Napoleon." Hasty work in literature is not generally the highest kind of work; and of course there is in all Sir Walter Scott's works much that is thin, and rambling, and vapid. But with Sir Walter Scott literature was not an art, but a trade. What was good enough for the public, was good enough for him; and his constant test of the value of his work was the price of its copyright and its sale. In poetry, he wrote by inspiration; taking up his pen, like Byron, only when the fit was upon him; but when at work upon a novel or a history, all he thought of was to get through his task; and if he was not in the vein when he took up his pen, he simply wrote on, as he said, till he "wrote himself in good-humour." This was not generally a very hard task; and when he had got into a good-humor with his work, he wrote on as freely and as joyfully as he talked. His manuscripts testify sufficiently to this. In his poems you meet with stanzas that are hardly legible with blots and interlineations; but the manuscripts of his novels are as free from every thing of this description as his correspondence. You may turn over page after page without finding a single correction. He never boggled over a sentence, or cast about for an expression. "He thoughts," as his amanuensis said, "flogged easily and felicitously, without any difficulty to lay hold of them, or to find appropriate language. He sat in his chair (when dictating), from which he rose now and then, took a volume from the book-case, consulted it, and restored it to the shelf—all without intermission in the current of ideas, which continued to be delivered with no less readiness than if his mind had been wholly occupied with the words he was uttering." When dialogue of peculiar animation was in progress, Amanuensis says Scott walked up and down the room, raising and lowering his voice, and, as it were, acting the parts. The file-work Scott left to the printer; and of several of his stories he did not even see the proofs till they were in the hands of the public. With the exception of the "Lay," I doubt whether he ever read any of his poems after they were published. He liked that better than he anticipated; but I do not think the pe-



DIVORCE A LA MODE.

MR. JONES. "Why, Amelia, who—who is this Gentleman?"
MRS. ——. "My Husband, Sir!"
MR. JONES. "Are you mad, Amelia? I'm your Husband."
MRS. ——. "You were, Sir, yesterday, but I procured a Divorce, and married Mr. Smythe this morning. This is my House, Sir!"

riodical recollections of the effect produced by the early issue of each poem; and when Ballantyne told him that the "Lord of the Isles" and "Rokeby" were pulping in the glare and glitter of "Childe Harold" and the "Giaour," he abandoned the laurel wreath to Byron without a struggle, and almost without a sigh. "Since one line has failed," he said, "we must strike out something else."

This was the spur under which he took up the abandoned manuscript of "Waverley," which had been lying among the fishing-tackle of an old drawer for seven or eight years, and threw off the second and third volumes in three weeks. When, in turn, the novels of the "Author of Waverley" began to pall upon a taste which likes its fiction fresh and fresh, Scott left the field to his imitators, and turned to history. "There is but one way," he said, "in which he can to be read—you must strike out something novel to suit the humour of the hours;" and that was the principle by which he was governed in the choice of his career. It was not a very lofty principle to act upon; with a weaker man it might have been a dangerous principle, ending, as in the case of Byron, in the complete demoralization of his genius. In Scott, however, it led to nothing more than a variation of style. The most voluminous author of an age not particularly distinguished by the purity of its literature or morals, the contemporary of Byron and Moore, and the personal friend of George IV., an author, too, who avowedly set his sails to catch the popular breeze, Sir Walter Scott never allowed his genius to pollute itself by any thing that, as a man, he could blush for. Talking over his writings at the close of his career with a friend, and contrasting their tone with that of Goethe's, Sir Walter said, with a flash of pride: "It is a comfort to me to think that I have tried to unsettle no man's faith, to corrupt no man's principle, and that I have written nothing which on my death-bed I should wish blotted." And his boast was true.

THE AURORA.

THE spectroscope is continuously revealing new wonders in the departments of physics—even astronomy. A Swedish astronomer, Angstrom, has succeeded on several occasions in obtaining the spectrum of the luminous are which bounds the dark circle of the aurora. The light of this are is almost monochromatic, and exhibits a single brilliant bend, situated to the left of the well-known group of calcine lines, and (which is very remarkable) not coinciding with any of the known rays or bands of simple or compound gases. Another circumstance which, as the discoverer observes, gives a special and universal commissance to this observation, is this; namely, he succeeded in observing the spectrum of the zodiacal light, and here the same bright band was seen.

"Indeed," he adds, "during a starlight night, when the sky was almost phosphorescent, I found traces of this band visible from all parts of the heavens." In addition to the bright band, he also observed in the auroral spectrum traces of three feeble bands, situated near to the line F of the solar spectrum. Angstrom's observations on the auroras were corrected to the winter of 1867-68, and have since been confirmed by himself and several other physicists. The spectroscopic examination of the zodiacal light completely overthrows the view generally held by astronomers, that this phenomenon is due to the reflection of the sun's light from a belt of meteors circulating between the sun and the earth; and shows that, like the auroral light, it must be due to magnetic disturbance in the firmament. It may startle some of our readers to learn that, according to Dr. Mayer, of Heilbronn, the true discoverer of the law of the conservation of forces, the aurora is indirectly due to the trade-winds. In a very elaborate memoir which Dr. Mayer read at the September meeting of the German Scientific and Medical Association, in which he discussed a variety of questions arising out of his theory of the conservation of forces, he stated that, in his opinion, the phenomena of terrestrial magnetism are due to the trade-winds. He sums up his reasons as follows: The lowest stratum of the atmosphere assume, by friction with the surface of the sea, an electrical condition, the opposite of that of the water. The air then rises under the warmth of the sun, and the colder air from the pole streams in underneath, driving it toward the pole, whom, from its high state of electric tension, it produces the aurora. He adds that the constant disturbances of electrical equilibrium which is manifested by the frequently varying direction of the magnetic needle is due to the greater electric activity of the southern hemisphere than of the northern, owing to the physical conformation of the globe.

CYMBELINE.

HARD by the garden-seat,
Where rose and woodbine meet,
And all sad thoughts are sweet,
Stands Cymbeline.

Where, through the trellised leaves
The wan moon softly weaves
A chain of light, that cleaves
O'er her sweet face.

Faith keepeth watch above,
But false the faith thereof,
While at her feet doth Love,
For love of her,

Amid red roses' breath,
That sicken unto death,
My Lady stays and saith,
Not any thing.

The trembling leaves are sad,
And Love with Grief is clad,
Not any thing is glad,
Because of her.

She tarrieth in vain,
For her swarth knight is slain,
And cometh not again,
To Cymbeline.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A PARIS policeman being summoned into the presence of a man who had just shot himself dead, riot severely wounding a lady, displayed his anxiety to arrive at the facts in the case by excitedly demanding of the only surviving witness of the fray, "Did this man kill himself before he fired at this lady, or not?"

THE SEA'S

There are certain things—as a spider, a ghost,
The income tax, gout, an umbrella for three—
That I hate: but the thing that I hate the most
Is a thing they call the sea.

If you like coffee with sand for dregs,
A decided hint of salt in your tea,
And a fishy taste in the very eggs,
By all means choose the sea.

And if, with these dainties to drink and eat,
You prefer not a vestige of grass or tree,
And a chronic state of wet in your feet,
Then I recommend the sea.

A gentleman once asked, "What is woman?" when a married man replied, "She is an ornament in grace, in our volume, elegantly bound. Although it may be dear, every man should have a copy of it."

SEATING WITH A GIRL.

"Boy, may I inquire where Robinson's drag store is?" "Certainly, Sir," replied the boy, very respectfully. "Well, Sir," said the gentleman, after waiting a while, "where is it?" "I have not the least idea, your Honor," said the urchin.

HOW TO MAKE A STRENGTHENING INJURA FOR INVALIDS.—Take a gallon and a half, or thereabout, of pure water; add a quarter of an ounce of hard, and half a halfpenny worth of glue. Let it boil steadily for an hour, and, while boiling, add a little sweet mahogany charcoal. Pepper and salt may be added, if "it is easy to do."

"Come," said Will, "I pray you devote
Just half a minute to mend this coat,
While I a bill has chanced to note."
"'Tis ten o'clock," said the drowsy mate.
"I know," said Will, "it is rather late,
But it's never too late to mend."

Henry Ward Beecher, returning from church one Sunday, passed a number of specimens of "Young America" amusing themselves with a game of marbles, mixed with fancy swearing. "My boy," said Mr. B. to an interesting youth of eight years, "my boy, I am frightened." "Are you?" answered buttons, quite humbly; "why the devil don't you run, then?"

Little Frank had been taught that he was made of dust. As he stood by the window watching the lamplament as the wind was whirling it in eddies, he exclaimed mournfully, "Ah, I thought the dust looked as though there was going to be another little boy made."

This is the way in which a South Sea Islander settled a case of bigamy. His unhappy wife had attacked him for the sin of polygamy, and he was much grieved. After a day or two he returned with face radiant with joy. "Me all right now. One wife. We very good Christian." "What did you do with the other?" asked the missionary. "Me eat her up."

There is a saying, "Save us from our friends," but it does not mean any thing in particular. It was the last remark but one Julius Cæsar made to Brutus; Brutus was an intimate friend of Cæsar's, and meant extremely kindly to him. Brutus put a knife into Cæsar. That was a striking instance of friendship.

Matrimony is—hot cakes, warm beds, comfortable slippers, smoking coffee, round arms, red lips, kind words, skirts clinging in buttons, rebored stockings, bootjacks, happiness, etc. Single blessedness is—sheet-iron quilts, hard crusts, frost-proof pumps, ice in the pitcher, unregenerated lines, heelless socks, coffee sweetened with bitches, cuffs-perfect specimen, thermometers, corns, coughs, cold dinners, colics, rheumatism, and any amount of misery.

Friendship is a very beautiful thing. It is also useful. Without friendship a man can not borrow five dollars. Editors have been borrowed at 40 per cent, but still a brotherly love of a certain kind has inspired the transaction. There is a bold sort of philanthropy in cent. per cent., and philanthropy is merely universal friendship.

A sentimental young lady lost a curly poodle on which she set great value, and which she fed with her own hands. Not long after the poodle had departed this transitory life Fridolina was seen to contemplate, with great gravity, the countenance of a pale, bewhiskered and bereticulated young man. "Fridolina, my dear," said her mother with a very proper toll duty, "don't look so at young Fritz; he'll think you are in love with him." "I can't help it, dear Sophie," replied Fridolina, with tears in her lovely eyes, "me exposeion is no like my pet poodle's."

A lady was about to engage the services of a servant at an intelligence office, but before the bargain was closed a few important questions were asked by the former. "I hope," said the lady, "that you have had few relatives in Borioff?" "Not one, mum, none at all." "And how many friends who would defire to call on you?" "Faith, mum, I have but two friends in Boston, and one of them is in Ireland and the other in Maine."

EXCOMMUNICATION OF MODERN CIVILIZATION.

GALILEO OF THE 19TH CENTURY. "BUT NEVERTHELESS IT DOES MOVE."

"OUR ESTABLISHED CHURCH."

THE ECONOMICAL COUNCIL, ALBANY, NEW YORK.

"THE GOOD COUNSEL I CAN COMMAND IN MY SPHERE." PIUS HOFFMAN I.

CHURCH AND STATE ONE.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

En Plus Books.—Book FEE.

CHAPTER VI.

LONELY.

THE prince was a little near-sighted, and not deeming it good manners to use the glass that dangled by the black ribbon over his waistcoat, when he found himself face to face with "milaidi," he had approached to within a short distance of her before he became aware of the agitated expression of her face, and the unusual carelessness of her toilet.

The instinct of coquetry would have prevented Veronica from presenting herself before Barletti in any unbecoming attire. But if she had given the matter her most serious consideration she could have found none better calculated to set off her striking beauty than that which she now wore. A long white wrapper fell to her feet. She had covered her head with the voluminous folds of a white lace shawl, one end of which was thrown across her breast and fell over her shoulder; and beneath the delicate snowy lace her long black hair streamed rippling to her waist.

"Oh, prince, there you are!" Veronica cried. "I had told me you were to be most loggia, and I ran down to catch you before I dressed for dinner."

The words were flattering, inasmuch as they implied great eagerness on the lady's part to see him. But he must have been a fatuously vain man who could have looked in Veronica's face as she spoke, and have supposed her to be thinking of paying him compliments.

Barletti bowed, and stood awaiting what more she had to say.

"Have you seen Paul?"

"Yes, signora. I saw him as I came in, but I did not speak to him."

"Then you do not know that Sir John has been, and still is, ill?"

"Dio buono! Ill? No. I know nothing. What is the matter with ce ben Gale?"

"I hope it is nothing serious: but I can not tell. I am uneasy about him; very uneasy."

Barletti did not believe that milaidi could be suffering any acute anxiety on the score of her lord's health. And he would have considered it a priori very unlikely that she should so suffer. But he thought it highly proper and becoming that she should assume anxiety. A frank show of indifference would have displeased.

"Oh, you may rest alone your cure, signora," he said, soothingly. "What are the symptoms? How long has he been ill? I wonder that Paul said nothing to me!"

Veronica hurriedly described the singular swoon or trance into which Sir John had fallen. "He says the heat made him faint," she added, "but—" And she shook her head, doubtfully.

"Faint! It is not unlikely," said Barletti. "It may have been a pizzicato di capo—a mere swimming of the head. Such things are not uncommon, and it needs more than a little very strong. Pray tell me if there is any thing I can do for you in Florence. Of course, I go back at once. I could not think c—intruding on you under the circumstances."

"No, no, no! That is just the very thing I hastened down to say. You must remain and dine here, and stay all the evening until Sir John retires."

"But—would he not prefer—" began Barletti in some astonishment. Veronica interrupted him, speaking very fast, and in a low tone, and glancing timorously nervously to see that they were not observed.

"Yes; no doubt he would prefer that you should go away. But I prefer that you should stay. I beg you to stay. He has a whim to believe that I am ill. He will not have a doctor. He has given Paul orders to let no one in from the servants. It may be nothing, but I am so inexperienced in illness I can not judge. I am alone here. I am afraid of—of what the responsibility. You must remain and watch him, and let me know what you think. And—and—do not allow it to be seen that I have urged you to stay! Do not admit that I have said a word to you about illness. I rely on you, remember! And, above all, say no syllable to Paul."

She turned away, re-entered the saloon by the glass door, and swiftly and softly up the stairs, leaving Barletti in a condition of considerable perplexity.

He remained in the garden wandering up and down until the dinner-bell sounded. Then, as he was going into the house across the paved court-yard, a servant who had been sent to seek him, met him, and preceded him into the dining-saloon. It was a vast vaulted hall, whose dreariness was on no great a scale to be much mitigated by such French upholstery as had been hastily employed to decorate it for Sir John Gale's use.

The table was as big as the deck of a small yacht. It was lights abundantly set forth on a huge black walnut-wood side-board, and on the tall marble mantle-piece, and on the table itself—enough to summon with hospitable alacrity, as though they were conscious of their inability to illuminate the vague dimness of the space. There was a little island of light in the centre of the table-cloth, but it seemed only to enhance the surrounding gloom.

Barletti bowed profoundly, and saluted Veronica as though to then saw her for the first time that evening.

"Good-evening, prince," said she, with a careless, haughty bend of the head.

In her rich evening dress, and with her composed, disdainful grace, she seemed a very different woman from her who had spoken to him in the loggia half an hour ago.

A cover was laid for Sir John in his accustomed place. Barletti observed it, and stood for a moment after Veronica was seated, as though waiting for some one. "And Gale?" he said, interrogatively.

"Oh, Sir John will not dine with us. He felt a little tired with the heat this afternoon. We shall find him after dinner in the solitino. Sit down, prince."

"You permit? I am not de trop?"

"No, no, no. I am in the midst of a human face. This hall is the gloomiest, dreariest place! I have never quite got over an idea that it is haunted, and I find myself sometimes making out mysterious shapes in the dark corners. One evening in the summer, when the windows were wide open, a great bat flew in, and almost brushed my face! Ugh!"

They ate their dinner under Paul's grave but passible eyes, and with Sir John's empty chair between them.

"My master is not really indisposed, friend, eh?" asked the prince of Paul, as the latter was serving him with wine.

Sir John mixed his usual siesta, and was tired, but in quite well now, Signor Principe."

"Ah, bravo! It has been a devil of a summer. And the heat seems as if it would never leave off any more."

The dinner seemed to be spun out to an intolerable length. Barletti was a man of large appetite, and ate on steadily. Veronica ate but little; but she drank off three glasses of Champagne, whereof Barletti observed that it was the most acetic temperance of his own countrywomen in the matter of wine, marveled considerably. He could not help wondering that she did not appear to be really thoughtful and anxious, talking every now and then into fits of musing. And at this, reflecting how much of a fool as soon as Sir John is in the solotino let me know."

The other servants were away, leaving Antano to hand round the dishes and wine, which, in his zeal, and the elation of being left to his own devices free from Paul's supervision, he did with feverish energy, and a clatter that was due to his service by desiring him to go and stand still and not to move.

The dining-hall, like all the suit of rooms on the west side of the house, had a door communicating with the loggia outside. Barletti marked Barletti finish his wine at his leisure, and rose from her chair, saying that she would go and look in the solotino until Sir John should be ready to receive them.

A request to be permitted to accompany her was on Barletti's lips; but he checked it at the light, and went out alone, pacing slowly and regularly up and down under the stone arcades. The night was dark, and a storm was evidently brewing over the Arno. Veronica lifted the gauze upper tunic of her dress, and wrapped her shoulders and arms in it, as she walked solitarily, the feeling of intense loneliness came upon her, such as she had never experienced in her life.

Darkness, in the dusky room looked in at the lighted hall each time she passed the glass door. She saw the brightness of the table, glittering with glass and silver, and crowned with flowers. She saw Barletti seated there. His face was toward the window. The light fell on his bald forehead and also on the dark moustache and tuft of his pale skin. He looked like a portrait by Vandyck. She regarded all this with an inexplicable sensation of repugnance. It was almost as her that she was looking on the room and on the man for the first time. It seemed to her that she had in no way thing to do with either. She could no longer see her out there in the darkness, and looking on from the most familiar face, being one's self unseen, and the most familiar aspect.

The fact of being shut out there alone in the darkness, and of looking in upon the lighted rooms, produced in her a sense of complete isolation—loneliness—such as she had never felt. What did her existence matter to any one? If she could at that moment transport herself to Sydney-in-the-Wold, and look in through those windows, she would see no void that her absence had made. It would all be going on much as usual. Her father would be sitting in his chair—they must have fires now in the evening—and Maud would be reading too, or perhaps playing with the old piano, which was always out of tune. Flew was there, prosing on in his mild, monotonous voice. And outside the wide flats would be looming, and the wind would roar over Jack's farm the sheep and the white cattle would clamor, dotted about the pastures fast asleep. She could fancy it all. She knew it all. She must feel revisiting unperceived the haunts of her body.

The idea of death, thus conjured up, made her shiver, and nervously walk faster. How lonely she felt! How lonely—how lonely!

Veronica had never in her life comprehended what was meant by a "pleasing melancholy." Sadness of any kind was utterly distasteful to her, and aroused either a species of impatient resentment or a heedless abandonment of herself to despair, which had some anger in it too.

All at once the windows of the solotino threw out rays of brightness into the night. Sir John must be there. Barletti was through the interstices of the wooden Venetian blinds. She could not look into the solottino as she could into the dining-hall, where the shutters were left open. She felt a sudden yearning for light, and shelter, and companionship. It was too intolerable being out there alone with her own thoughts in the darkness.

She went into the house through the dining-room, where Barletti was still sitting at the table. He had drunk scarcely any wine since Veronica left him; but, to kill the time, he had eaten nearly the whole contents of a large glass dish of strawberries, and was contemplating that occupation pall on him when she reappeared.

Ansano stood sentinel in the back-ground. He had not found the half hour a pleasant one either. If he might have been permitted to distinguish himself by handing to the signor principe every dish and plate in regular sequence, he would have been content; for Ansano, like the rest of the servants, was little more than a mere nurse, and the delighted pride he felt in such professional promotion as was implied in being trusted to do any service unwatched by Paul, were still the sweets of novelty. But to stand there at the side-board, still and silent, while the other servants were supping socially together, was a terrible trial.

Veronica walked at once through the dining-hall to the solotino. Barletti followed her, but Sir John was lying on a sofa. A lamp stood on a small table near his head, but it was so shaded as to throw the light on the face, although it illuminated the gay flowered dressing-gown he wore, and his white, wrinkled hands.

"Here is Sir John, my friend Barletti," said Veronica, seating herself on a low chair near the sofa. "He wanted to go away when he heard that you were ill; but I made him stay."

"Oh!" said Sir John, in a kind of grunt.

The greeting was so exceptionally uncourteous even for Sir John Barletti drew up as though he were moved by a spring over which his will had no control, and said, "I regret my intrusion, Sir John. I regretted for a moment that monsieur le baron was seriously ill—"

"Who says so? I am not seriously ill" snarled Sir John.

"Of course not!" interposed Veronica, quickly. "I said so. If Sir John had been seriously ill, I would not have left him alone. But his indisposition was of the very slightest, and it is now quite gone."

Barletti, she thought, he must confess to being so indisposed that the presence of a stranger irked him, or he must ask Barletti to remain. But Sir John did not appear to observe one of several given courses of action was most pleasing to Sir John's state of temper at the moment, he habitually adopted the course as duty toward, or consideration for, others, were entirely powerless to restrain the passions or caprices of his monstrous egotism.

"Yes," he said, speaking, as he had spoken throughout, in a short, strange voice, and articulating indistinctly: "I am quite well. But I don't feel energetic by any means. I shall not ask you to stay to-night, prince; it would only bore you."

It was almost impossible to resist this hint, but Barletti managed to do so. He was a man whom so plainly begged him to remain, that he answered: "Now, my good Gale, I won't hear that. Bore—not at all. I shall stay and chat until your bedtime. Or, if you prefer it, we'll have our partie of piquet. Which shall it be?"

Sir John was surprised at this unwonted insistence. The man had had his dinner; why did he wish to stay? What he evidently did wish it was, however, no inducement to his host to yield.

"Frankly, my dear friend," said Sir John, making an odd grimace, as though he had tried to smile and failed, "I will to-night have neither chat nor piquet. Continue your journey! That is the charm of having an intimate friend. I know you won't be angry if I beg you to leave me to myself. Ah!" he added, as Veronica's eyes on Veronica, "to milaidi. That is myself; it's quite the same thing."

But in listening to Veronica he surprised a glance of intelligence passing from her eyes to Barletti. Sir John could not change the direction of his own gaze quickly enough to catch the answering look on the prince's face; his facial muscles appeared not to be under full command; but he saw an expression of irresolution and conflict in Barletti's whole bearing.

The prince rose and then seated himself again, and then again rose with more determination, and advanced to the side of the sofa, holding out his hand to Sir John, and said, in French: "Goodnight, then, caro Gale. Angry? No; of course I shall not be angry!" Then he bowed low to "milaidi," and said, in a tone of regret with interment, "I regret to be banished from our good Gale, milaidi; but I am sure he will be quite himself tomorrow. We need not—none of us need be uneasy about him."

"Uneasy!" echoed Sir John. "Que diable, Barletti, who is likely to be uneasy?"

And as he spoke he looked not at the prince, but at Veronica.

"Who, indeed?" said Veronica, returning Barletti's parting salutation with the stateliest of bows. She was reassured at heart. For she argued thus: If Barletti had detected in her any thing serious the matter he would not have been restrained by any fear of Sir John from giving me a hint of it by word or look."

And the first faint dawn of a project rose dimly in her mind—a project of attaching and binding this man to her, so as to secure his assistance and protection if—if any thing should happen to Sir John. And, looking in the dawn of her project the prospect of that dread "something which might happen" showed a little less dreadful.

Meanwhile Sir John lay on the sofa watching her from under the shadow that covered his face, and thinking of the look he had surprised her giving Barletti. The look had put a new idea into his mind, a very unpleasant idea, not unpleasant merely because, if correct, it would argue some of the ideas he had hitherto entertained to have been wrong (though that contingency alone was disagreeable enough), but because, also, it would have the effect of making him uneasy in the future.

CHAPTER VII.

WHAT THEY SAID AT THE CLUB.

PAUL had such a terrible time of it that night in undressing Sir John and getting him to bed, that when he was alone in his own little room—within easy reach of his master's, and communicating with it by means of a large bell hanging at the head of his bed—he began to go over some calculations in his mind, with the half-formed intention of returning from the barber's service with a thousand or so fewer francs than the sum he had determined on as the limit of his savings.

Sleep brought counsel to Paul, however, and he arose in the morning prepared to go through the term of service he had set himself. But whether sleep had brought counsel to Sir John or not, it is certain that he woke in a humor worse, if possible, than that in which he had gone to bed.

He did not feel so much recovered from the indisposition of yesterday as he had expected to feel. He was extremely feeble, except in temper; there he was as vigorous and fierce-tongued as a healthy tiger with a fine appetite and nothing to eat.

Paul attended on him silent and watchful.

At length he said, with grave deliberation: "You must have a physician, Sir John."

The reply was a volley of oaths, so fiercely uttered that they left the baronet panting and glaring breathlessly from his pillow.

"Excuse me, Monsieur, Sir John," said Paul, with a shade more gravity, but otherwise quite unmoved, "but you must have a physician. You are a little feverish. It is nothing. A little draught will make you quite strong soon for your journey."

"A little draught," muttered Sir John, trying to mimic Paul's accent. "A little devil!"

In this country fevers go quick. Excuse the liberty, Sir John. If you allow, I will go for a physician myself."

The man's steady persistence had some effect on his master. Sir John moved his head restlessly and said, "Go? Where will you go? You don't know any of the doctors here, curse them!"

"There is a good and esteemed English physician, Sir John, here."

"Damn English physician! You're an infernal idiot, do you think I want any of them, jabbering and boasting, and drinking in the pyx that they have been attending Sir John Gale? Do you think I want a pack of British fools rushing up here to see me die?"

"Bene, bene," said Paul. In his secret mind he had but a poor opinion of the English faculty, whose repute was on the subject of fevers especially, appeared to him to be terribly limited. "Beuissimo! Better so, Sir John. I will fetch the most excellent medico. He can come with you immediately—Dr. Maffei. He is well known, Sir John."

"I will known, you fool!"

"Well known among the Italians, Sir John," added Paul, astutely, "The signori Inglesi mostly employ their own physicians."

"Whatever he may say, I shall start for Naples on the nineteenth: remember that!"

In this way Sir John gave a tacit consent to the visit of the Italian doctor.

When that gentleman arrived at Villa Chiari he declared that there was no fever about Sir John. Paul had been mistaken there. But he let slip another ugly word, which Paul, who was present during the whole interview (acting as interpreter occasionally, for Sir John's Italian and the doctor's French sometimes came to a call de race, out of which they had to extricate them), smothered up as well as he could, in the hope that it might not reach Sir John's ears.

"I got a fill from my horse last year and was badly hurt, and had a long illness in consequence," said Sir John, feeling that the phenomenon of his malady and temporary incompetence as himself being reduced to a condition of great weakness needed some explanation: "I think it should be more than three months at the time. That's the only way I can account for being in such a state of a state."

"Ah, yes. And then, you see, you are getting old, and you have probably been rather intemperate in your youth," answered Dr. Maffei, with disconcerting sincerity.

Sir John began to think he had been wrong in not having an English physician, if he must have any at all.

Dr. Maffei prescribed some medicine, and a tonic, but nothing else.

"I am going to Naples on the nineteenth," said Sir John, brusquely.

"I do not advise it. I do not think I should advise your making a journey so soon."

"I shall not trouble you, Sir, for your opinion on that point. I am going on that day. Good-morning."

The wild-beast temper had leaped out and shown its fangs so suddenly that the doctor's brown smooth-shaven face remained for a few seconds absolutely blank with amazement. Then he bowed silently; and, with a certain dignity, despite his short, stubby figure and ungraceful gait, walked out of the room.

An unwonted air of a livelier and more agreeable nature overspread his countenance when, driving down the hill in his fiacre, he inspected the bank-note which Paul had handed to him in gin envelope. Its amount was more than ten times what he would have considered a sufficient fee from any of his compatriots—it was, indeed, scandalously excessive. Sir John had some vaguely vindictive notion in his head that the beggarly Italian would repeat not having been more civil to a man who could afford to give such a fee. But he was wrong. The doctor was pondering upon the extraordinary and absurd contrasts of a universe in which such ridiculous a nation as the English was permitted to exist.

It would be difficult to decide whether or not the medicines sent by Dr. Maffei did the patient any good; the fact was, that Sir John did not get worse, and was able to keep his appointment of going to Naples on the nineteenth of October.

Between the day of his tête-à-tête dinner with Veronica and that date, Cesare de' Barletti had to undergo many buffetings of fortune. He was tossed backward and forward from sunshine to shade, by the selfish caprice of a little white hand —and those little white hands can strike hard sometimes. A man who has nothing to do from morning to night is glad of a habit which saves him the fatigue of deciding how he shall bestow himself at a given hour. He likes to say, "I must be with So-and-so this evening." It has a cheap air of duty. Thus more habit had rendered the Neapolitan princeling to be a regular visitor to the English baronet in the old days at Naples, when the latter was bound to his room by a fit of the gout.

The visits had been begun at the promptings of good-nature, combined with a desire to seem for a superior cuisine. Sir John, at that time, employed a very accomplished cook.

Then in the absence it must be admitted that curiosity had been the chief spur which at first induced the prince to undergo the fatigue of visiting behind a cab-horse, and sometimes of struggling up the steep road to Villa Chiari. He wanted to see the interior of the ménage, whose master and mistress seemed so ill-assorted, and very soon it began to appear to him a necessity of existence that he should pay his evening visit to the villa. He even found some entertainment in his game of piquet. An Italian is usually amazingly patient of boredom: or, to put it unconscious of it, which is pleasanter for himself. Barletti admired Veronica extremely. And her presence was a strong attraction to him. By-and-by it began to occur to him that it might be worth his while to pay his court to this beautiful woman, after a more serious fashion than he had at first contemplated. Sir John was failing. He might die and leave a rich widow, who would become a prey to needy fortune-hunters like the fine-lunters who would not have the same advantages to offer in exchange for wealth as could be found in absence with Cesare de' Barletti. Barletti! It would be a pity to see her sacrificed to such men as he had seen and known engaged in the chase after a wife with money. He found no definite plan, but suffered himself to drift on lazily, with just so much intention as sufficed to modify his behavior in many trifling respects. But after the incident of Sir John's indisposition there arose a different feeling in his breast toward her.

Barletti really had a fund of kindliness in him. He was becoming fond—with a fondness true and more tender than that implied by the fine contrast of diamonds on a satin skin—of this girl, so young, so beautiful, and so lonely. From the moment when she had agreed to him in some sort for advice and support, a flow of manhood had stirred in him on her behalf. He would have even made some kind of active sacrifice for her. So, despite Sir John's irritability and insolence, Barletti continued his visits securing his cab-horse toil up the hill overhanging the Ema, evening after evening.

And Sir John Gale did not scruple to make use of Barletti. He would give him little commissions to execute in the city, and expected him to refer to the news of the day and retail the gossip of the hour for his amusement.

One afternoon, in search of this latter commodity, Barletti was standing at the door of the club with a knot of others.

"I remember him at Rome," said a portly man with chin whiskers, continuing a desultory conversation with Barletti. "A red-haired man who hunted. Quite the type of an Englishman."

"That is because you all make it a point of it," lingual, spindle-legged young nobleman with a retreating chin. "I believe there are as many red-haired people in Italy as in England."

The spindle-legged young nobleman had married an English wife, and had been in England, and spoke with authority.

"No, no, it's the Irish that have red hair!" exclaimed a third. "Or the Scotch. I forget which."

"Zitto!" whispered the first portly speaker, as a tall old gentleman appeared in the door-way, "the captain won't hear you assert that the Irish have red hair!"

The captain was a half-pay officer, who played an uncommonly good game at billiards. He was understood to live chiefly by his wits; but he had the entrée to several distinguished families who clung—theoretically, for a more practical clinging would have involved an smothu of inconvenience which it would have been more Quixotism to encounter—to the old regime; he was a zealous Roman Catholic, and, it is scarcely necessary to add, was descended from one of the ancient kings of Ireland!

"Who has red hair?" asked the captain, in Italian flavored with a rich Kerry brogue.

"Barletti! Who is he?" said the captain, affably. He had no constitutional prejudice against rich fellows.

"Baron Gale."

"Baron what? I never heard the title."

"He is an English baron—Sir John Gale. I knew him in Naples."

"Oh, a baronet! Per Bacco!" exclaimed the captain, pronouncing the name of the beneficent deity precisely like the last syllable of "tobacco," with a very sharp a. "It isn't Tallis Gale, is it?"

"No, no; John; Sir John Gale."

"Ay, ay, that is the baptismal name. But he took the name of Gale when he came into a fortune, being richer than enough already, as he always the way. He's a thin, high-shouldered man, with sandy hair and black eyes?"

"Gia."

"And has a handsome wife?"

"Bellissima!"

"That's the man!" cried the captain, rolling the end of his cigar between his lips relishingly. "I knew him in Ireland in the year '49. My lady is a great beauty—sera, bella, if being mad be quite passable by this time—and married him for his money."

"Passèe!" echoed Barletti, on whom that word alone, of all that the captain had uttered, had made an impression. "Dimmi! What do you call 'passee?' She is as fresh as a Hebe, and young enough to be his daughter!"

"Good-by, prince," said Veronica, giving him her hand. It was the first time she had ever done so; and Barletti's heart beat suddenly faster as he clasped her fingers for a moment in his own.

"We shall see you in the winter?" added Veronica.

"I hope I shall be able to get away. I came here, thinking I should stay perhaps a fortnight, on some business of my father's. My father was the elder brother, and the head of the family), "and my affairs unexpectedly have kept me broiling in Florence throughout the whole summer. I'm in earnest. I do not regret my detention," he added, in a little awkwardly, as he bowed once more to "miladi."

Then he went away through the garden, past the little fountain, and out at the side gates. There his fiacre was awaiting him. But he told the man to drive on slowly, and stay for him at the foot of the hill. And after ascending for a few minutes gazing at the old house, white in the moonlight, black in the shadow, he absolutely checked those rising raptures of a man on the top of the hill, under the autumn sky spangled with stars: walked through the thick, soft dust, which already covered his varnished boots with a lymb-colored coating. And even when he reached the foot of the descent he had not yet exhausted his self-communings, and he allowed the fiacre to sit still in a carriage. He paid the coachman and dismissed him, and tramped home through the streets on foot.

All which might have proved to a discerning eye that Cesare del Principi Barletti was feeling powerful and unwonted emotion.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

BENAVAVA has put on its holiday attire. Things new, beautiful, and wonderful peep out from the shop windows, attracting crowds of curious gazers, and enticing out from their magic portfolios whatever money vanishers mysteriously like—we pause for a comparison—as the conjurer does buckwheat cakes from Tom's breakfast-plate; and Tom's pockets, when they come home from school to spend the holidays. If you are a benevolent person, and have been much appealed to by your pocket-book, there is no time in all the year so fine a pretext for disposing of them. Too busy only to take your money in little attics, and not at Fourteenth Street; no—we are forgetting how rapid it has been the privilege of the present to meet Jupiter somewhere about Twenty-fifth Street, and walk down until you are tired out. When you stop the pocketbook will be lightened, the greenhouse will glow. If, however, you have little or no money to spare, do not fancy that nothing is left you but envying the fortune the beautiful things displayed, and help your boy and girl to have a good time in no dodge. Leave your money at home if you like, but let the wish and sympathy be one may be experienced without the wish or expectation of possessing. With God's sunshine we manage to buy every thing—they would not be children otherwise; but they will learn some valuable lessons in a walk with you on the holidays without purchasing.

Even a superficial survey of the rare curiosities, and the unique objects of every shape and size, for every place and purpose imaginable, with which shops are now filled, would lead one to fancy that ten thousand stores had been opened for dear life on the morn of the 25th of December, 1868, inventing and contriving what articles of comfort, luxury, and beauty could possibly be thought of. Whole columns would not suffice to enumerate a thousandth part in detail. And who are the favored ones of all the goods that are stickered with Christmas brings to light? Where are they? And how many make a single family happy?

Indiana gets up lively stories of real life. For example: a widow living near New Albany held property of her husband's, which she knew was her own without restrictions while she remained single, but which she could not dispose of if she married again. Shortly she married, and died intestate in 1864 and she had lost control of her property. So she and her second lord agreed to quarrel every day in the presence of witnesses; then the husband applied for a divorce, and "incompatibility" was easily proved. The court granted the divorce. An hour was sufficient for the business-like lady to transfer the property to the husband from whom she had just been divorced; and in another half hour the divorced couple were remarried in legal manner.

The boys and girls who have enjoyed so many happy hours in reading the adventures of Robinson Crusoe will be delighted to learn that a monument is to be erected over the grave of the author, Daniel Defoe, by six-penny contributions from children.

Admirers of Doré, and any who have a fancy for graphic, though horrible, delineations of the infernal regions, have still the opportunity of seeing Dante and Virgil realizing Doré's fancies from realms, with all the surrounding horrors. We think we should prefer reading the illustrations in July rather than in December; but if one feels chilly, he can turn to "Jephtha's Daughter," "Jonas," or some of Doré's illustrated works, which are on exhibition at the Doré Art Union.

There is still another royal sufferess. The Empress of the French is said to be writing a history of her Eastern tour. The Queen of Spain was reported a short time ago to be writing her autobiography; and the Queen of England has long since established her reputation in the literary world.

The Court Journal states that the favorite tragedienne, Miss Kate Terry, who for the past five years been largely interested as a capitalist in silk manufactures. She is part owner of one of the finest mills in New Jersey, employing a large number of workmen, and doing a flourishing trade, and may be seen at the factory, dressed like a lady, where she has an experiment, to the development of this particular branch of industry.

The Empress Eugénie, as a testimony of her appreciation of the Suez Canal and its originator, has presented M. De Lesseps with a magnificent vase, which is called "La Coupe de Suez."

Nemoinsnopyth is the name applied to a new machine which has been put in operation on a stand-of-arr at Naples. The inventor of this engine is chief machinist of the Royal Italian Navy. By its help the damage which a vessel has undergone can be ascertained, as well as its different movements. With this machine a commander in his cabin can watch the movements of his ship, and, after a battle, all its manœuvring can be ascertained. Very curious, that!

Mrs. Lincoln, the celebrated dressmaker, has just died of heart-disease, at the advanced age of eighty. The Pope sent his apostolic benediction to the dying lady. His remains are to be interred in a vault in the Church of St. Bernard.

A child's faith in religious teachings is touchingly illustrated by a little letter which recently appeared in the Washington Post-office. The letter read as follows:

"To God who lives in heaven:

"DEAR GOD: O, how I wish I could see you and tell you what I want. Mrs. Bell wants you to send her some clothes to wear to sundy school wont you by me some and I will pay you when I get money for the baby. Good by.

"A LITTLE BEGGAR BOY TOMMY."

Not unlike the above, in spirit, was the postscript added by a little three-year-old to his evening prayer: "And, O Lord! please give me a new pair of boots—when you get ready."

What a jubilee there must be among the poor old horses about the city of Brooklyn! The Rev. Joseph Cook, well-known old rancher in this city has bequeathed $100,000 his entire fortune, to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

There is a smart girl in St. John, New Brunswick, who takes care of the sole protector of any timid young man—if he can get her. Not long ago a gentleman was escorting our heroine from church one Sunday evening, when he was disturbed by a terrific shriek. He shocks, when approaching the cradle, were sometimes strong enough to knock one down! At the first moment of the alarm the gentleman felt the nerves move intense, and even continued for several moments to move on. But he soon recovered his presence of mind, cut pale, and it is not known of what disease. But if this strange story is true, scientific men have something to think about and study. The friends would not suffer the body to be examined.

One of the most remarkable of marriage announcements we have made out long ago was that of a parish church in a Cornish village, in the following terms: "By lawful publishments of banns, preceding I entered into an engagement of marriage with a gentlewoman of suitable age, a widow, and children, and have this day fulfilled the same, and instantly take the place of that beloved wife lying in the churchyard yonder."

A recent visitor to Chicago writes: "I went to hear Dr. — preach and pray Sunday afternoon. He prayed that the Lord would remove from the hearts of all intemperance, Sabbath-breaking, licentiousness, fraud, profanity, cheating, and every form of vice; and then I left the church. I left the church because I was thinking what would be left in Chicago."

We are happy to see that some of the newspapers regard the example of the Duke of Alexandria, aged eleven, who has knitted forty-eight pairs of stockings during the past year, as one which should be avoided, unless there is a stern necessity for such plodding industry. The health and future usefulness of any young child must depend on a variety of outdoor air and exercise, and some time for indoor occupation, even more important, in these days, than knitting stockings by hand.

A respectable looking man recently entered a Utica restaurant, and ordered an elaborate dinner, including wine. Finally, lighting a cigar which he had ordered, he sauntered up to the desk, and said to the proprietor: "Very fine dinner, landlord; very fine; it is me; I haven't got a cent."

"But I don't know you," said the proprietor, indignantly.

"Of course you don't. If you had, you wouldn't let me have the dinner."

"Pay me for the dinner, I say!"

And I say I won't."

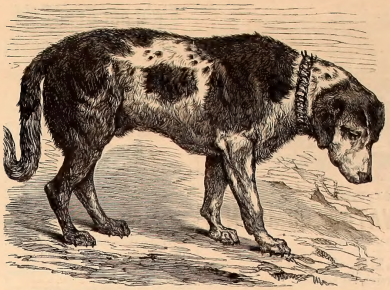
"I'll see about that," said the proprietor, who snatched a revolver out of a drawer, leaped over the counter, and collared the man, exclaiming, as he pointed it at his head, "Now see if you'll get away with that dinner without paying for it, you scoundrel!"

"What is that you hold in your hand?" said the impecunious customer, drawing back.

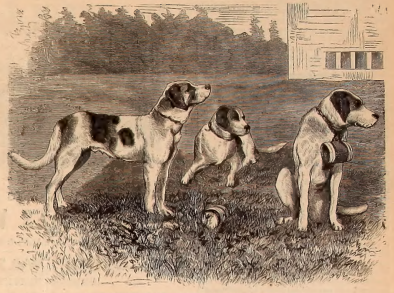
"That, Sir, is a revolver, Sir."

"Oh, that's all right, then. I didn't care a cent for a revolver; I thought it was a stomach-pump!"

THE NEW YORK STATE INEBRIATE ASYLUM, AT BINGHAMTON.—Drawn by C. E. H. Bonwill, New York.—[See Page 829.]



ST. BERNARD DOGS.—"OLD BARRY."—[SEE PAGE 822.]



ST. BERNARD DOGS.—"YOUNG BARRY."—[SEE PAGE 822.]

COVERED BY THE FLAG.

A STRIKING illustration of the power of a neutral flag during a civil war like that now raging in Cuba, is given by the artist on this page. A man captured under circumstances that laid him open to suspicion was tried and condemned by the Spanish authorities; but being an Englishman by birth and an American citizen by naturalization, the consuls of the two countries interposed, and declared that the authorities had no right to put him to death. Their remonstrance being disregarded, they accompanied the condemned man to the place of execution, and there suddenly threw over him the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack, and dared the authorities to put him to death. The menace had the desired effect, and the prisoner's life was spared.

FIRE IN PHILADELPHIA.

We give on this page a sketch of the burning of the Philadelphia Commercial Exchange, which occurred on the afternoon of the 7th inst. The fire was occasioned by the fall of a large chandelier, just as the building was lighted up, allowing an immense rush of gas, which took fire, and in a few minutes the whole structure was in flames. Nothing now remains of it except the walls and the lower story, which was arched with masonry, and was fire-proof. The building was erected on the site of the old PENN mansion, at a cost of $250,000, and was dedicated only last March.

THE INEBRIATE ASYLUM AT BINGHAMTON.

THIS beneficent institution, situated in the pleasant town of Binghamton, New York, was commenced more than ten years ago, but, owing to a combination of unfortunate circumstances, it has never been finished. The north wing was nearly completed when, a few years ago, it was fired by an incendiary and destroyed. A large body of workmen are now engaged in rebuilding it.

The structure, of which we give a series of illustrations on page 828, was commenced by private subscription; but the trustees were obliged to call on the State for aid, as the cost of construction largely exceeded the estimates and the means at their disposal. Up to the present time upward of $500,000 have been expended on the buildings and grounds. The site of the Asylum is on a sloping eminence, easy of access, and commanding magnificent views of the Susquehanna and Chenango valleys. Attached to the institution are 400 acres of land, 252 of which were given by the citizens of Binghamton, while the remainder was purchased by the trustees.

"FAVORITE."—[SEE PAGE 822.]

The building is in the castellated Gothic style of architecture. It is four stories in height. The length of the front is 365 feet, and the depth of the wings is 51 feet. It is built of stone, and handsomely finished inside with oiled oak. When completed it will accommodate 250 patients; the number at present under treatment is 80.

DR. ALBERT DAY, the Superintendent, took charge of the Asylum in the spring of 1867; and since that time 525 patients have been under treatment there, ten per cent. of whom were taken free of charge, the remainder paying a stated sum (about twenty dollars) per week for board and treatment. It is a melancholy fact that, with few exceptions, those now under treatment at the Asylum are educated gentlemen, representing the learned professions and the highest grades of commercial life. Most of the patients require medical treatment; but DR. DAY relies chiefly upon moral means for the permanent cure of inebriates, as, in his judgment, based upon long experience, the restoration of the power of the will alone can prevent a reformed inebriate from returning to the use of intoxicating drinks.

The name of this beneficent institution was unfortunately chosen, and tells against it in the minds of many persons who would be glad to avail themselves of its advantages. Strictly speaking, it is not an asylum, nor is it in any manner degrading to those who seek moral and physical restoration under its influences. It is rather a magnificent temperance hotel, where those who wish to free themselves from a terrible evil may put themselves under moral and religious influences of the most gentle and cheerful character, combined with elevating social advantages. As will be seen by our illustrations, which speak for themselves, ample facilities are afforded for intellectual entertainment and physical exercise. The reading-room is well supplied with books, magazines, and newspapers; and a literary society, composed of the inmates of the institution, meets regularly in a pleasant hall to listen to lectures and essays by some of the patients. Voluntary patients only are received; and DR. DAY justly congratulates himself on the success of the theory which claims for the inebriate a recoverable judgement, sensible affections, and moral responsibility; and which, refusing any longer to coerce him as a criminal or confine him as a lunatic, proposes by positive aid and comfort, and confiding appeals to his reason, his affections, and his aspirations, to restore him to himself, his family, and society. The patient voluntarily submits himself, for a period more or less protracted, according to the indications of his condition and the history of his case, to an isolation which the officers study to render agreeable, and the mildest restraint he will submit to; and, secondly, shows that he can be trusted, his temptations, of course, being jealously checked. Very few leave the Asylum, after undergoing a thorough course of treatment, ever relapse into their old habits—a fact that speaks volumes for its efficiency.

COVERED BY THE FLAG.

BURNING OF THE PHILADELPHIA COMMERCIAL EXCHANGE.—[SKETCHED BY A. TRAVERSE.]

A MILE of Cabinet Organs would seem a large number, yet if the instruments manufactured and sold by MASON & HAMLIN CO., during the PAST YEAR ALONE, were placed close together in a line, they would reach a distance of more than THREE MILES. Or if arranged three in a row would make a solid wall nine feet in height around the Boston Common.

We hardly know which is the more surprising, the demand now existing for these Organs, or the improvement made in them during the past few years: that which was formerly a weak and ineffective instrument, becoming possessed of such qualities of tone and variety of expression as to command the unequivocal praise of artists and connoisseurs, both in this country and Europe. It is not strange, therefore, that the Cabinet Organ is fast taking its place as the favorite parlor instrument among all classes of society.—[Boston Traveler.]

ONLY FORTY DOLLARS, which is all the Wilson Sewing Machine Company of Cleveland, Ohio, ask for one of their best Shuttle machines. —[Com.]

CHAPPED HANDS and FACE, SORE LIPS, &c., cured at once by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine Ice with Glycerine. It keeps the hands soft in the coldest weather. Sold by you get the genuine. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents.—BURNETT & CO., New York.

TAKE AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL to stop your Colds, Coughs, and Hoarseness. Affections, before they run into Consumption that you can not stop.—[Com.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR BLACK WORMS and PIMPLES on the FACE, see PERRY'S COMEDONE AND PIMPLE REMEDY. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold every where.

HITCHCOCK'S
HALF-DIME MUSIC.
172 NUMBERS NOW PUBLISHED.

LATEST MUSIC.

No. 168—Jerusalem the Golden.....By Walker
169—A Motto for Every Man.....Hobson
170—When my Sister Sleeps.....Linley
171—Romeo and Juliet.....Raymond
172—Bonnie Polka Mazurka.....Jones
173—Bells and Beats.....Pratt
174—Nobody's Lover the Way.....Millard
175—Good-by, John.....Pratt
176—The Gay Quakeress, three-part song.....Millard
177—The Monks of Old, three-part song.....Millard
178—The 4th of July, three-part song.....Millard
179—Breathe Soft and Low, three-part song.....Millard
180—Oh Give Us Love, three-part song.....Hilton
181—Tommy Noodle, comic.....Steele
182—The Fortune-Teller.....Pratt
183—Sports at Fire Island.....Raymond
184—Dorothy Fairy.....Waverley
185—Reuger's Schottische.....Lutz
186—Lucy Lockett.....Lady Dufferin
187—Will Thou Not Smile Upon Me?.....Millard
188—Wake, Darling, Wake.....Wilson

The above are sold by music, book, and newsdealers generally. Also sent, postpaid, by mail, on receipt of price, five cents each. Address

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
284 Fulton Street, New York.

SANTA CLAUS
At 98 Chambers St.

Toys, Fancy Goods, and HOLIDAY PRESENTS
For the Million. WM. A. HARWOOD.

A DOSE
for the stomach is absurd. It mixes with the food, and causes a fermentation in all parts of the system, and weakens every part. Stop it, and try, free of cost, WOOLCOTT'S PAIN EXPELLER, at 181 Chatham Square, N. Y. A pint sent, free of express charges, on receipt of $2, or a gallon for $6, delivered at depot.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS
AT THE FURNITURE STORE OF
G. L. & J. B. KELTY & CO.
651 BROADWAY, Opposite Bond St.
FANCY CHAIRS of every description.
Eserman's PATENT ROCKING CHAIRS, without rockers.
FLOWER and WINDOW STANDS, and Flowers.
Polished Brass Coal Vases, Woods, and Hardware.
Also, at the Curtain Store, 647 Broadway:
LACE CURTAINS, LAMBREQUINS, and all kinds of Curtain Materials and Trimmings.
TABLE and PIANO COVERS, &c.

A USEFUL HOLIDAY GIFT.
PRICE'S IMPROVED PISTON
FOUNTAIN PEN
Writes with one filling 12 hours. Call or send for Circular to JOHN S. PURDY, Manufacturer, Astor's Warehouse, 252 Broadway, N. Y.

WESTERN FARMS, City and Suburban Lots. W. J. H. BENEDICT, 186½ Dearborn St., Chicago.

53 Feet Front—Iron and Glass.

WORKS OF THE
UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,
(GILES, WALES, & CO.), MARION, N. J.

GILES, WALES, & CO.,
IMPORTERS, MANUFACTURERS, and JOBBERS,
SALESROOM OF THE
United States Watch Company,
13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.
Manufacturers of the AMERICAN Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders, BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The finer grades all having fine pairs Conical Pivots, Cap Jeweled, in Gold Settings, and accurately adjusted to Heat, Cold, and Position; and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Hair Springs: and for our late improvement in STEM-WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and SMOOTHNESS hitherto unattained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for taking three different times.

☞ Price-lists furnished the trade on application, enclosing business card. For sale by the trade generally.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
and GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

WATCH No. 1064.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me five months: its total variation from mean time being only one second per month. WILLARD DERBY.

Of Derby, Snow, & Preutiss, Jersey City, N. J.

WATCH No. 1124.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co.," manufactured by the United States Watch Co., has been carried by me seven months: its total variation from mean time being only six seconds. A. L. DENNIS, President of R. R. T. & T. Co.

WATCH No. 1251.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me four months: its total variation from mean time being only one second per month. CHARLES H. HOWARD, Of F. A. HASKELL, Cox, Hudson River R.R.

WATCH No. 1111.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me fifteen months: its total variation from mean time being only an average of two-thirds of a second per day.

R. F. PHELPS, Con. N. J. Central R. R.

WATCH No. 1057.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me since June, 1867: its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month. HENRY SMITH,

Treas. Panama R. R., 88 Wall St.

WATCH No. 12012.—bearing Trade-Mark, "United States Watch Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me five months: its total variation from mean time being only twelve seconds. GEO. LOVEJOY, Pass'gr Ag't Toledo, Wabash, & Western R. R.

WATCH No. 1259.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me six months: its total variation from mean time being only eight seconds per month. Have been traveling through different sections of the country, from New York to Galveston, Texas, and back, by steamer and railroad.

E. RICE, of Whitney & Rice, 179 Broadway, N. Y.

SUNBURY, PA., Feb. 26, 1869.

WATCH No. 1176.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me three months: its total variation from mean time being only five seconds per month. Has been

HENRY DE LANCEY, Engineer Phila. & Erie R. R.

WATCH No. 1103.—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me seven months: its total variation from mean time being only seven seconds in the entire time.

A. R. KING, 7 Park Place, N. Y.,
Vice-Pres. Electric Coal Spring Co.,
N. J. Car Spring and R. Co.

WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,
OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent C.O.D. to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.
☞ Call or send for Price-List.

DO NOT BE

CAUGHT
buying a CHRISTMAS PRESENT for your friends and children until you have seen the

Lozo Pendulum Board, which is the best PARLOR GAME BOARD ever invented, being only 9¼ feet long and 14 inches wide.

It is lined with the finest billiard cloth, and contains a combination of four popular and fascinating games, viz.:

BAGATELLE,	TEN PINS, and
POCKETS,	RING TOSS.

We invite every body to call at our salesroom and examine it. Price, if not satisfactory, write us some friend in New York asking them to call.

Send for a descriptive circular and price-list. It can be sent to any part of the United States before the Holidays.

NOVELTY GAME CO.,
14 MURRAY ST., New York.

THE SUEZ CANAL.—Its importance in commerce. Its history. A commercial point can best be appreciated by a reference to the FRANK-LIN GUIDE. 12, 78, and 99 inches in diameter.

H. B. NIMS & CO., Troy, N. Y.
Sold at 935 Broadway, New York.

Collegiate and Commercial Institute (General Bonnell's School), New Haven, Ct. Winter term begins Jan. 11.

Holiday Goods
OF REAL VALUE,
AT
UNION ADAMS & CO.

PATENT MERINO VESTS.
PATENT MERINO DRAWERS.
FINE MERINO VESTS.
FINE WOOL DRAWERS.
SCARLET CASHMERE VESTS.

CASHMERE AND CLOTH GLOVES.
CALF AND KID GLOVES.
KID AND DOGSKIN GLOVES.
CASTOR AND WOOL GLOVES.
KID AND CALF MITTENS.

BALMORAL STOCKINGS.
PATENT MERINO HOSIERY.
FINE WOOL STOCKINGS.
CALF AND KID HOSIERY.
CASHMERE STOCKINGS.

SHIRTS, COLLARS, CUFFS.
TIES, STOCKS, SCARFS.
SUSPENDERS, GARTERS.
ROBES DE CHAMBRE.
UMBRELLAS, CANES.

An Extensive and Superior Variety of Serviceable Goods at

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

No. 637 Broadway.

1870. THE NURSERY. 1870.
The best, cheapest, and most richly ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN. $1 00 a year, in advance. Sample number, 10 cents. Subscribe now, and get the number of 1869 FREE. Address
JOHN L. SHOREY, 12 Washington St., Boston.

RENEW!! RENEW!!!—Either HARPER'S WEEKLY, MONTHLY, or BAZAR, $4, and THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3, until the end of 1870, for $5. H. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

Eight per Cent. Gold
FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS
OF THE ISSUE OF
$1,500,000
BY THE
ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD CO.,

in denominations of $1000 and $500, bearing 8¼ per Cent. per annum Interest, payable in Gold on the 15th of February and August, in each year, in New York, London, or Frankfort-on-the-Main, at the holder's option, free of U. S. Taxes. The interest for six months on $1000 Bond is payable as follows:

In New York.....$40 Gold.
In London.....£8 4s. 4d.
In Frankfort-on-the-Main.100 Florins.

On a $600 Bond, one half these amounts, respectively.

These Bonds have thirty years to run from August 14, 1869, payable at maturity, in Gold, in the City of New York; are Coupon Bonds, but can be registered, or converted into Registered Bonds.

They are secured by a first and only mortgage on 111 miles of the Company's Road, from St. Joseph, Mo., to Marysville, Kansas, known as the Eastern Division of the Company's main line, which runs from St. Joseph to Fort Kearney, on the Union Pacific Road, including the Company's equipments, rolling stock now owned or hereafter possessed, rights of way, franchises, real estate, and personal property in Doniphan, Brown, Nemaha, and Marshall Counties, Kansas, now owned or which the Company may acquire by reason of the extension of their line to the City of Marysville.

This mortgage is executed to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company as Trustees. At the same time, the whole issue of $1,500,000 Bonds have been executed by the Railroad Company, placed in the custody of the Trustees, who have absolute possession, and can only issue them, or their proceeds, in accordance with the terms of the Mortgage Deed, which is upon a completed road, and then only at the rate of $12,000 per mile.

Bonds, to be valid, must be countersigned by the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company.

The rate per mile of a completed road, which is mortgaged to secure these Bonds at their par value, is $13,500, while the actual cost of construction and equipment is more than double this amount.

This line is now under the extension of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, with its connections North and East, and the St. Louis and St. Joseph Rail road, with its connections South and East. The line is intersecting at St. Joseph and connecting at once with the City of Denver and Denver City Railroad, running West, through Eastern Kansas, into the heart of Nebraska, where it connects with the Union Pacific Railroad at the City of Fort Kearney, and forms the shortest route known to California and the Pacific States.

The Company have already built 111 miles, of which nearly $2,000,000 is subscribed and paid up by local subscriptions, which amount has been and is being expended on the line. The Company have 150,000 acres of superior lands, immediately adjoining the line, which was a grant from the United States Government, the alternate sections of which are selling for $2 50 per acre, cash. At this low price, the Company have an asset of value in

Lands	$4,000,000
First Mortgage Bonds	1,500,000
Capital Stock	10,000,000
Total Resources	$15,500,000
Total Length of Road	271 Miles.

While the only debt against the Company is this issue of First Mortgage Bonds, amounting to $1,500,000—all that can be issued.

A large portion of the road West from St. Joseph is now in successful operation, showing earnings, per mile, sufficient to meet the interest liabilities on this issue.

A Branch Company is building a line from this road to the Kansas Pacific Road, thereby giving a direct route to Denver City.

We are authorized to offer these Eight per Cent First Mortgage Bonds at 97½ and accrued interest in currency, with the reserved right to advance the price without notice. Pamphlets, maps, and information furnished on application.

Bonds sent and packages received free of express charges, and marketable securities received without commission, to parties investing in these Bonds.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO.,
Commercial Agents,
54 Pine Street, New York.

TANNER & CO.,
Fiscal Agents,
49 Wall Street, New York.

Having had all the papers and documents relating to the loan examined by competent counsel and pronounced complete and sufficient, and having personally examined the same, which we find regular and perfect, and having had our own engineers examine the road and property, whose reports are satisfactory, we do, with the utmost confidence and satisfaction, recommend the EIGHT PER CENT. FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD BONDS OF THE ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY as A SAFE, SURE, AND PROFITABLE INVESTMENT, worthy the attention of capitalists, investors, and others.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO.
TANNER & CO.

S. W. GEERY,
IMPORTER,
Wholesale & Retail Dealer in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly L. & W. Geery, No. 119 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.

My stock comprises some of the Oldest Liquors in the country.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

Keep the Circulation Active.

A free and regular circulation of the blood is essential to health. It places the whole system in a state of active defense against all unwholesome influences, and is an especial safeguard against the inimical effect of sudden changes of temperature, and of damp and cold.

If proper attention were paid to this important fact, there would be by a great deal less than the sum-total of cases of stomach, bowel, and renal complaints, but also in the number of deaths by consumption and other pulmonary diseases.

At this period of the year, when the dividing line which separates a genial from an inclement season has just been passed, a course of

HOSTETTER'S

STOMACH BITTERS

will be found of invaluable service in improving the condition of the vital fluid and gently stimulating its flow. Fevers, rheumatism and colds, the consequence of fever, are the frequent effects of a chilly atmosphere upon a debilitated constitution. Diseases of the kidneys often proceed from the same source. How essential it is, therefore, for persons of feeble constitution to invigorate the solid organization and tone the movement of Winter. Fortified by warm clothing without, and within, the frail and delicate may brave with impunity an amount of severe weather and hardship which other circumstances, would prostrate them on a bed of sickness. Let them consider this and be wise in time.

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS

Two Delightful New Music Books
FOR HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
Piano-forte Gems.

A New Collection of the latest favorite NOCTURNES, WALTZES, POLKAS, MARCHES, SCHOTTISCHES, REDOWAS, FOUR-HAND PIECES, QUADRILLES, &c., just issued in one book complete.

THE WREATH OF GEMS.

A New Collection of the most popular SONGS, BALLADS, and DUETS of the day, with an accomp. for the Piano-forte. Price of each, Boards, $2 50; Cloth, $3 00; Cloth, Full Gilt, $4 00. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington St., Boston; 711 Broadway, New York.

Just Published: CHRISTMAS CAROLS, Old and New. Fourteen Carols from the German and English. 35 cents.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!
WITH A
Novelty Job Printing-Press.
The only Low-Priced Press ever invented that will do good printing. Printing can be done as well and neatly by us this press as on the best that prices can buy. The printing-offices where artificial power is not used, or for business men, clergymen, lawyers, country traders, and others who desire to do their own printing, it is entirely without a rival. Two Best Holiday Gift-Are Goods. Price of Presses—$15, $30, $50, and $100. Send for full descriptive illustrated circulars, with testimonials from all parts of the country, and specimens of printing and ruling being done on the press, and specimen sheets of types, borders, rules, &c., &c., to HENRY O. WOODS, Proprietor, 381 Federal Street, Boston, Mass.

CATARRH.
RELIEF AT ONCE—A PERFECT CURE!
NORTON'S NEW REMEDY FOR CATARRH
AND MODE OF TREATM NT
Is an improvement, and a perfection never before attained. It is a remedy of the aforesaid disease by the harmless liquids—they are painless, cleansing, deodorizing, soothing, and powerful curatives. Instant comfort follow from the first day's use, and a permanent cure in one course of time. It penetrates through the absorbents to the very seat of the disease—breaks it up at its formation heads—removes all the wretched symptoms, such as pain in the temples, noises in the head, obstruction of the nasal passages, offensive discharges from the nostrils, and dropping of mucus into the throat, "hawking and spitting," sneezing, loss of taste of memory, dimness of vision, and restores the sense of taste and smell. A literally agitating and startling, but sense malady in all its forms forever, and cures the most hopeless cases. Send a 3-cent stamp to Pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, office 11 Ann St., N. Y.

NEWMAN & CAPRON'S
Establishment for the sale of
HOUSE FURNISHING
Goods and Plated Ware, in great variety, is still located at
1172 Broadway, cor. 28th Street.
Also, Builders' Hardware, Locks, Electro-Bronzed and Plated Goods of their own manufacture. All household articles requiring Replating done on short notice. They are also prepared to contract for Bell Work and Speaking Tubes in Hotels and Private Dwellings.

A GREAT OFFER.
HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of One Hundred Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for Cash during the Holidays, or will take from $5 to $25 monthly until paid for. Rent to let, and rent money applied if purchased. New 7-Octave Pianos for $178 and upward; New Organs for $48 and upward, for cash.

$1 00. THE $1 00.
HOUSEHOLD.
A PRACTICAL JOURNAL, especially devoted to the interests of the AMERICAN HOUSEWIFE.
Containing
Articles, by Experienced Housekeepers, upon all matters pertaining to Home Life and Domestic Economy.
This popular MONTHLY has recently been enlarged to twenty-four pages, quarto size, and no pains will be spared to make it the BEST FAMILY JOURNAL IN THE COUNTRY.
Its departments include the Veranda, the Drawing-Room, the Dressing-Room, the Library, the Conservatory, the Nursery, the Dispensary, the Kitchen, the Sewing-Room, and the Round Table, with stories and suggestions appropriate to each.
ONE DOLLAR PER YEAR.
Send Stamp for Specimen Copy.
Address GEO. E. CROWELL,
Brattleboro, Vt.

MUSIC for HOLIDAY GIFTS.—Boosey's $1 Standard Piano-forte and Vocal Works, elegantly bound, suitable for presentation. Beethoven's Sonatas, complete, $8; Mozart's Sonatas, complete, $7; The Operatic Album, containing 100 gems from the Favorite Operas, $3; Dressler's Dance Music Book, $3; Christmas Edition of the Messiah, $2; Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words, complete, $2; Moquin's Miscellanea and Valses, complete, $2 each; Schumann's Album for the Young, $1 25; Ball Room Music-Book (16 Dances), $2; The Old Songs of Ireland (99 Songs), $2; Old German Melodies, $2; Old Scotch Melodies, $2; Book (56 Songs), $2; Verdi Album (25 of Verdi's best Songs), $2; Bellini Album (20 of Bellini's best), $2; Standard Song-Book (50 best Songs ever written), $2; English Song-Book, 50 new Songs, $2. Complete Operas, Oratorios, and large collections of Vocal and Piano-forte Music, by Mozart, Haydn, Handel, Jast ready, free to any address, Boosey & Co.'s CATALOGUE of music and musical works, in full alert of musicsize form. BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N. Y.

"A BLAZE of BEAUTY."—1870.
THE JANUARY NUMBER of the PICTORIAL PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL appears in bright array. A new form, new types, numerous rich illustrations, with and and sensible reading-matter, render this the best ever issued.
This favorite JOURNAL has now reached its 50th vol., and appears in the most attractive dress. We think it will prove even more popular than ever before. Only $2 a year. 30 cents in No. Now is the time to have it. Now is the time to subscribe for 1870.
Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS!—OUR NEW
PICTORIAL FAMILY BIBLE
THE MOST POPULAR AND PROFITABLE OF ALL BOOKS.
Contains more than 1000 large & authentic Illustrations, 50,000 Questions & Answers for the Profitable Reading of Scripture, Concordance, Bible Dictionary, &c., a beautiful Family Record and Family Album, &c.
The best selling Bible in America.
Easily sold by cells from three to five per day. Outfits pronounce it the best of all Family Bibles. Several new agents sold 6 to 8 per day. Send for circular and full particulars, address JOHN E. POTTER & CO., 614 and 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia. ☞ Publishers of over 200 styles of Bibles.
Send for descriptive catalogue.

THE DOLLAR
Sun.
CHAS. A. DANA, Editor.
The cheapest, smartest, and best New York newspaper. Everybody likes it. Price reduced to 5 cts. per copy, or $1 per month. Sent by mail, postage free. ALL THE NEWS in the DAILY SUN, and all the Agricultural, Literary, and Fruit Growers' Club, and a complete story in every Weekly and Sunday Sun. Clubs for Weekly and Sunday plants and wives to every subscriber! Inducements to canvassers! Specimens, Terms, Premium Lists, &c., sent free. Morning Machines, Rochester, N. Y. Don't send for a sample of the premiums. Specimens and lists free. Send a Dollar and try it.
I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher Sun, New York.

"It is a most valuable paper."
This testimony is given by Horace Greeley of the New York State Agricultural Society, in favor of the
NEW ENGLAND FARMER.
Give us a trial, and you will be likely to concur in the opinion.
Terms: Weekly, $2 50; Monthly, $1 50, per year.
Send stamp for specimen copy.
R. P. EATON & CO., Boston Mass.

1870.—THE NURSERY, the best, cheapest, and most richly ILLUSTRATED, SEVENTEENTH MAGAZINE for Children. Only $1 a year, in advance. Sample number, 10 cents. Subscribe now, and get the back numbers free. Address JOHN L. SHOREY, 13 Washington St., Boston.

"YOU CAN DO NO BETTER."
SO SAYS THE
NEW YORK OBSERVER.
$3 50 PER ANNUM.
SAMPLE COPIES FREE.
SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR., & CO.,
37 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

A HANDSOME FULL-GILT Photograph Album, holding 50 full-size pictures, mailed, postpaid, for 50 cts.; 6 for $2; 12 for $3. Circulars free. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N. Y.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED FOR
PRIEST and NUN.
Apply at once to CRITTENDEN & McKINNEY, 1304 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

LAME HORSES.—Contracted feet permanently cured. Corns, Spring Knees, Tumors, and all diseases arising from contraction. Every horse-owner should know this secret. $25,000 paid by the War Dept. Used with great success for more than five years. Recommended and practiced by the most eminent Farriers in the United States. Send for circular. R. B. YOUATT, Drawer 256, Buffalo, N. Y.

AGENTS can make $200 per month by selling our Sewing Machine. Send for circulars.
RICHMOND & HOSTER, Seneca Falls, N. Y.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
ARE NOW OFFERING
A MAGNIFICENT ASSORTMENT OF India Camel's-Hair Shawls,
LONG AND SQUARE,
SCARFS, NECKTIES, &c.,
AT PRICES LOWER THAN SIMILAR QUALITIES WERE SOLD PREVIOUS TO THE SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.
BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., and 10TH ST.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
WILL OFFER,
During the remainder of this month,
EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS
IN ALL THE DEPARTMENTS OF THEIR RETAIL ESTABLISHMENT,
The prices of which have had the personal supervision of our
MR. STEWART, and they will, on examination,
BE FOUND TO OFFER UNUSUAL ATTRACTIONS TO PURCHASERS.
BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., and 10TH ST.

VICK'S
FLORAL GUIDE FOR 1870.
THE FIRST EDITION OF OVE HUNDRED AND TWENTY THOUSAND copies of Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide is published, and ready to send out. It is elegantly printed on fine tinted paper, with about 200 fine wood Engravings of Flowers and Vegetables, and a beautiful Colored Plate—consisting of seven varieties of Phlox Drummondii, making a fine
BOUQUET OF PHLOXES.
It is the most beautiful as well as the most instructive Floral Guide published, giving plain and thorough directions for the CULTURE OF FLOWERS AND VEGETABLES.
The Floral Guide is published for the benefit of my customers, to whom it is sent free without application, but will be forwarded to all who apply to me, for TEN CENTS, which is not half the cost.
Address JAMES VICK,
Rochester, N. Y.

FRENCH CLOCKS,
BRONZES,
FANCY GOODS,
MUSICAL BOXES, FANS,
Opera Glasses,
FINE WATCHES AND JEWELRY,
PARIS AND VIENNA
NOVELTIES,
WEDDING PRESENTS.

Alex. M. Hays & Co.,
No. 23 Maiden Lane, New York,
The above goods comprise one of the largest varieties to be found in the City, combined with the Low Prices.
☞ Sign of Gold Telegraph. ☜

Carbolic Salve
Prepared with Carbolic Acid, which is used in Hospitals and Lazarettos by Physicians of most eminent standing every where. Possesses the most remarkable healing properties ever discovered. 25 cts, per Box. John F. Henry, Proprietor, 5 College Place, N. Y.

HENKLE'S KNITTING MACHINE
For Family use—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking FREE. Address HENKLE'S KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

PERFUMERY,
FLAVORING EXTRACTS, and TOILET SOAPS.
FOR SALE BY ALL GROCERS.
N. Y. Office: 335 Broadway, Room 18.

OPIUM EATERS.—The most hopeless cases cured. Send for a Circular. Address WM. F. FARISH & CO., Augusta, Ga.

CURL YOUR HAIR!
A BOTTLE of MAGNETIC CURLIQUE sent FREE. A few applications will produce curls on the THINNEST APPETITION. Address, with Stamp,
PROF. BYRON, Carbondale, Ohio.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.
☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, his Life and Teachings." &c. Beautifully Illustrated from Designs by Doré, Delacroix, Durham, and Parsons. Elegantly printed on tinted paper. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $3 50.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 220 elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $3 00.

DU CHAILLU'S THREE JUVENILE WORKS. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 75 each.
LOST IN THE FOREST.
WILD LIFE UNDER THE EQUATOR.
STORIES OF THE COUNTRY.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Living Wonders," "The Tropical Worlds," and "The Tropical World." With Additional Chapters and 160 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 75.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By JAMES GREENWOOD, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 17 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 882 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing, Barritt, and others, from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1044 pages, 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Morocco, $9 00; Full Morocco, $10 00.

MISS MULOCK'S FAIRY BOOK. The Best Popular Fairy Stories Selected and Rendered anew. Engravings. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
TERMS FOR 1870.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year, together, for only $10 00; or any two for $7 00.
The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly, semi-annually, or the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.
The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions will commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is intended to begin with the Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.
The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the first Number issued after the receipt of order.
In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Wrapper, $250 per Page; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Outside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Agate Line; Outside Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.
Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
With ease of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much labor and money. Every one desiring full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., can send for a pamphlet. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. Address JAMES RUSSELL & SONS, Exeter, N. H.

THE Novelty Job Printing-Presses, for Printers, Merchants, & Amateurs. Prices, $15, $30, & $50. Send for descriptive circulars. C. C. THOMPSON, Ithaca, N. Y.

GOLD! GOLD!—My golden Compound will GO force the beard to grow on the smoothest face in 3 days. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Sent free for 50 cents a package. Address
CALVIN BRADLEY, Boston, Illinois.

Erysipelas, Salt-Rheum, Piles, and all diseases arising from impure blood, are cured by using the
SHELDON SPRING WATER.
Book of thirty pages, with certificates, sent free. Address J. C. SHELDON & CO., Chicago, Illinois.

HORRIBLE!—I suffered with CATARRH for years. Tried everything. Got cured by simple remedy, and will send the receipt, postage free, to all afflicted. Address A. LAWRENCE,
Drawer 176, Syracuse, New York.

HOWE'S Never-Failing Acne Cure and Toilet Bitters, Blood Purifier, and Liver Regulator cure all diseases —Incipient Consumption, Catarrh, Cancer, &c., every time. $1 each. C. B. HOWE, 1 Park Row, N. Y.

EUREKA!—Blotches and Eruptions on the face and permanently cured in one week. Receipt, 10 cents. Address, Address (enclosing 3c cents and stamp) JAS. SMITH, Jr., Box 61, Charlestown, Mass.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.
Mrs. M. C. LESCHALT, Hoboken, N. J.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SORGHUM, in 10 hours, with the "Vinegar Process." Full directions, $5. Address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

A FORTUNE made in from 6 to 12 hours by any one. Address
J. T. G., Box 77,
Chillicothe, Livingston Co., Missouri.

TOYS FOR THE HOLIDAYS, at the Children's Free Toy-Bazar, school and Toy Bazaar, 478 Broadway, between Grand and Broome Streets.

$20 a day! Business new. Samples and Circulars free. J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

$200 for first-class new 7-Octave Pianos. Next best on trial. A. H. PEASE & SON, New York.

A HAIR-BREADTH ESCAPE.

GENTLEMAN (to Lady falling through the Ice). "It is fortunate for you, Miss, that you have your Own Hair!"

A NEW DISCOVERY ! !

PHALON'S

"VITALIA;"

OR,

Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaccident matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the direction being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER !

AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,

CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,

517 Broadway, N. Y.

MAGIC LANTERNS, for Sunday-Schools, Public Exhibitions, and Parlor Entertainments. ☞ Catalogues sent free.—MICROSCOPES, for Scientific and Popular Investigations. ☞ Price-list sent free. T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

C. G. Gunther's Sons,

502–504 Broadway,

Offer a Fresh Assortment of

SEAL AND ASTRAKHAN SACQUES, TURBANS, Boas, Ties, &c.,

AT REDUCED PRICES.

WEBB'S ADDER.

ONLY PRACTICAL ADDING MACHINE IN THE WORLD.

This little machine, no less wonderful in its simplicity than in its efficacy, has won a more speedy success than any other invention of the day. While the sewing machine had to struggle through long years for adoption, Webb's Adding Machine was accepted at once. When numbers are called off, it gives instantaneous additions. It carries up the columns of a ledger account, two at a time, with mechanical accuracy. The President of the First National Bank of New York writes in his testimonial, "IT RELIEVES THE MIND ENTIRELY, AND REDUCES ARITHMETIC TO A SIMPLE MOTION OF THE HAND!" The machine took the first medals and diplomas at the last American Institute Fair, in New York, and also at the last Mass. State Fair, in Boston. It is guaranteed to do every thing claimed for it, and the report comes from nearly all who use it that not enough is claimed—that it does more. Price $8 and $10. Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage (81 cents), or by express, C.O.D., at the customer's expense. To circular (post-office order, registered letter, or draft) saves the return-money charge. For circular, testimonials, &c., enclose stamp. State and County Rights (exclusive) for sale.—WEBB'S ADDING MACHINE CO
E. P. DUTTON & CO., Selling Agents,
713 Broadway, New York.

"PERFECTION" Coffee-Pot.

(Patented June 1, 1869.)

Superior to any yet invented, combining all the advantages of the French pattern, with wonderful

SIMPLICITY, DURABILITY, CONVENIENCE, AND CHEAPNESS.

Lovers of GOOD COFFEE are unanimous in its praise.

☞ FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS. ☜

SIMPSON, HALL, MILLER, & CO.,
SOLE MANUFACTURERS,
WALLINGFORD, Conn.

Sample and Sales Room, 19 John St., N. Y.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by nearly every Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods, Swiss Carved Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. H. J. PAILLARD & CO., 680 BROADWAY, N.Y.

Holiday Presents.—A suitable Present is a Meerschaum Pipe or Holder, Plain or Carved, of the best material; a large selection always on hand. Factory, 49 Ridderberg's, 6 John St., next Bridway, 2 Nassau St., corner John. Factory: 64 Wall. Send for Circular & Price-List. P.O. Box 6734.

The Reason why Every One should buy a Haines Piano:

The reputation of these Pianos is fully established as being unsurpassed by any for a rich, full tone, elasticity of touch, long standing in tune, and elegance of style and finish.

Every article used in the construction of the Haines Piano is of the best quality and of thoroughly seasoned materials.

The prices being reasonable, they can not fail to suit any who may desire to purchase.

Circulars and information sent on application to

HAINES BROTHERS,
46 East 14th Street, New York.

Or to SMITH & NIXON, Chicago, Ills.; H. N. HERSPERGER, Milwaukee, Wis.; LOUIS TRUPP, Louisville, Ky.; J. A. MCCLURE, Nashville, Tenn.; KUNKEL BROS., St. Louis, Mo.; C. M. MERCK, Cincinnati, Ohio; J. R. JACKSON, Sandusky, Ohio; BRADSTARD & SONS, Cleveland, Ohio; H. D. MESSNER, Zanesville, Ohio; J. E. GOULD, Philadelphia, Pa.; C. BURAU, Pittsburgh, Pa.; L. B. POWELL, Scranton, Pa.; CLEVEY & SONS, Albany and Troy, N. Y.; J. T. HAMMICK, Rhinebeck, N. Y.; H. S. MASKER, Rochester, N. Y.; H. ULLEY, Buffalo, N. Y.; HERRINTON & HOWE, Syracuse, N. Y.; WHITE, SMITH, & PERRY, Boston, Mass.; COREY BROS., Providence, R. I.; C. M. LOOMIS, New Haven, Conn.; MATHIAS GRAY, San Francisco, Cal.; A. & S. NORDHEIMER, Toronto, C. W.; E. PEZLER & BRO., St. John, N. B.

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

OFFER FOR SALE

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS, Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS, and other

FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our fine assortment of CORAL JEWELRY.

REAL BRONZES,

JUST OPENED.

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

ENGLISH TABLE CUTLERY.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.'S

FINE

SILVER-PLATED GOODS.

HOLIDAY GOODS

NOW READY.

ALL AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

No. 717 BROADWAY,

Five doors below Eighth—through to Mercer St.

The Advance.

Of which Rev. Henry Ward Beecher says: "I regard it as standing fairly on the highest ground yet reached by Religious newspapers in America;" and which Dr. Horace Bushnell pronounces "One of the ablest, best, and most outspoken Religious journals published," is clubbed with

Harper's Weekly,

Harper's Monthly, or Harper's Bazar, at $5 00 per year, making the ADVANCE, whose regular subscription price is $2 50, cost only One Dollar to those who are about to renew their subscription to either of the Harper periodicals. This is an excellent and inexpensive opportunity to make the acquaintance of this bold and aggressive, yet genial and judicious religious family journal, published at the metropolis of the Interior. For both periodicals, at club rates, or for sample copies of the Advance, address

THE ADVANCE COMPANY.
Lombard Block, Chicago.

AT LOW PRICES.

A Large Assortment of

ROBES DE CHAMBRE and HOUSE COATS,

For HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

E. A. NEWELL,

727 Broadway, Cor. Waverly Place.

E. HOLMES' BURGLAR-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

This one Bell, located in the sitting-room, rings upon the opening of each window and door of the house. Burglars who are using it testify to its merits. Send for a Pamphlet.

E. HOLMES, 7 Murray St., N. Y.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Buckeye Fake. Address W. A. WILSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

FISHERMEN!

TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,

☞ Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

AGENTS,—OROIDE GOLD,—AGENTS.

A $50 day made easy. Oroide Gold Fan Chain Watch Pins. Is indestructible. Writes 4 pages with one dip. Sells at sight—buyers look like Gold. Sample box, 12 pens, for 25 cents, postpaid; also other novelties. Cey Novelty Co., 464 Library St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Ahearn's Patents.

Purchasers wanted for every State and County not yet sold. $10000 and expenses can be made monthly on a very useful article. For particulars, address

J. AHEARN, 5 P. O. Avenue, Baltimore, Md.

EDWARD SEARS'

ENGRAVING ESTABLISHMENT,

46 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

NEW GOODS NOW OPENING

FROM

PARIS, LONDON, AND BOHEMIA.

Gilt-Mounted Vases and Jardinieres.

GILT AND BRONZE CLOCKS, FIGURES, &c.

JEWEL-CASES, BONBONNIERES, TABLES, &c.

RICH DECORATED

CHINA DINNER AND DESSERT SETS,

VERY CHEAP.

SILVER-PLATED WARE, EXTRA QUALITY.

CHANDELIERS AND GAS-FIXTURES

from OSLER, London, and of our own manufacture.

AGENTS FOR ROGERS' GROUPS.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,

488, 490, and 492 Broadway, corner Broome St.

ALTHOF, BERGMANN, & CO.,

30, 32, 34, & 36 PARK PLACE,

(Corner of Church Street),

NEW YORK,

offer

AT RETAIL,

for Five Days only, from the 20th until the 24th of December, their splendid and most attractive stock of

TOYS

AND

FANCY GOODS.

THE INGLE-SIDE GAMES

will be ready on the 15th inst.

THE CROWN, PYX, LUTTE;

Three charming Games at One Bound: for 2, 3, or 4 players. Price (complete), $5. The Rules and Description of the Games sent postage free. Address CHAS. RICHARDSON, care of KIRBY & CO., Dealer in Games and Fine Holiday Gifts, 663 Broadway, N.Y.

KNOCH MORGAN'S SONS SOAP AND SAPOLIO

211 WASHINGTON ST. N.Y.

CATALOGUES, by Mail, 10 cents each. MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS, 112 pages. OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS, 128 pages. MAGIC LANTERNS and STEREOPTICANS, 160 pp. PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS, 84 pages.
JAMES W. QUEEN & CO.,
924 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

A Holiday Present.—Pollak & Son manufacture warranted Genuine Meerschaum Pipes. Store: 219 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel; & 37 John St., middle of block. Send for circular to Letter-Box 5346. Also, Repairing and Boiling done.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Save money in buying Chromos, by going up stairs. E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 591 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel. STEREOSCOPES, VIEWS, ALBUMS, FRAMES.

HOWER INSTITUTE and Clavacrack College. Term opens December 27th. Rev. ALONZO PLACE, A.M., President. Claverack, N. Y.

71.2669.084 08094